From the foregoing argument, Christ draws an inference or conclusion, That there is no making a judgment according to the first appearance of things; and that suddenness or rashness, prejudice or partiality in judging, overthrowes righteous judgment. This is the general application of what Christ had said before; and the particular application of it, as to himself, comes to this, Judge not according to appearance, but judge righteous judgment: As if Christ had said, "Lay aside your prejudices against my person, and compare these cases attentively and impartially with one another; and then see whether you can justly condemn me as a Sabbath-breaker, and acquit yourselves." Such was the perfect innocency of our Saviour's actions, that he could and did submit them to the reason and judgment of his very enemies.

25 Then said some of them of Jerusalem. Is not this he whom they seek to kill? 26 But lo, he speaketh boldly, and they say nothing unto him. Do the rulers know indeed, that this is the very Christ? 27 Howbeit, we know this man whence he is: but when Christ cometh, no man knoweth whence he is: 28 Then cried Jesus in the temple. as he taught saying, Ye both know me, and ye know whence I am: and I am not come of myself, but he that sent me is true, whom ye know not, 29 But I know him; for I am from him, and he hath sent me. 30 Then they sought to take him: but no man laid hands on him, because his hour was not yet come. 31 And many of the people believed on him, and said, When Christ cometh, will he do more miracles than these which this man hath done?

Our blessed Saviour having vindicated both his doctrine and practise, and appeared publicly in the temple, and speaking boldly there, the people of Jerusalem, knowing the hatred and enmity of the chief priests and rulers against him, do wonder that they did not apprehend him. Learn, Almighty God doth and can preserve his own, in the faithful discharge of their duty in such an admirable manner, that even their enemies themselves may wonder at it, and be astonished at it. 2. The argument which the Jews urged against our Saviour's being Christ, and the promised Messias, namely, that they knew whence he was, whereas when the Messias cometh, no man shall know whence he is; now herein they assert a manifest untruth; for though Christ, in respect of his God-head, was prefigured by Melchisedec, who was without father or mother, without descent; (that is, without any that the scripture mentions,) yet in respect of his human nature, the Jews might know whence he was; for the scripture plainly pointed out the tribe, the family, the lineage, and the place of his birth. 3. That Christ, being grieved at this impudent cavil doth reply unto it with much boldness and zeal; he cried, saying, Ye know me, and whence I am; but the Father that sent me ye know not: That is, "You know me as a man, where I was born and of what family I am, but you know not my divine nature, nor the Father from whom I am by eternal generation, and who hath sent me into the world." 4. What causeless rage appeared in these men against Christ for declaring the truth unto them: they would have taken him by violence, had not the power and providence of God restrained them for the present, because his time to suffer was not yet come. Hence learn, That violence and persecution against the faithful dispensers of the truths of God, have been the lot and portion of such in all ages and generations; Christ experienced it; let his ministers expect it. 5. That although the rulers at Jerusalem were angry and enraged, yet the meaner and inferior sort of people believed on him, being convinced by the wonderful miracles which he had wrought amongst them, that he was the true and promised Messias. For, say they, whenever the Messias comes, he cannot do greater and more evident miracles than this man hath done. Learn hence, That although the grace of God be not insured to, or entailed upon any sort of people: yet ordinarily it is the meaner sort of people with whom it prevails most. Many of the common people at Jerusalem were believing, when the rulers there were persecuting: Men that live in pleasure and at ease, see no need of dependance upon God; have little inclination or desire to further the gospel, and to encourage either the dispensers or professors of it; nay, it is well if they do not turn persecutors.

32 ¶ The Pharisees heard that the people murmured such things concerning him; and the Pharisees and the chief priests sent officers to take him. 33 Then said Jesus unto them, Yet a little while am I with you, and then I go unto him that sent me. 34 Ye shall seek me, and shall not find me: and where I am, thither ye cannot come. 35 Then said the Jews among themselves, Whither will he go, that we shall not find him? will he go unto the dispersed among the Gentiles, and teach the Gentiles? 36 What manner of saying is this that he said, Ye shall seek me, and shall not find me: and where I am, thither ye cannot come?

Observe here, How enraged the pharisees were, when they heard that so many of the common people were brought to believe in Christ, and cleave unto Christ, inso-much that they sent public officers, armed with authority to apprehend our blessed Saviour; The Pharisees and chief priests sent officers to take him. Learn thence, That nothing more enrageth the enemies of religion, and draws trouble on the preachers and professors of it, than the success which the gospel at any time meets with, Observe, 2. Our Saviour tells them that as they desired to be rid of him, so ere long they should have their desire; he would leave them and go to his Father, and in his absence, they would wish for his bodily presence again, but should not have it. Learn, The despisers of Christ have little cause to be weary of him, and to seek to put him away by violence and persecution; for their obstinate contempt of him will cause him to depart from them, and finally forsake them. Observe, 2. How the Jews, not understanding our Saviour's words aright, reasoned among themselves, whether by leaving of them, he meant to go into some pagan country, and teach the Gentiles the mysteries of the Jewish religion; which above all things they could not endure to hear. Learn hence, That it is the ordinary sin of a people privileged with the means of grace, not to be sensible of the hazard or danger of Christ's leaving and forsaking them, till at last he leaves them finally and casts them off, to their inevitable and unutterable condemnation. Thus did our Lord with the Jews here: I go my way, and whither I go, ye cannot come.

37 In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink.

The feast of tabernacles (which is the feast here meant) lasted eight days; the first and last of which were to be kept holy with religious assemblies and sacrifices; and it was a custom among the Jews, upon that solemn day, to offer up a pot of water unto God, which they drew out of the fountain of Siloam; with reference to this custom, Christ here cries with a loud voice, inviting the people to fetch and draw from him, as from a living fountain, all the sanctifying gifts and saving graces of the holy Spirit. Learn hence, That Jesus Christ is the original and fountain of all saving grace, whom if we thirst after, repair to, and by faith depend upon as Mediator, we shall certainly receive what influences of grace soever we want and stand in need of.

38 He that believeth on me, as the scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water.

Here again Christ alludes to a Jewish custom; the Jews were wont at fountains to build great vessels of stone, and in the midst or belly of them to have pipes, through which the water passes, "Now, says Christ, thus it shall be with every one that believeth on me; he shall be abundantly filled with the Spirit of God, in all the sanctifying and saving graces of it." Christ and his holy Spirit are a living fountain, whose waters never fail; they are not a water-brook, but a spring of water; we shall never miss of the waters of life, if we seek unto and wait upon Christ for them. For, if we believe on him, out of our bellies shall flow rivers of living waters, sufficient for ourselves, and where with to refresh others.

39 (But this he spake of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive: for the Holy Ghost was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified.)

These words are the Evangelist St John's commentary upon the foregoing promise: he tells us, that Christ spake this of the miraculous gifts of the Spirit, which did accompany the descent of the Holy Ghost, at the feast of Pentecost. For the Holy Ghost was not yet given, that is, not so plentifully given, because Jesus was not glorified. Learn hence, That although the Spirit was in some measure given by God from the beginning to good men, yet the more plentiful effusion of it was deferred, till the ascension and glorification of Jesus Christ.

40 ¶ Many of the people therefore, when they heard this saying, said Of a truth this is the prophet. 41 Others said, This is the Christ. But some said, Shall Christ come out of Galilee? 42 Hath not the scripture said, That Christ cometh out of the seed of David, and out of the town of Bethlehem, where David was? 43 So there was a division among the people because of him. 44 And some of them would have taken him: but no man laid hands on him.

In these verses an account is given of the various effects which our Lord's foregoing sermon had upon his hearers hearts some were so affected with it, that they believed him to be the great prophet promised to Israel, Deut. xviii. 18. Others apprehended him to be the Christ: others contradict both, supposing him to be born not at Bethlehem, but in Galilee. And upon this diversity of opinions there arose a division amongst them; and some had a mind to have apprehended him, but by an over-ruling power they were restrained from doing it at present. Learn hence that diversity of opinions in matters of religion, even concerning Christ himself, have been even from the beginning. Some accounted him a prophet, others the Messiah; some thought him neither, but a grand impostor and deceiver. Our dear Lord, when here on earth, passed through evil report and good report; let his followers expect and prepare for the same for innocence itself cannot protect from slander and false accusation.

45 ¶ Then came the officers to the chief priests and Pharisees: and they said unto them, Why have ye not brought him? 46 The officers answered Never man spake like this man. 47 Then answered them the pharisees, Areye also deceived? 48 Have any of the rulers, or of the Pharisees, believed on him? 49 But this people, who knoweth not the law, are cursed.

Note here, 1. How God restrained the rage and malice of Christ's enemies, till his hour was come; the officers of the chief priests, who were sent forth with a commission to apprehend him, returned without him; but with this honourable mention of him in their mouths, Never man spake like this man. Such is the power of Christ's doctrine that even those that come unto it with prejudice, and with a persecuting purpose, may be surpris'd by it, and though not converted, yet bridled and restrained: the preaching of the gospel doth sometimes restrain the violence of the hand, when it works no change in or upon the heart. Thus it was with these poor officers. 2. That the Pharisees being more enraged at the reason which the officers gave for neglecting their office, than for the neglect itself, upbraid them, that they should suffer themselves to be so deceived, whereas none of the grandees, or learned Rabbies, had owned him; only an accursed crew of ignorant people followed him, and doted on him. Here note, That when Christ came into the world, the great ones of the world not only refused to believe on him, but boasted of their unbelief as an argument of their wisdom. Have any of the rulers believed on him? Oh no, they were too wise to believe! Faith is left to fools, and accounted folly by those wise men. Nay, farther, they count the common people cursed, who did believe on Christ. Oh prodigious stupidity! to account them accursed, who receive Jesus Christ, the chiefest blessing; great men have not always the wisdom of a man, but more seldom have they the wisdom of a real christian. Great in honour, and wise in understanding are a sweet couple, but seldom seen together.

50 Nicodemus saith unto them, (he that came to Jesus by night, being one of them) 51 Doth our law judge any man before it hear him, and know what he doeth? 52 They answered and said unto him, Art thou also of Galilee? Search, and look: for out of Galilee ariseth no prophet. 53 And every man went unto his own house.

Here note, 1. How God stirs up Nicodemus, though he durst not openly own Christ, yet to plead for him, that he might not be condemned before heard; this was a common rule of justice, and nothing but what might have been said on behalf of the greatest malefactor; he could not well have said less; but God so ordered it that it is enough to divert the storm from falling upon Christ at this time.— One word shall be sufficient to blow over a persecution, when God will have it so. 2. They answer Nicodemus with a taunt, a mock, and a scorn, that no prophet ever did rise out of Galilee, nor ever should. Therefore Christ arising out of Galilee, as they thought, could be no prophet. Lastly, That though they were more enraged, yet they disperse without concluding any thing against Christ: for that time every one went to his own home. There is no wisdom nor understanding, nor counsel against the Lord.

C H A P. VIII.

JESUS went unto the mount of Olives. 2 And early in the morning he came again into the temple and all the people came unto him; and he sat down and taught them.

The foregoing chapter gave us an account of a most excellent sermon which our Saviour preached in the temple, at the feast of tabernacles. Now the feast being ended, Jesus did not tarry in the city all night; but went out of it two miles, as he frequently used, to the mount of Olives. And although it was so dangerous for him to be seen any more in Jerusalem, yet early next morning he returns again to the city, enters the temple, and falls upon his work of preaching without fear and with indefatigable diligence. O what a busy useful life was this of our Saviours! He spent the day in preaching in the temple, the night in privacy and prayer on the mount of Olives: the next morning he returns to his work of preaching again. Thus was he always holily and painfully employed. To glorify his Father, and to be useful and beneficial to mankind, was his food by day, and his rest by night. Lord, how little do we resemble thee, if, when thy life was all pain and labour ours be all pastime, pleasure, and recreation.

3 And the scribes and Pharisees brought unto him a woman taken in adultery: and when they had set her in the midst. 4 They say unto him, Master this woman was taken in adultery, in the very act. 5 Now Moses in the law commanded us, that such should be stoned: but what sayest thou? 6 This they said, tempting him, that they might have to accuse him. But Jesus stooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground, as though he heard them not. 7 So when they continued asking him, he lifted up himself, and said unto them, He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her. 8 And again he stooped down, and wrote on the ground. 9 And they which heard it, being convicted by their own conscience, went out one by one, beginning at the eldest, even unto the last: and Jesus was left alone, and the woman standing in the midst. 10 When Jesus had lift up himself, and saw none but the woman, he said unto her, Woman where are those thine accusers? hath no man condemned thee? 11 She said, No man, Lord. And Jesus said unto her, Neither do I condemn thee: go, and sin no more.

Our Saviour early in the morning entering upon the work of preaching: Note, 2. What a mixed auditory he had, of scribes and Pharisees, and common people. All sorts of persons came to hear him, but not all with the same intentions: The common people came to learn, but the scribes and Pharisees came to cavil and carp; the latter came to tempt and ensnare him, the former to be taught and instructed by him. It is not our bare attendance upon ordinances, but the purity of our aim, and the sincerity of our intentions in waiting upon God in them, that is an evidence of our sincerity. 2. How the hypocrisy of these Pharisees was gilded over with an appearance of sanctity, as if they were great lovers of chastity and haters of uncleanness; they bring to Christ a woman taken in adultery, to be censured by him. One that had not known these Pharisees, would have concluded them very holy and honest, very conscionable and conscientious persons: but Christ who saw in their bosoms, soon found that all this was done only to tempt him. Thus a smooth tongue and a false heart often accompany one another: when we see a glittering appearance we have reason to suspect the inside. 3. The punishment which the Pharisees sought to have inflicted on this adulteress; it is death; let her be stoned: Sometimes the punishment of adultery was burning, sometimes stoning, always death: Lord! how ought christians to blush, who have slight thoughts of the sin of adultery, which both Jews and Pagans held deadly? 4. Their ensnaring question, Moses commanded such should be stoned; but what sayest thou? The Pharisees desire no better advantage against Christ, than a contradiction to Moses their law-giver: It has been an old stratagem to set Moses and Christ at variance, but they are fast friends; they are subordinate one to another, not opposed one against another. Moses brings us to Christ, and Christ to glory; vain would these colloquing adversaries draw Christ to contradict Moses, that they might take advantage of the contradiction, to condemn Christ. 5. The wisdom and caution of our Lord's answer; he doth not excuse her crime, but bids her accusers look at home, and examine their own consciences, whether they were not guilty of the like, or as great a sin: He doth not say, "let her be stoned;" this had been against the course of his mercy: he doth not say, "Let her not be stoned;" this had been against the law of Moses; but he so answers, that both his justice and his mercy are entire; she dismissed, they ashamed. It is a false zeal that is eagle-eyed abroad and blind at home. Such as are most wicked themselves, are oft-times most ready and skilful to spy out the faults and failings of others: We stand too near ourselves to discern our own miscarriages. The eye that sees every thing, sees not itself. Note, Though Christ abhorred the sin, yet he does not condemn the sinner. Hath no man condemned thee? Neither do I condemn thee, says Christ. This Christ said, not to excuse the woman or to connive at her offence, but to shew that he declined the office of a civil judge, which was to pass sentence on criminals. He therefore doth not say, No man ought to condemn thee, but Hath no man condemned thee? Christ doth not execute the office of a magistrate in judging her death; but of a minister, in calling her to repentance and reformation: How ought every one of us to keep within the bounds of our calling, when our Saviour himself will not intrench upon the office and function of others? Lastly, Our Saviour's cautionary direction to this adulteress: Go, and sin no more. Where note, Christ doth not say, Go, and commit adultery no more: but, Go, and sin no more. It is not a partial repentance, or a turning away from this or that particular sin, which will denominate us true penitents, or intitle us to the pardoning mercy of God, but a leaving off all sin of what kind soever: therefore, says Christ, Go, and sin no more.

12 ¶ Then spake Jesus again unto them, saying, am the light of the world: he that followeth me shall not walk in darknes, but shall have the light of life. 13 The Pharisees therefore said unto him, Thou bearest record of thyself; thy record is not true. 14 Jesus answered and said unto them, Though I bear record of myself, yet my record is true: for I know whence I came, and whither I go; but ye cannot tell whence I come, or whither I go: 15 Ye judge after the flesh, I judge no man. 16 And yet if I judge, my judgement is true: for I am not alone, but I and the Father that sent me. 17 It is also written in your law, that the testimony of two men is true. 18 I am one that bear witness of myself, and the Father that sent me, beareth witness of me. 19 Then said they unto him, Where is thy Father? Jesus answered, Ye neither know me, nor my Father: if ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also. 20 These words spake Jesus in the treasury as he taught in the temple: and no man laid hands on him; for his hour was not yet come.

Our blessed Saviour having baffled the design which the Pharisees had upon him, and shewed a spirit of divine wisdom, in delivering himself from that snare which they had laid for him, he returns to instruct the people in the treasury. And here note, 1, He instructs them in the nature of his office, which was to enlighten all men, with the knowledge of divine truth; so that they should not walk in darknes, either of sin or error, but be led to eternal life. Learn hence, That the great end and errand of Christ's coming into the world, was to give light unto poor souls that sat in darknes. 2. The exception which the Pharisees make against our Saviour's testimony of himself; Thou bearest record of thyself; thy record is not true. Indeed, such is the corrupt nature of man, which is prone to seek itself, and hunt after vain-glory, that it may render a person's testimony of himself suspected; but Christ being true God, that cannot lie, and coming out of the bosom of the Father, as his ambassador, his testimony of himself is above all exception, and ought to be credited without farther proof. 3. How Christ challenges his enemies, the Pharisees, for judging carnally of him, and according to the meanness of his outward appearance, whereas he judged no man: that is, First, No man, as they judged, according to outward shew: or, Secondly, I judge no man; that is, at present. My proper work is not to condemn any, but teach all; and my present office is that of a prophet, not of a judge. My coming now is to instruct and save the world; my next coming will be to judge and condemn it. 4. Christ declares that he is not alone in the testimony given himself, but that the Father did also testify and bear witness of him, and that according to their own law, the testimony of two was always accounted and esteemed valid. "Now, says Christ, if so much weight be to be laid upon the testimony of two men, how much more forcible should the testimony of the Father, and of him that he hath sent, be, to satisfy you, that that what I say of myself is true? Learn hence, 1. That the Father and the Son though one in essence and operation, yet are distinct persons. 2. That these distinct persons did bear joint witness concerning Christ. God the Father testified of him by a voice from heaven; and Christ as God, bare witness of himself as man, and as Mediator. Surely out of the mouth of two such witnesses, the truth of Christ's divine mission is sufficiently established.

21 Then said Jesus again unto them, I go my way, and ye shall seek me, and shall die in your sins: whither I go, ye cannot come. 22 Then said the Jews, Will he kill himself? because he saith, Whither I go, ye cannot come. 23 And he said unto them, Ye are from beneath; I am from above: ye are of this world: I am not of this world. 25 I said therefore unto you, that ye should die in your sins: for if ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins.

Observe here, A dreadful threatening denounced by Christ against the obstinate and unbelieving Jews, Ye shall die in your sins; that is, in the guilt of your sins: Lord! what a sad word is this, Ye shall die in your sins: O better is it a thousand times to die in a ditch! for they that die in their sins, shall rise in their sins, and stand before Christ in their sins: such as lie down in sin in the grave, shall have sin lie down with them in hell to all eternity. The sins of believers go to the grave before them; sin dieth while they live; but the sins of unbelievers go to the with them. While they live they are dead in sin: and by sin they fall into death: from which there is no recovery unto life. 2. The grand sin for which this great punishment is threatened, and that is the sin of unbelief; If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins. Plainly intimating that, of all sin, infidelity and unbelief is the grand damning sin under the gospel. The devil hath a great advantage upon men, by making them strong in unbelief, as God hath by making his people strong in faith. Unbelief renders a sinner's case desperate and incurable: it doth not only procure damnation, but no damnation like it.

25 Then said they unto him, Who art thou? And Jesus saith unto them, Even the same that I said unto you from the beginning. 26 I have many things to say, and to judge of you: but he that sent me, is true; and I speak to the world those things which I have heard of him. 27 They understood not that he spake to them of the Father. 28 Then said Jesus unto them, When ye have lift up the Son of man, then shall ye know, that I am he and that I do nothing of myself; but as my Father hath taught me, I speak these things.

The Jews hearing our Saviour denouncing such terrible threatening against them, because they believed not on him in the foregoing verses; here they perversely ask him who he was? our Saviour replies, That he was the same that he was from the beginning, even the very Christ, and that they were the very same that were also the mortal enemies and opposers of the truth. But that the time was hastening, when they should be fully convinced who he was; namely, when they had lifted him upon his cross, when he was risen again, and ascended into heaven, and brought that destruction upon them, which he had so often threatened. Learn hence, That the sufferings of Christ were clear and convincing demonstrations, both who he was and what he was. The darkening of the sun, the quaking of the earth, the rending of the rocks, the opening of the graves, were such convincing proofs of his deity, that they could not but say, Verily, this was the Son of God.

29 And he that sent me, is with me: the Father hath not left me alone: for I do always those things that please him.

That is, he that sent and commissioned me for the great work of redemption, he is continually with me, both to assist and to accept me: I doing every thing that is agreeable to his holy will and pleasure. Hence learn, 1. That the work of redemption, in the hands of Jesus Christ, was a work well pleasing to God the Father; the work itself was highly pleasing to him; and Christ's way of managing it was well pleasing also. 2. That the reason why it was thus well pleasing to God, was, because he acted in a constant conformity to his Father's will, kept to his Father's commission, and executed his Father's commands, doing always those things that pleased him. 3. That as the Father and Christ were inseparable in respect of the unity of the divine essence; so the Father was always with Christ as Mediator, both to support and uphold him, to accept and to reward him. The Father hath not left me alone, either in the doing of his will, or in the suffering of his pleasure. 4. That those who desire the gracious and special presence of God with them in all conditions, particularly in times of sufferings and trouble they must make it their care and study to please God, and to observe his will in all things; then God will be with them in his guiding presence, in his strengthening presence, in his comforting, in his quickening, in his sanctifying, sympathizing, and accepting presence.

30 As he spake these words, many believed on him. 31 Then said Jesus to those Jews which believed on him, If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed; 32 And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free.

Note here, 1. The blessed fruit and success of our Saviour's foregoing discourse concerning his person and office. As he spake these words many believed on him: Not by their own natural power and ability, but by Christ's omnipotent and efficacious grace; he that spoke to the ear, caused his word to reach the heart; Christ himself, that planted and watered, gave also the increase. 2. The love and care of Christ mentioned to these new converts; he watereth immediately these plants with wholesome advice and counsel. If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed: Where note, 1. It shall be Christ's word, the true doctrine of the gospel, and this abided and continued in, which will evidence our discipleship. 3. A special privilege which shall follow upon abiding in the doctrine of Christ; they shall increase in the knowledge of it, and be made free by it: Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free. Where note, 1. That man is naturally in bondage and captivity, by blindness of mind, by hardness of heart by rebellion of will. 2. That the means appointed by God for setting at liberty from this captivity and bondage, is the word of Christ, and the doctrine of the gospel: The truth shall make you free.

33 ¶ They answered him, We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man: how sayest thou, Ye shall be made free? 34 Jesus answered them, Verily, verily I say unto you, Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin. 35 And the servant abideth not in the house for ever: but the Son abideth ever. 36 If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed.

Note here, How these carnal Jews understand all that our Saviour said, to be spoken in and after a carnal manner: When he spoke to them before, of eating his flesh, and drinking his blood, they understood it grossly of his natural body; when he speaks to them here of a spiritual freedom from sin, they understand it of a civil freedom from servile bondage and subjection; alledging, They were Abraham's seed, and never in bondage to any man. Which was a manifest untruth, having been in bondage, in their ancestors to the Egyptians and Babylonians; and in their own persons to the Romans. But this was not the bondage that Christ meant; but a spiritual slavery and thraldom, under the dominion of sin, and power of Satan: For he that committeth sin, is the servant of sin; That is, whosoever doth habitually, wilfully, deliberately, and constantly allow and tolerate himself in a sinful course, he is under the servitude and thraldom of sin. Every sinner is a bond-slave; and to live in sin is to live in slavery. And this every man doth till the Son makes him free; then, and not till then, is he free indeed. Learn hence, That interest in Christ, and continuance in his doctrine, sets the soul at liberty from all that bondage whereunto it was subject in its natural and sinful state. O happy exchange, from being the devil's slaves, to become Christ's free men: and also freed from the rigorous exactions and terrible maledictions of the law.

37 I know that ye are Abraham's seed: but ye seek to kill me, because my word hath no place in you. 38 I speak that which I have seen with my Father: and ye do that which ye have seen with your father. 39 They answered and said unto him Abraham is our father. Jesus saith unto them, If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham. But now ye seek to kill me, a man that hath told you the truth, which I have heard of God: this did not Abraham.

The Jews boasting again, that they were Abraham's seed and bearing themselves much upon it; our Saviour tells them, He knew they were so, his natural children according to the flesh; but not his genuine children according to the Spirit: This he proves, because they did not tread in Abraham's steps, and do his works: for if either the temper of their minds, or the action of their lives were agreeable to Abraham; they would not seek, as they did, to destroy and kill him, only for bringing the doctrine of salvation to them, which he had heard and learned of their Father. Thence learn, 1. How prone we are to glory in our outward privileges, and to rely upon them. Whereas these are arguments of God's goodness towards us, but no evidence of our goodness towards him. 2. That it is very dangerous and unsafe to pride ourselves in, and depend upon any external privileges and prerogatives whatsoever; as, our being born within the pale of the visible church, our descending from pious parents, and holy progenitors: for unless we be followers of their faith, admirers of their piety, and imitate their example, we are none of their children; but belong to another father, as our Saviour tells the Jews in the other verses.

41 Ye do the deeds of your father, Then said they to him, We be not born of fornication: we have one Father, even God: 42 Jesus said unto them, If God were your Father, ye would love me: for I proceeded forth, and came from God; neither came I of myself, but he sent me. 43 Why do ye not understand my speech? even because ye cannot hear my word. 44 Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do: he was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him, When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own: for he is a liar, and the father of it.

In the former verses the Jews make their boast, that they were the children of Abraham; in these that they are the children of God. We have one Father, even God. This our Saviour disproves, telling them, that if God was their Father, they would love him, as proceeding from him by eternal generation; and in his office employed by him as Mediator. Also, if God were their Father, they would understand him speaking from God; whereas now they were so transported with malice, that they could not endure his doctrine with patience, though it came from God: All which were undeniable proofs, that they were not the children of God. Hence learn, That none can justly pretend an interest in God as his children, but they that love Christ, as being the express image of his Father's person, and do hear and receive his doctrine as coming from God: This the Jews did not do; therefore says Christ, they are not the Children of God. Farther, Having told them whose children they are not, our Saviour tells them plainly whose children they were. Ye are of your father the devil. This appears by their being actuated by him, by their resembling and imitating of him: their inclinations, dispositions, and actions, being all to fulfil the lusts of the devil. Now, as his Servants we are, when we obey; so his children dren we are, whom we resemble. Learn hence, That men's sinful practices will prove them to be Satan's children, let their profession be what it will; if in the temper of their minds, and in the actions of their lives, there be a conformity to Satan's disposition, and a ready compliance with his temptations, they are certainly his children, what pretensions soever they make of being the children of God. None could pretend higher to the relation of God's children, than these Jews did; yet, says Christ, Ye are the children of the devil, for his works ye do. Note hence, That the devil hath the relation of a father to all wicked men: And this fatherhood doth not proceed from the act of the father, but of the children; for the devil doth not make wicked men his children by begetting them, but they make the devil their father by imitating of him.

45 And behold I tell you the truth, ye believe me not. 46 Which of you convinceth me of sin? And if I say the truth, why do ye not believe me? 47 He that is of God, heareth God's words: ye therefore hear them not, because ye are not of God. 48 Then answered the Jews, and said unto him, Say we not well, that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil? 49 Jesus answered, I have not a devil: but I honour my Father, and ye do dishonour me. 50 And I seek not mine own glory: there is one that seeketh and judgeth.

Here note, 1. The free reproof which Christ gave the Jews for their obstinate unbelief: Because I tell you the truth, ye believe not. 2. The challenge which he gives the worst of his adversaries: Which of you convinceth me of sin? So perfectly pure, innocent, and spotless was the doctrine and life of Christ, that although his enemies loaded him with slander and false accusation, yet none of them could justly convict of, much less condemn him for the least known sin. 3. The Jews, being enraged at this reproof fell a railing at his person, charging him with being a Samaritan, possessed of an evil spirit: Our Saviour meekly replies, That he did not deal with the devil, but was honouring his Father in what he did and said; and therefore his Father would take care of his honour, and judge between him and them. Here note, That though Christ used some sharpness in reproving the Jews and representing them to themselves; yet he answers with wonderful mildness and meekness, when he discovers his resentments of his own reproaches: How cool was Christ in his own cause, but warm enough in God's!

51 Verily, verily, I say unto you, If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death. 52 Then said the Jews unto him, Now we know that thou hast a devil. Abraham is dead; and the prophets; and thou sayest, If a man keep my saying, he shall never taste of death. 53 Art thou greater than our father Abraham which is dead? and the prophets are dead: whom makest thou thyself? 54 Jesus answered if I honour myself, my honour is nothing:

it is my Father that honoureth me, of whom ye say that he is your God. 55 Yet ye have not known him; but I know him: and if I should say, I know him not, I shall be a liar like unto you; but I know him, and keep his saying.

Note here, 1. The blessed fruit and effect of observing our Saviour's doctrine; He that keeps my saying, shall never see death; that is, shall be secured from eternal misery, and enjoy eternal life. 2. How the Jews misunderstood our Saviour's words: He that keeps my saying shall never see death: as if he meant a freedom from temporal death and hereupon they looked upon him as beside himself, to promise a privilege which neither Abraham, nor the prophets did ever enjoy: Whereas it is not exemption from temporal death, but freedom from eternal destruction, which our Saviour promised to them that keep his saying. Hence learn, That the misunderstanding of Christ's doctrine, and taking it in a carnal sense, has given occasion for the many cavils and objections made against it. 3. How Christ clears himself of all ambition in this matter, and shews that he did not make this promise of delivering his disciples from death vain gloriously, but that God, whom they called their Father had honoured him with power to make good, whatever he had promised to them that keep his saying. Learn hence; That as Christ entirely sought his glory, to the Father, conferred all honour and glory upon Christ as Mediator; thereby testifying how infinitely pleased he was with the redemption of mankind performed by him. If I honour myself, my honour is nothing; it is my Father that honoureth me.

56 Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day: and he saw it and was glad.

That is, "Abraham having received a promise, that the Messiah should come of his seed, he exceedingly rejoiced to see the day of my coming in the flesh, though afar off, with the eye of his faith, and in a figure, in his sacrificed son Isaac; and this sight of his faith was so transporting, that he leaped for joy." Learn hence, That a strong faith gives such a clear sight of Christ (though at a distance) as produceth an holy delight and rejoicing in him.

57 Then said the Jews unto him, Thou art not yet fifty years old; and hast thou seen Abraham? 58 Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I am. 59 Then took they up stones, to cast at him: but Jesus hid himself, and went out of the temple; going through the midst of them, and so passed by.

Note here, 1. What a false and ridiculous construction the Jews make of our Saviour's words, as if he had affirmed that he had seen Abraham, and Abraham him, with bodily eyes; whereas Christ only asserted, that Abraham had seen his day; that is, he foresaw by faith the day of his incarnation, and coming in the flesh. 2. Our Saviour's positive asserting of his divinity, or that he had had a being as God from all eternity; for, says he, Before Abraham was, I am. Where note, That Christ does not say, Before Abraham

Abraham was, I was; but, Before Abraham was, I am; which is the proper name of God, thereby it signified the eternal duration and permanency of his being. The adversaries of Christ's divinity say, that, before Abraham was, Christ was; that is, in God's foreknowledge or degree; but this may be said of any other person as well as Christ, that he was in the foreknowledge of God before Abraham was born: Whereas undoubtedly it was Christ's design in these words to give himself some preference and advantage above Abraham, which this interpretation doth not in the least do. Lastly, How the Jews looking upon Christ as a blasphemer, for making himself with God, and for asserting his eternal existence, they make a furious attempt upon his life, by taking up stones to cast at him, as the Jews used to deal with blasphemers; but our Saviour delivers himself miraculously from their fury, and escapes untouched.—Hence learn, That when arguments fail, the enemies of truth betake themselves to force and violence: They took up stones to cast at him. 2: That as Christ disappointed his own persecutors, so he can and will deliver his people in their greatest extremity from their persecutors rage and fury. 2 Pet. ii. 9. The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly, &c.

C H A P. IX.

AND as Jesus passed by, he saw a man which was blind from his birth.

The foregoing chapter acquaints us with a famous encounter which the Pharisees had with our blessed Saviour in the temple at Jerusalem: This being ended, as he passed from the temple, he saw a man lying, possibly by the high-way, who was born blind; him Christ pitches upon as an object fit to exercise his divine power, in the cure and healing of. They that are blind by casualty, may perhaps be relieved by art and industry; but to cure one that is born blind, nothing less is required than an almighty power.—Learn hence, That diseases and distempers, which are not incurable to Christ's power, nor impossible for him to help, but a proper object for him to magnify his power upon. Therefore it is here recorded, that this poor man was blind from his birth: Such blindness being counted incurable by natural means.

2 And his disciples asked him, saying, Master, who did sin, this man, or his parents, that he was born blind?

Here note, Something implied or supposed; namely, 1. That all bodily afflictions and calamities do come upon us for sin. Whereas afflictions, although they always fall upon a sinner, yet they are not always sent to punish sin; but by way of purgation and prevention of sin. 2. It is here supposed, that some afflictions come upon men for personal sins, so others come upon them for parental sins; and that children may, and oft-times do, very justly suffer for their parents sins. 3. It is here supposed, that there is no other reason of a person's sufferings, but only sin; whereas though sin be much and often the cause of suffering, yet we may wrong God and man, yea, and sin too, to conclude it is always the cause of suffering. 4. It is implied here that there is a transmigration of souls from one body to another: the disciples supposed, that this soul when it was in another body, sinned, and was now punished by being put into a blind body. This Pythagorean error was crept in among the Pharisees, and the disciples here seemed to be tainted and infected with it. This may teach us, how far the holiest and wisest of men are from an infallible spirit and that the best men may be misled by a common error.

3 Jesus answered, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents: but that the works of God should be made manifest in him.

Christ's answer must not be understood absolutely, as if he denied this man and his parents to be guilty of sin; for both he and they had sin enough, not only to deserve temporal blindness, but eternal darkness. The meaning is, that in afflicting this man, the Lord did not so much respect his, or his parents' sin, as the manifestation of his own glory, in this miraculous cure. Christ doth not deny but that neither the one nor the other was the cause in that man's case; but that the power and mercy of God might be seen in restoring this man to his sight, therefore was he born blind. Whence note, 1. That though sin be always the deserving, yet it is not always the procuring cause of affliction. 2. That we seldom think of, or hit upon any other cause of affliction, but only sin; though the design of God looks beyond the sin of man in afflictions, yet man seldom looks beyond that, or thinks of any other design of God in afflicting, but only punishing for sin.

4 I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh when no man can work. 5 As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world:

Here our Saviour tells his disciples, That he was sent by God into the world; and had a great work assigned him by God during his abode in it; namely; to instruct, reform, and save mankind: And what our Saviour says of himself is applicable to every one of us in a lower sense; we are sent into the world to work out our own salvation in the first place, and then to promote the salvation of others as much as in us lies. Note, 1. That every one has a work to do in the world; a great work assigned him by God that sent him into it. 2. That the time allotted for the finishing and dispatching of this great work is a limited time, it is a short time; our working season is a short season: While it is day. 3. That after the working season is past and expired, there will succeed a night of darkness, in which there must be a cessation from work: The night cometh.

6 When he had thus spoken, he spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle, and he anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay. 7 And said unto him go wash in the pool of Siloam (which is; by interpretation, Sent.) He went his way therefore, and washed, and came seeing.

Two things concurred towards the cure of this blind man, namely; an act of divine power on Christ's part, and an act of divine power on Christ's part; he tempers the clay and spittle together, and anoints the man's eyes therewith, and behold he sees. What an improbable remedy and means was this to human reason! much fitter to put out a seeing man's eyes than to cure a blind man's. Had Christ pulled out his box, and applied some medical ointment to his eyes, then the praise had been ascribed to his skill, not to his power; but now it plainly appeared, that all the virtue was in Christ, not in the means. Lord! what great things thou canst do by weak and unlikely means, yea, by opposite and contrary means: but it is the praise of Omnipotency to work improbabilities. From the contemptibleness of the means or instrument, always redounds the greater honour of the agent. 2. an act of faith and obedience on the man's part: He went away and washed his eyes in the pool of Siloam, and returned seeing. Where note

1. How Christ delights to exercise and try the faith of his people, by their subjection and obedience to difficult commands. 2. That true faith, joined with sincere obedience, never faileth the expectation of them that exercise it, especially in obeying the most hard and difficult commands. Therefore the Evangelist added, that the blind man after washing returned seeing.

8 ¶ The neighbours therefore, and they which before had seen him, that he was blind, said, Is not this he that sat and begged? 9 Some said, This is he: others said, He is like him; but he said, I am he. 10 Therefore they said unto him, How were thine eyes opened? 11 He answered and said, A man that is called Jesus, made clay, and anointed mine eyes, and said unto me, Go to the pool of Siloam, and wash: and I went and washed, and I received sight. 12 Then said they unto him, Where is he? He said, I know not.

The blind man, thus miraculously cured, returns with much joy to his neighbours and acquaintance, who confer with him about this matter; they inquire, whether he was the person cured or not? who was the person that cured him, and where he was? He assures them, he was the very person that was blind, now cured; and he that cured him was Jesus; that the means used was clay and spittle; but where the person was, or what was become of him, he knew not. Learn thence, 1. That the miraculous cures of God work a sensible alteration in men, not only in their own apprehension, but in the judgments of others. This miracle shined forth among the neighbours, who, having seen and observed the blind man, admire his healing. 2. How frankly the blind man acknowledges, and how freely he confesses, that he was the person whom Jesus had healed, I am he. It is an unthankful silence to smother the works of God in an affected secrecy; to make God a loser by his bounty towards us, is a shameful injustice. O God! we are not worthy of thy common favours, much less of spiritual blessings, if we do not publish thy mercies on the housetop, and praise thee for them in the great congregation!

13 ¶ They brought to the Pharisees him that sometime was blind. 14 And it was the sabbath-day when Jesus made the clay, and opened his eyes. 15 Then again the Pharisees also asked him how he had received his sight. He said unto them, he put clay upon mine eyes, and I washed, and do see. 16 Therefore said some of the Pharisees, This man is not of God, because he keepeth not the sabbath day. Others said, How can a man that is a sinner do such miracles? And there was a division among them.

Note here, 1. How the Jews who should have been full of silent wonder, and inclined to believe in Jesus Christ, so omnipotent an agent, are prejudiced against him, and bring the late blind man before the Pharisees, our Saviour's professed enemies. 2. The time which our Saviour chose for working this cure, it was on the Sabbath; many, if not most of Christ's famous miracles, were wrought upon the sabbath-day. Upon that day he cured the withered hand, Matt. xii. Upon that day he cured the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda, John v. Upon that day he cured the blind man here. This Christ did, probably, for two reasons: 1. To confirm his doctrine which he preached on that day, by miracles; therefore his preaching and working miracles went together: 2. To instruct the Jews (had they been willing to receive instruction in the true doctrine and proper duties of their sabbath; and to let them know, that works of necessity and mercy are very consistent with the due sanctification of the sabbath. It is hard to find out any time wherein charity is unseasonable; for it is as the best of graces, so the works of it are the fittest for the best of days.

17 They say unto the blind man again, What sayest thou of him, that he hath opened thine eyes? He said, He is a prophet. 18 But the Jews did not believe concerning him that he was born blind, and received his sight, until they called the parents of him that had received his sight. 19 And they asked them, saying, Is this your son who ye say was born blind? how then doth he now see? 20 His parents answered them, and said, We know that this is our son, and that he was born blind: 21 But by what means he now seeth, we know not? or who hath opened his eyes, we know not: he is of age, ask him, he shall speak for himself. 22 These words spake his parents, because they feared the Jews: for the Jews had agreed already, that if any man did confess that he was Christ, that they should be put out of the synagogue. 23 Therefore said his parents, He is of age, ask him.

Observe here, 1. How desirous the Pharisees were to obscure the glory of this famous miracle which Christ had wrought: In order to which, 1. They re-examine the man, to know what his thoughts were of the person who had done this for him. They judged him to be an impostor and a great sinner; the man declares freely, That he believed him to be a great prophet. Hence we learn That there may be, and sometimes is, more true knowledge of Jesus Christ in one poor man, than in a general council of learned Rabbies. This blind man saw Christ to be a prophet, when the Jewish sanhedrim saw nothing in him but imposture. This man is not of God, says the council: Verily he is a prophet, says the blind man. 2. They next examine his parents (being unwilling to believe the man himself,) Whether he was their son, or not? If so, whether he were born blind? And if born blind, by what means he now sees? Lord! what obstinate and wilful blindness was found in these Pharisees? How do they close their eyes and say, We will not see? What endeavours are here used to smother a miracle, which undeniably proved Christ to be the expected Messiah? They examine first the man, then his parents, then the man again; hoping, that being overawed with fear, they would either deny, or at least conceal the truth; but the more they strove to darken and obscure the truth, the more conspicuous and evident they made it. Great is truth, and will prevail, how many soever oppose it, and set themselves against it. Observe next, the wisdom and cautiousness of his parents answer: they expressly own, that the blind man was their son; that he was born blind; but for the way of his cure they wave that, possibly because they did not see this cure wrought; and fearing the sentence of excommunication, a degree passed among the rulers, That whoso confesseth Christ, shall be put out of the synagoge. Hence learn, 1. That excommunication, or separation from the society of the people of God, is an ancient and honourable ordinance in the church of God, and, as such, to be revered and esteemed. 2. That this ordinance of God has been, and may be abused by wicked men, and the edge of it turned against Christ himself, and his sincerest members. 3. That the fear of unjust excommunication must not discourage persons from confessing the truth, when called to it. The parents of the blind man durst not confess Christ, for fear that they should be put out of the synagoge.

24 Then again called they the man that was blind, and said unto him, Give God the praise: we know that this man is a sinner. 25 He answered and said, Whether he be a sinner, or no, I know not: one thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see. 26 Then said they to him again, What did he do to thee? how opened he thine eyes? 27 He answered them, I have told you already and ye did not hear: wherefore would ye hear it again? will ye also be his disciples? 28 Then they reviled him, and said, Thou art his disciple, but we are Moses' disciples. 29 We know that God spake unto Moses: as for this fellow, we know not whence he is.

Here we have an account of the Pharisees farther practising upon this blind man, to rob Christ of the glory of this miracle; first they insinuate with him, and then they frown upon him: First, they insinuate with him, saying, Give God the praise: As if they had said, "Ascribe the cure to God, not to this man," whom they conclude to be a sinner, because he broke (as they thought) the sabbath. It is no new thing to see men pretend to aim at the glory of God, when at the same time they are maliciously opposing Christ, and persecuting his members. Next, they attempted to srown this poor man into a denial of this miracle wrought upon him, or to persuade the people that it was a cheat; but it is wonderful to observe how the boldness and confidence of this poor man increased, God giving him that wisdom and courage which all his adversaries were not able to resist or gainsay. Therefore the Pharisees being angry at this boldness of the man, they revile him for being so silly, as to become a disciple to Christ, whose office and authority they knew not; where as they were the disciples of Moses, whom they knew God spake to. Learn, That such as are led by malice, and prepossessed with prejudice against Christ, will not only think basely of his person, but refuse to see the clearest evidences of the authority and commission. As for this fellow, say the malicious Pharisees, we know not whence he is, or who gave him this commission.

30 The man answered and said unto them, Why herein is a marvellous thing, that ye know not from whence he is, and yet he hath opened mine eyes. 31 Now ye know that God heareth not sinners: but if any man be a worshipper of God, and doth his will, him he heareth. 32 Since the world began was it not heard that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind. 33 If this man were not of God, he could do nothing.

In these verses the blind man proceeds to vindicate our blessed Saviour, who had cured him of his blindness; from the exceptions of the Pharisees, and endeavours, by solid arguments, to convince them, that his cure (being born blind) was truly miraculous; and consequently proved Christ to be of God. 1. The man admires that Christ having wrought such a miracle upon him, they should be ignorant of his authority; This is marvellous, that ye know not from whence he is, and yet he hath opened mine eyes. He lays down a general proposition, that no deceiver or false teacher is heard of God, or enabled by him to work such miracles as these, but only such faithful servants as do his will, are thus extraordinarily assisted by him. We know that God heareth not sinners; that is, such as love and delight in sin, God will not hear such, or answer the prayers of such. Indeed God sometimes hears a sinners prayer in wrath and refuses to hear a saints prayer in mercy; but he never denies a saint's prayer in wrath, or hears a sinners prayer in mercy. The proposition laid down is an eternal truth; God beareth not sinners; that is, so long as they purpose to continue sinners, and go on in a course of sin, and remain bold and presumptuous sinners. Learn thence, That none that live in a course of sin, can reasonably expect that God should hear them, and give in an answer of prayer to them. God heareth not sinners: but if any man be a worshipper of God, and doth his will, him he heareth; that is, if a man feareth God, and worketh righteousness, him the Lord accepteth, heareth, and answereth. Learn hence, That such as would be heard of God, and accepted with him, must be devout worshippers of him. 2 That it is not enough to prove men religious and acceptable with God, that they are devout worshippers of him, unless they walk walk in obedience to him, and to do his will: If any man be a worshipper of God, and doth his will, him he heareth. Note, 3. How the blind man goes on to prove, that Christ had a special authority from God, and an extraordinary presence of God with him in what he did, because he had done such a work as was never done by Moses, or by any of the prophets, or by any person whatsoever, since the creation of the world. From whence he wisely, and well infers, that Christ was a person authorized by and sent of God. Learn hence, 1. That Christ having done that which was never done before, (namely, to give sight to one that was born blind) was an evidence of his omnipotency. 2. That this act of omnipotency proved him to be God. Whatever miracles the prophets wrought, they wrought them by Christ's power, but Christ wrought this and all other miracles by his own power. Lastly, How this blind man, though unlearned, judges more rightly of divine things, than the whole learned council of the sanhedrim. Whence we learn, That we are not always to be led by the authority of councils, popes, or bishops; and that it is not absurd for laymen sometimes to vary from their opinions; these overseers being sometimes guilty of great oversight. Dr. Whitby.

34 They answered and said unto him, Thou wast altogether born in sins, and dost thou teach us? and they cast him out. 35 Jesus heard that they had cast him out; and when he had found him, he said unto him, Dost thou believe on the Son of God? 36 He answered and said, Who is he, Lord, that I might believe on him? 37 And Jesus said unto him, Thou hast both seen him, and it is he that talketh with thee. 38 And he said, Lord, I believe. And he worshipped him.

Observe here, 1. A special instance of Pharisaical pride: they account this poor man a vile person, whom heaven had marked by his native blindness for some extraordinary wickedness. How prone are we to judge them the greatest sinners, whom we observe to be the greatest sufferers? 2. From reviling they proceed to excommunicating; They cast him out; that is, out of the communion of the Jewish church. O happy man, who having lost a synagogue has found a heaven! Behold this blind man, and admire him for a resolute confessor, stoutly defending the gracious author of his cure, against the cavils of the Pharisees, and maintaining the innocence and honour of so blessed a benefactor. Our Saviour's regard to this blind man, whom the Pharisees had set at naught and excommunicated; He finds him out, reveals himself more fully to him, and directs him to believe in him. Where note, That the miracle which Christ had wrought upon the blind man, did not convert him, and work faith in him, till Christ revealed himself unto him and enabled him to discern the truth of what he revealed. Learn hence, That miracles confirm faith, but miracles alone cannot work faith. The blind man had experienced a miracle wrought upon him, yet remains an unbeliever, till Christ said, I am he. Observe, 4. How readily the man receives the Lord Jesus Christ by faith, upon the forementioned revelation of himself unto him: He instantly said, Lord I believe; and in testimony thereof, worships him; that is, as God incarnate, as God manifested in the flesh. Thence learn, That true knowledge of the Son of God will beget faith in him; and true faith in him will be productive of homage and adoration, of obedience and subjection to him. He that knows Christ aright, will believe, and he that believes, will worship and obey: He said, Lord, I believe. And he worshipped him.

39 ¶ And Jesus said, For judgment I am come into this world: that they which see not, might see; and that they which see, might be blind.

In these words our Saviour declares not the intentional design, but the accidental event of his coming into the world: namely, 1. That those who were blind might receive sight. 2. That those who presume they see and know more than others, for despising the gospel, and shutting their eyes against the light of it, should be left in darkness, and by the just judgment of God be more and more blinded. Those who shut their eyes wilfully against the clear light, and say they will not see it is just with God to close their eyes judicially, and say they shall not see.

40 And some of the Pharisees which were with him heard these words, And said unto him, Are we blind also? 41 Jesus said unto them, If ye were blind, ye should have no sin: but now ye say, We see; therefore your sin remaineth.

Note here, 1. How the Pharisees, who watched all opportunities to ensnare our Saviour, look upon these last words as reflecting upon them: as if Christ did insinuate that they were blind: Are we blind also? They that shut their eyes, and will not see the light which Christ offers to them, are the worst of blind ones. 2. Our Saviour's reply to the Pharisees' question: If ye were blind, that is, simply ignorant of your duty, and without the means of knowledge and instruction, you should have no sin; that is, comparatively to what you have: you should not have had so much sin and guilt upon you as you now have, by shutting your eyes against the light. But now ye say, We see: that is, being puffed up with the knowledge which you have, as if ye were the only men that saw: this proud conceit of yours renders your condition incurable and your sin remaineth unpardonable. Learn hence, 1. That it is a far greater sin to condemn the known laws of God, than to be ignorant of them; pride is a greater hindrance of knowledge than ignorance, because the proud man thinks he wants no knowledge. 2. That the most exalted knowledge is insufficient to salvation, without a suitable and correspondent practice. The Pharisees had the key of knowledge at their girdle, yet our Saviour tells them of double damnation. Lord, how sad is it to know Christ in this world, as that he will be ashamed to know us in another world!

C H A P. X.

VERILY, verily, I say unto you, He that entereth not by the door into the sheep-fold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber.

a robber. 2 But he that entereth in by the door, is the shepherd of the sheep. 3 To him the porter openeth; and the sheep hear his voice: and he calleth his own sheep by name, and leadeth them out. 4 And when he putteth forth his own sheep, he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him: for they know his voice. 5 And a stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him: for they know not the voice of strangers. 6 This parable spake Jesus unto them: but they understood not what things they were which he spake unto them.

Our blessed Saviour having, in the end of the foregoing chapter upbraided the Pharisees for their blindness and ignorance in the mysteries of religion, notwithstanding the high conceit which they had of their own knowledge; he proceeds in this chapter farther to convince them, that they were blind leaders of the blind, though they thought and looked upon themselves as the only guides and teachers of the people. And in order thereunto, he propounds a parable of the true and false shepherd, which represents a good and bad pastor and teacher, and gives us a fourfold mark and character of a good shepherd. Observe, 1. The good shepherd enters in by the door: that is, he has his vocation and mission from Christ: he comes into the church regularly, in a right and approved way and manner; not by any clandestine methods, or indirect means. To him the porter openeth: that is, the holy Spirit, who openeth the hearts of men to receive Jesus Christ and the doctrine of the gospel which the faithful shepherds deliver in his name, and by authority received from him. Learn hence, That all faithful pastors have a lawful call to the work of the ministry: They enter by the right door, and execute their trust in a right manner, but such as, without a call from God unwarrantably thrust themselves into the ministry, are no better, nor no other, than thieves and robbers, in God's account. 2. Another property of a good shepherd is this, That he calleth his sheep by their names. This importeth three things: (1.) A special love that he bears to them. (2.) A special care he has over them. (3.) A particular acquaintance with them, that he may know how to apply himself suitably to them; which, though it be eminently verified in Christ, yet it is the duty of every faithful pastor and under-shepherd, in his measure, to labour after. 3. The good shepherd leadeth out his sheep into good pastures. that is, he feedeth them with sound doctrine; nourishes them with the word of life. Whereas the hireling or false shepherd, whatever he may do for his own sake, he has no regard to Jesus Christ, to the honour of his person to the edification of his church, or the salvation of souls; but his design is to raise and enrich himself; and so he may compass that, he cares not how many souls perish through his neglect. 4. The last property of the good shepherd here mentioned, is this, That he goeth before his sheep, as the shepherd doth before his flock; namely by a holy life and unblameable conversation: He treads out those steps before the people, which they take in their way towards heaven. And the sheep follow him, and are guided by him. He leadeth out his sheep, and goeth before them, &c.

7 Then said Jesus unto them again, Verily, verily, I say unto you, I am the door of the sheep. 8 All that ever came before me are thieves and robbers: but the sheep did not hear them. 9 I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture. 10 The thief cometh not but for to steal, and to kill and to destroy: I am come, that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly.

Observe here, 1. The character which Christ gives of himself, I am the door of the sheep; that is, the only way and means by which sinners have access to God, and can obtain salvation; the only door by which sinners are entered into the kingdom of grace, and admitted into the kingdom of glory. Learn hence, That there is no possible way of access to God for fallen man, but by Jesus Christ. As there is no way of entering the house, but by the door, and those that so enter are safe; in like manner, such as come unto God through Jesus Christ; in the way of faith and holy obedience, shall be put into a secure condition, and at last obtain eternal salvation. 2. The end and design of Christ in coming into the world asserted and declared by himself; I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly. But had not this people spiritual life before he came into the world? Yes, he gave life to his people, before his coming; in a measure sufficient to supply their necessity; but since his coming he gives it in such a superabounding measure, as may testify his divine bounty; they shall not barely live, but live abundantly; that is, their spiritual life shall abound through the upholding, strengthening, quickening, and comforting presence of his holy Spirit; for having conveyed spiritual life unto his people in their regeneration and conversion, he will cause it to increase more and more in their sanctification, until it arrive to a complete perfection in their glorification. Lastly, the character which our Saviour gives of the scribes and Pharisees in general, and of those false Christ's and false prophets which went before him in particular, he styles them thieves and robbers; All that ever came before me, were thieves and robbers. He doth not say, All that were sent before me, but all that came before me were thieves and robbers. So that Christ doth not speak this of the true prophets, who were sent by God before him, but of the false Christs and false prophets, that came of themselves, without any commission from God. The meaning is, all persons that came before me, pretending to be what I am, the true Messiah, as did Theudas and Judas of Galilee, &c. they were thieves and robbers; that is, they only sought their own advantage, while they deceived and ruined you. Learn hence, That whoever took upon them the office and person of the Messiah before Christ, or whosoever have since usurped a lawful calling in his church, without his commission, they are in Christ's account no better than murderers, thieves, and robbers, and they ought to be so in the people's esteem. The sheep did not hear them.

11 I am the good shepherd. The good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep. 12 But he that is a hireling, hireling, and not the shepherd, whose own the sheep are not, seeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep and fleeth; and the wolf catcheth them, and scattereth the sheep. 13 The hireling fleeth, because he is an hireling and careth not for the sheep. 14 I am the good shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of mine. 15 As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father: and I lay down my life for the sheep.

In these verses our Saviour evidently proves himself to be the true shepherd of his church, by the marks and signs, by the properties and characters of a good shepherd; which were eminently found with him; namely, to know all his flock, to take care of them; and to lay down his life for them. 1. Jesus Christ, the great shepherd of his church, hath an exact and distinct knowledge of his flock; I know my sheep, with a three fold knowledge, and with a knowledge of intelligence and observation; he knows them so as to observe and take notice of them with a knowledge of approbation and acceptation; knows them so as to approve and own them, with a knowledge of care and protection: he knows them so as to defend and keep them. Thus Christ knows his sheep, and is also known of them; that is, he is believed on, beloved, and obeyed by them. 2. He lays down his life for his flock. And for this doth he eminently deserve the title of the great shepherd. (As for his power, he is styled the great shepherd.) A good shepherd indeed, who not only gives life for his sheep, but gives his own life by way of ransom for his sheep! This example of Christ, the great and good shepherd, in laying down his life for his sheep, teacheth all subordinate and inferior shepherds, to prefer the good of their flock, even before their own lives.

16 And other sheep I have which are not of this fold: them also must I bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd.

Here Christ proves himself to be the true shepherd of his church from another property of a good shepherd, which is to take care for increasing and enlarging of his fold, by bringing in the Gentiles to it; and by breaking down the partition wall, to make one church of both Jews and Gentiles. Christ calls the Gentiles his other sheep, by way of anticipation, because shortly they were to be so, and united together with the believing Jews, into one sheepfold; and whereas he says, he must bring these sheep in, we are to understand it not of a necessity of co-action, but of a necessity of compact; it being a federal agreement betwixt the Father and himself, that both Jews and Gentile should be one flock; inclosed in one fold, and presented to his Father as a glorious church. Hence learn, How endearing our obligations are to the dearest Jesus, that he should account us Gentiles, who were afar-off, his sheep, (we being so in respect of his eternal purpose) and make it his care, and esteem it his charge, to call us home, and bring us into his fold the church, that we might be saved amongst the remnants of the true Israelites. Other sheep I have, &c.

17 Therefore doth my Father love me, because

I lay down my life that I might take it again. 18 No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of my Father, Hence note, 1. That Jesus Christ certainly foreknew his own death and resurrection. 2. That Christ was a volunteer in dying, He laid down his life, none could have taken it from him. It is true, his death was a violent death, but a voluntary sacrifice; he died violently, but yet voluntarily: The hand of his enemies could never hurt him without his own consent. 3. That as Christ died voluntarily with respect to himself, so in a way of subjection to his Father's command. This commandment have I received from my Father. 4. That this voluntary submission of Christ to die for us, was the ground of his Father's love to him. Therefore doth my Father love me: because I lay down my life. Although the Father hath many reasons to love the Son: yet none was stranger than this obedience of his to death, even the cursed death of the cross, for the redemption and salvation of lost sinners; therefore did the Father love him with a more exceeding love, because he laid down his life for his sheep.

19 ¶ There was a division therefore again among the Jews for these sayings, 20 And many of them said, He hath a devil, and is mad; why hear ye him? 21 Others said, These are not the words of him that hath a devil. Can a devil open the eyes of the blind?

Here the Evangelist shews what different effects this sermon of our Saviour had upon the Jews; many of them calumniate and slander him, as one possessed and mad, and therefore not to be heard and minded; others of calmer thoughts said, That the doctrine he taught, and the late miracle which he had wrought in curing the blind man, were abundantly sufficient to confute such a groundless slander. Learn, That the doctrine of Christ meeting with diversity of dispositions, it is no wonder that it occasions different effects, to the softening of some, and hardening of others; even as the same sun that melteth the wax, hardeneth the clay: yet is not this to be imputed to the doctrine of our Saviour, but to men's corruptions which oppose the truth, and the maintainers of it.

22 ¶ And it was at Jerusalem the feast of the dedication, and it was winter.

This feast was not of divine, but human institution; it was appointed by Judas Maccabeus and continued eight days, as an anniversary commemoration for the repairing of the temple. Now our Saviour was so far from reproving the Jews for observing this feast, which was of human institution, that he graced the solemnity with his own presence. Hence note, That our Saviour held communion with the Jewish Church, and did, without scruple, conform himself to the observation of their rites and customs, although they were not originally of divine institution. 2. That such a christian as does peaceably comply with the practice of the church in whose communion he lives, in the observation of those different rites and customs, which are used by her, act most agreeably to our Saviour's practice and example. Who can with any shew of reason censure christians for observing the feast of the nativity, who see Christ himself observing the feast of dedication? Certainly no person of sober principles ever questioned, but that ecclesiastical rulers and civil magistrates have a power to appoint public days of thanksgiving yearly, for the commemoration of mercies, which ought never to be forgotten. From our Saviour's presence at this feast, Grotius well notes, That festival days, in memorial of public blessings, may piously be instituted by persons in authority, without a divine command.

23 And Jesus walked in the temple in Solomon's porch. 24 Then came the Jews round about him, and said unto him, how long dost thou make us to doubt? If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly. 25: Jesus answered them, I told you, and ye believed not. The works that I do in my Father's name, they bear witness of me. 26 But ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep, as I said unto you.

In these verses we have recorded a new and fresh debate betwixt our Saviour and the Jews; and therein we have observable, 1. The time of this debate, ver. 22. It was at the feast of dedication, in the winter, our Saviour taking that opportunity to publish his doctrine, when a concourse of people were gathered together at that solemnity. 2. The place of this debate, was in Solomon's porch. Although the temple and porch built by Solomon were destroyed by the Babylonians: yet when the temple was re-built, there was a porch like it, which retained the ancient name. 3. The debate itself: If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly. Not that they affected the knowledge of the truth, but only designed to ensnare him; for if he had affirmed himself to be the Messiah, he had brought himself in danger of the Roman governor; because the Jews expected the Messiah to be a temporal prince, that should deliver them from the Roman power. Now if Christ had declared himself such a Messiah as the Jews expected, it might have cost him his life. Therefore his hour being not yet come, he answers with his usual prudence and wariness to their ensnaring question. Learn hence, That Christ's enemies are full of subtle policies, and can turn themselves into all shapes, that, if possible, they may entrap and ensnare him; and accordingly, they pretend here great earnestness of desire to be satisfied, whether indeed he was the true and promised Messiah; when in truth they had another design. 4. The wisdom and caution of our Saviour's answer; he refers them to his miracles, The works that I do in my Father's name; they bear witness of me. Our Saviour's miraculous works were sufficient for the Jews to have grounded and bottomed their faith upon, and to have confirmed them in the belief that he was the promised and expected Messiah, had not prejudice, obstinacy, and malice blinded their eyes, that they could neither see nor consider. Lastly, How Christ points out to these Jews the true cause of their infidelity; which was not the obscurity of his doctrine, but their not being his sheep; that is, not as yet converted; they not having the properties of his sheep, which he sets down in the following verses. Learn hence, That men's final unbelief under the means of faith, is a clear evidence of their being in a lost and perishing condition. Infidelity is the sin that doth consign a man over to damnation; and to such as sit under the gospel, doth not only procure damnation, but no damnation like it.

27 My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me:

Here observe, 1. That all sincere and faithful christians are Christ's sheep, and he is their great and good shepherd. This relation implies tender affection, powerful protection, and plentiful provision. The tenderness of Christ's affection towards his sheep, appears by pitying their infirmities, by having a fellow-feeling with them in their sufferings, by suiting their temptations to the degrees of their graces. His care in providing for them appears, in affording to them the holy scriptures, the ministry of the word, the administration of the sacraments, and the operation of his holy Spirit to make all efficacious and effectual to them. His protection of them discovers itself, by preparing them for trials, by supporting them under them, and by delivering them out of them, and by sanctifying all to them, causing them to work together in suberviency to his own glory, and his people's good. 2. That Christ's sheep hear his voice, and answer the call of their great shepherd. They hear the voice of Christ speaking to them in the scriptures, in the ministry of the word, in their own consciences in providences; and they hear Christ's voice speaking to them, in and by his holy Spirit; and as they hear Christ's voice, so do they answer his call: now the right answer to the call of Christ in the gospel, is a present answer, a willing answer, and an abiding answer. 3. That all Christ's sheep do follow him their shepherd. They follow him, (1.) In his doctrine: And; (2.) In his example, in his contempt of the world, in his freedom in reproofing sin, in the holiness and heavenly mindedness of his conversation, in his meekness and patience, in charity and universal goodness, and as he was a mighty pattern of prayer. 4. That Christ the great and good shepherd knows all his sheep; My sheep hear my voice, and I know them. He knows them so as to distinguish them, so as to observe and take notice of them, so as to own and approve them, so as to take care of them, and provide for them. And as the Lord knoweth who are his, so he knoweth who are not his too; as he knows his sheep, so he knows the goats also, and their place will be at his left hand. My sheep hear my voice, and I know them.

28 And I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand. 29 My Father which gave them me, is greater than all; and none is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand.

Observe here, 1. The promise made by Christ unto his sheep, namely, the promise of eternal life, and perseverance in grace, till they come to the full fruition of it in glory; I give unto them eternal life, and none shall pluck them out of my my Father's hand. 2. The confirmation he gives of this from his own and his Father's power which is employed, engaged, and concerned for them, and for their perseverance and preservation, notwithstanding all opposition to the contrary; My Father which gave them me is greater than all; and no man is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand. Learn 1. That eternal life is the portion of Christ's sheep. 2. That eternal life is the gift of Christ. 3. That eternal life is now given to Christ's sheep: They have it now in the purchase, in the promise, and in the first fruits. 4. That all Christ's sheep are put by God the Father into Christ's hand for security: My Father hath given them me. 5. The Father doth so intrust Christ with his sheep, as yet to take care of them himself; they are in the Father's hand, as well as in the Son's, and their being in the hands of both, doth assure them of the certainty of their perseverance. None shall pluck them out of my hand; none shall be able to pluck them out of my Father's hand: implying, that there are many that would pluck them out of their hands, sin, Satan, the world, &c. but they shall be kept by the almighty power of God, through faith unto salvation: for who can be too strong for omnipotent power?

30 I and my Father are one.

That is, one in essence and nature, one in authority and power, and not barely one in will and affection, one in concord or consent. That this is the genuine signification of the word, appears by a three fold argument. 1. From the original words; it is not said, I and my Father are (εἷς) one person in the masculine gender, but in the neuter (ὅ) I and my Father are one thing. Now, is that thing be not the divine Being, they cannot be one; for since the Father is confessed to be God, the Son cannot be one thing with the Father, if he be not God too. 2. It appears from the context; our Saviour, in the preceding verses, ascribed the preservation of his sheep to the power of his Father: None can pluck them out of my Father's hand: and he ascribes it also to his own power: None shall pluck them out of my hand: plainly intimating, that his sheep were equally safe in his own hand, as well as in his Father's; for says he, I and my Father are one; that is, one in power; and, if they be one in power, they must be one in nature; unless we make an almighty creature, which is a contradiction. 3. It appears evidently by what follows in the next verse, that the Jews understood our Saviour in this sense; why else did they take up stones to stone him? We stone thee, say they, for blasphemy, because thou, being a man, makest thyself God. The Jews took our Saviour's meaning aright, and were satisfied, that when he said, I and my Father are one, he asserted himself to be God, and deserved to die; and well he had deserved it, if he had not been God. The adversaries of our Saviour's divinity, to elude the force of these words, which make so much against them, interpret the words thus, I and my Father are one; that is, say they, we are, (αὐτὸ ἐσόμεν) one in will and affection, one in concord and consent: This is a truth, but not the great truth contained in these words; for the believers are one with God, and one with one another; namely, by a harmony of wills and desires, so far as they are regenerated, God's will and theirs are unison, they will and desire the same thing, and are of one heart and one mind. But God and Christ are one, in a much higher sense than Christ and believers are one; namely, one in essence and nature, one in authority and power, Christ being consubstantial with God: Learn hence, That the Lord Jesus Christ is for nature coessential, for dignity coequal, and for duration coeternal with the Father. 2. That although Christ be one in essence with the Father; yet are they distinct persons one from another; I and my Father, we are one. 3. That the Son being one in essence, one in power, one in consent and will with the Father, they are both equally concerned for the perseverance of the saints, for preserving them in grace, and for bringing them to glory. None shall pluck them out of mine or my Father's hand; for I and my Father are one. If the power be the same, the essence must be the same.

31 Then the Jews took up stones again to stone him. 32 Jesus answered them, Many good works have I shewed you from my father; for which of those works do ye stone me? 33 The Jews answered him, saying, For a good work we stone thee not; but for blasphemy, and because that thou, being a man, makest thyself God.

Note here; 1. How the Jews understood our Saviour affirming, that he and the Father are one; that is, one in essence and nature, and himself a person equal with God. This they looked upon as blasphemy in him, to arrogate to himself what is proper to God only. 2. That the Jews looked upon it as a piece of justice in them to stone Christ for this apprehended blasphemy: Then the Jews took up stones to stone him. According to the law of God; the blasphemer was stoned to death, but then he was first to be judicially tried and judged: But such was the furious zeal of these Jews, that in a tumultuous manner they attempt to stone him to death. Lord, how doth the fury of men, in opposing truth, outstrip the true zeal of thy faithful servants in defending truth! 3. With what meekness our Lord receives this horrid indignity of stoning (for it is probable that some stones were cast at him, he saying, For which of these works do ye stone me?) he clears his own innocence and expostulates with them for rewarding him evil for good: Many good works have I shewed you from my Father; that is, by my Father's authority and commission; I have been sight to the blind, feet to the lame, a tongue to the dumb, and hearing to the deaf; Do any of these works deserve such usage as stoning at your hands? Learn hence, That such was the perfect and spotless innocence of Christ in all his actions, that he durst, and did appeal to the consciences of his most inveterate adversaries: For which of these works do ye stone me?

34 Jesus answered them, Is it not written in your law, I said, Ye are gods? 35 If he called them gods, unto whom the word of God came, and the scripture cannot be broken; 36 Say ye of him whom the Father hath sanctified and sent into the world, Thou blasphemest; because I said, I am the Son of God?

Here our Saviour by a two-fold argument vindicates himself from the imputation of blasphemy, in asserting himself to be God. 1. Because the Old Testament gave to magistrates and judges the title of gods, as Psal. lxxxii. 6: I have said, Ye are Gods, Now Christ argues strongly from the less to the greater, thus: "If judges and magistrates may be called Gods, because they are commissioned by him, and derive their authority from him, how much more is that title due to me, who was sanctified, separated and ordained for Mediator, and appointed to the work of redemption, before I came into the world, and consequently was God from all eternity?" This place the Socinians (those professed adversaries of our Saviour's Godhead) produce to prove, that Christ was not God by nature, but only in respect of his sanctification and mission. It is a certain truth that he that was sanctified and sent, was the Son of God; but he was not therefore the Son of God, because sanctified and sent. His sanctification was not the ground of his Sonship; but his Sonship was the cause of his sanctification. Christ was not therefore God's Son, because he was sanctified and sent; but he was therefore sanctified and sent, because he was his Son. He was a Son before he was sent, even from eternity, otherwise it must have been said, that God sent him to be his Son, and not that God sent his Son. This supposes him before he was sent, to have been actually his Son, as certainly he was before, from before the foundations of the world. Prov. viii. 23. I was set up from ever lasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was.

37 If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. 38 But if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works; that ye may know and believe that the Father is in me, and I in him.

Here we have a second argument, by which our Saviour proves, that it was no blasphemy to call himself God; but that he was God in very deed; namely, argument taken from his works: If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not: And the argument runs thus: If (says Christ) I do those miraculous works, which no power less than a divine power can effect, then you ought by these works to be led to believe and acknowledge, that I am truly and really God; but the works which I do, are the effect and product of an omnipotent power, therefore you ought to believe, that I am one in essence with the Father, there being a mutual in-existence of one person in the other, so that the Father is in me, and I in him: And thus I and the Father are one. Learn hence, That Christ never required of his disciples and followers an implicit faith, or a blind obedience; but as he submitted his doctrine to the trial of reason, so he submitted his miracles to the examination and judgment of sense: Therefore he says, If I do not the works of my Father, that is, divine works, believe me not to be a divine person.

39 Therefore they sought again to take him; but he escaped out of their hand, 40 And went away again beyond Jordan, into the place where John at first baptized: and there he abode. 41 And many resorted unto him, and said, John did no miracle: but all things that John spake of this man were true. 42 And many believed on him there.

Note here, 1. The violence and fury of these unbelieving Jews, against the holy and innocent Jesus! They sought again to take him. 2. The prudential care of Christ for his own preservation; his time being not yet come, he withdraws from Jerusalem, the nest of his enemies, and goes beyond Jordan: when Christ was persecuted in one city, he fled to another; he has sanctified a state of persecution to his ministers and members, and by his own being in it. It is no disgrace for any of them to fly, when their Captain did it, and bids them do it, saying, When they persecute you in one city, flee unto another. 3. The success of Christ's ministry beyond Jordan: Many resorted to him, and believed on him. This place about Jordan was the place where John had exercised a great part of his ministry; and now, many years after John's death, the fruit of his ministry appears; for many believed on him there; that is, about Jordan, where John had preached and baptized. Learn hence, That the labours of faithful ministers may seem to be lost, and be long like seed under the ground, and yet at last, by some new watering, may spring up, and the fruit appear in abundance. Here John's ministry about Jordan hath fresh fruit upon Christ's coming, long after John was dead. 4. The dignity of Christ above John, John did no miracle; but Christ did all. The wisdom of God so ordered it, that though the Old Testament prophets, Elijah and Elisha, wrought many miracles for the confirmation of their divine mission, yet John the Baptist coming immediately before Christ, as his messenger and forerunner, wrought none, for these three reasons probably, 1. That so the glory of Christ in working miracles when he came upon the stage of his ministry, might be the more clear and evident. 2. That the evidence of Christ being the Messiah might be the more clear, by the miracles which he wrought. 3. That the minds of the people might not be divided and distracted between John and Christ, and that there might be no pretence or competition between them: Therefore John did no miracles; but all things, &c.

CHAP. XI.

NOW a certain man was sick named Lazarus, of Bethany, the town of Mary and her sister Martha. 2 It was that Mary which anointed the Lord with ointment, and wiped his feet with her hair, whose brother Lazarus was sick. 3 Therefore his sisters sent unto him, saying, Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest is sick. 4 When Jesus heard that, he said, This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby.

This chapter relates unto us the miraculous power of Christ, in raising of dead Lazarus, which, as it was one of his last, so was it one of the greatest miracles which he wrought; and yet we find none of the Evangelists make mention mention of it, but only St. John: The reason is supposed to be this, because when the other Evangelists wrote their history. Lazarus was then alive; (for Epiphanius says he lived thirty years after he was raised by Christ) and probably, the mention of this relation might have brought Lazarus into danger and trouble; but Sir John wrote his gospel after Lazarus's death. This miracle was a sufficient demonstration of Christ's Godhead: None but an Almighty power could recal a man four days dead from a settled corruption to a state of life. None but he that created Lazarus, could thus make him anew. Here note 1. The tender sympathy of these two endeared sisters with their afflicted brother; they feel his sorrows and acquaint their Saviour with his sufferings: Lord! behold he whom thou lovest is sick. They do not say, Our brother that loves thee is sick; he whom thou lovest is sick: Thereby pleading not the merit of Lazarus, but the merit of Christ. For how can the love of Christ, which is infinite and eternal, have any cause but itself? Note, The person whom Christ loved is sick, and dies. Learn thence, That strength of grace, and dearness of respect, even from Christ himself, cannot prevail either against death or against diseases. Lazarus, whom Christ loved is sick. Note 2. The gracious answer which Christ sent to the sister's message; this sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God: that is, this sickness shall not bring upon him such a death as he shall remain under the power of, to the general resurrection; but is only designed to give me an opportunity of glorifying God, by exerting my miraculous power in restoring him to life. Learn hence, 1. That as God's own glory is his supreme aim and end in all his actions, so in particular it is designed by him in sending afflictions upon his people, to glorify his power and wisdom, mercy and love, in and upon them. The saints sicknesses are all for the glory of God. 2. That God is glorified when his Son is glorified: as none do honour the Father; who do not honour the Son; so the Father accounts himself glorified, when the glory of the Son is advanced. This sickness is for, &c.

5 Now Jesus loved Martha, and her sister and Lazarus. 6 When he had heard therefore that he was sick, he abode two days still in the same place where he was. 7 Then after that saith he to his disciples, Let us go into Judea again. 8 His disciples say unto him, Master, the Jews of late sought to stone thee; and goest thou thither again? 9 Jesus answered, Are there not twelve hours in the day? If any man walk in the day he stumbleth not, because he seeth the light of this world. 10 But if a man walk in the night he stumbleth, because there is no light in him.

Note 1. What an happy, because an holy and religious family was here, and much honoured by Christ; Jesus loved Martha, Mary and Lazarus; wherever true piety dwells, it draws the eye and heart of Christ towards it. Christ had frequently and familiarly lodged under their roof, and he rewarded them for their entertainment with his love. — Jesus loved Martha, and her sister. Where remark, That Martha is here named first, though elsewhere Mary had the precedency, to shew, no doubt, that they were both equally dear to Christ. 2. That although Christ loved Lazarus, yet he seems to neglect him, he delays going to him for some days: But could Christ absent himself from one so long, whom he loved so well? We find he did. Let us take heed then, that we do not misinterpret Christ's delays. He seldom comes at our time, but never stays beyond his own; our Saviour had a double end in staying thus long; namely, for greatening of the miracle, and confirming their faith. Had Christ gone before Lazarus was dead, they might have attributed his recovery rather to the strength of nature, than to Christ's miraculous power; or had Christ raised Lazarus as soon as he was dead, they might peradventure have thought it rather some trance or ecstasy, than a death and dissolution; therefore Christ stays so many days, that God might be the more glorified, and his own omnipotent power the more magnified. We learn then, That when Christ delays to help them whom he dearly loves, it is always for wise ends and holy purposes. 3. How the disciples, though they were dearly affected to Lazarus, (for they had learned to love where their Master loved,) yet they discourage Christ from going to him into Judea, for fear of violence offered to him, Master, the Jews of late sought to stone thee, and goest thou thither again? Here the disciples pleaded for their Master's safety, at the same time aiming at their own; they were to go with him into Judea, and they well knew, that their danger was inwrapped in his, therefore they seek to divert him from his intention. O how has the fear of suffering made many of the friends of Christ decline an opportunity of glorifying God, and doing good to others! But cannot God give safety in the midst of danger, if he pleaseth? Let us then not chuse our way, according to our own apprehension, either of danger or safety; but as we see God going before us, if our call be clear, let us go on with courage, whatever difficulties lie in our way. 4. How our Saviour corrects these fears of his disciples, by acquainting them with his call from God, to undertake this journey into Judea. Are there not twelve hours in the day? If a man walk therein he stumbleth not: but in the night he stumbleth. As if Christ had said, "As he that walks in the day is in no danger of stumbling, but in the night he is in danger; so long as I have a call from God, and my working time lasts, there is a divine providence that will watch over me, and secure me from all danger; now my day is not fully spent, and therefore it is not in the power of mine enemies to precipitate my passion, or to bring the night of sufferings upon me before the appointed time; but ere long the night will come on, the working time will be over, and then shall both I and you stumble upon death; but while the day lasteth we are safe." Learn hence, 1. Every man has his twelve hours, that is, his working time assigned him by God in this world. 2. Whilst these hours are not spent, and whilst his working time is unexpired, he shall not stumble, he shall not die, he shall not be disabled from working, while God has any work for him to do; neither the malice of men, nor the rage of devils shall take him off till his work be finished. 3. Every man has his night as well as his day, in which he must expect and prepare to stumble stumble; that is to fall by death; for when God has done his work by us and with us, he will withdraw his protection from us, but not his care over us. We stumble upon death, and fall into the grave; but God receives us to himself, and at the end of our working season rewards us for our work.

11 These things said he; and after that he saith unto them, Our friend Lazarus sleepeth; but I go that I may awake him out of sleep.

Note here, 1. Our Saviour, coming near to Bethany, tells his disciples that Lazarus sleepeth; that is, plainly, he was dead. This shewed his omniscience, and that he was truly God: for he had received no advice of his death from any person, but as God knew that he was deceased. 2. The sweet title given both to death and Lazarus; death is called a sleep, Lazarus is styled a friend: yet Christ says not my friend, but our friend Lazarus sleepeth; intimating that gracious familiarity and mutual friendship which was betwixt himself and all his members. Learn hence, 1. That all true believers are Christ's friends. 2. That the friends of Christ must die as well as others. 3. That their death is but a sleep, Our friend Lazarus sleepeth. It followeth, but I go, that I may awake him out of sleep. Note, Christ says not, We will go and awake him, but I will go and I will awake him. The disciples who were companions in the way, must not be partakers in the work; witness they may be, actors they cannot be; none can awaken Lazarus, but the Maker of Lazarus. Who can command the soul to come down and meet the body; and who can command the body to rise up and meet the soul, but that God that created both soul and body? Lord! It is our comfort against the dread and terror of death, that our resurrection depends upon thy almighty power; I will go, that I may awake him out of sleep.

12 Then said his disciples, Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well. 13 Howbeit Jesus spake of his death: but they thought that he had spoken of taking of rest in sleep. 14 Then said Jesus unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead. 15 And I am glad for your sakes that I was not there, to the intent ye may believe: nevertheless, let us go unto him. 16 Then said Thomas which is called Didymus, unto his fellow disciples, Let us also go, that we may die with him.

Note here, 1. How desirous the disciples were that Christ should not go to Bethany where Lazarus was, Bethany being within two miles of Jerusalem, where the seat of our Saviour's enemies was. But our Lord knowing his call to be clear, resolves to go; Nevertheless, says Christ, let us go unto him. O love, stronger than death! the grave can not separate betwixt Christ and his friends: Other friends accompany us to the brink of the grave, and there they leave us to worms and dust; for death hath both horror and noisomeness to attend it: But for thee, O Saviour, the grave-stone, the earth, the coffin, are no bounders of thy dear respects. Blessed be God, that neither life nor death can separate from the love of Christ; but even after death, and burial he is graciously affected to those he loves.

Christ has a gracious regard to the dust of his saints: Though his holy ones see corruption, they shall not always lie under the power of corruption, their dead bodies are a part of the undoubted members of Christ's mystical body. Blessed be God, the time is coming, when Christ shall knock at the door of his children's graves, and call them up out of their bed of dust, and they shall hear the voice of the Son of God and live. 2. The wise and only design of Christ in delaying to go to Bethany till Lazarus was dead; namely, that he might at once raise Lazarus's dead body, and his disciples faith, confirming them in the belief that he was the Son of God, and the true Messiah. But could the faith of the apostles want confirmation, who had seen so many miracles wrought by our Saviour, and had lived under his ministry all the time of it? Yes, the faith of the most eminent saints, even of the apostles themselves, wants confirmation in this state of weakness and imperfection, and is capable of growth. I am glad for your sakes, that I was not there, to the intent ye may believe. 3. The great passion which Thomas expresses upon the notice given by Christ of Lazarus's death: Plainly, Lazarus is dead, says Christ; Let us go and die with him, says Thomas. Oh what passionate and impatient expressions do sometimes drop from our mouths, on occasion of the death of our dear relations! we are ready to be so affected with the death of our friends, as to wish ourselves out of the world that we might be with them. But we must remember, that it is God that appoints us our several posts, and particular stations, which we must keep, till the wisdom of God sees fit to remove us.

17 Then when Jesus came, he found that he had lain in the grave four days already. 18 (Now Bethany was nigh unto Jerusalem, about fifteen furlongs off.) 19 And many of the Jews came to Martha and Mary, to comfort them concerning their brother. 20 Then Martha, as soon as she heard that Jesus was coming, went and met him: but Mary sat still in the house. 21 Then said Martha unto Jesus, Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. 22 But I know that even now, whatsoever thou wilt ask of God, God will give it thee.

Observe here, 1. The length of time which Christ designedly delayed before he would come to Lazarus's grave; he was not above six miles off from Bethany, being within two miles of Jerusalem, and Jerusalem within four miles of Bethabara, where Christ now was, and yet our Saviour came not of four days; doubtless that the miracle of Lazarus's resurrection might be more conspicuous and remarkable. Christ could as easy have cured Lazarus being sick, as have raised him being dead, and as easily have raised him the first day, as the fourth day; but that had not carried along with it such a full conviction of Christ's almighty power. Therefore that he might draw the eyes of their faith more stedfastly to behold and admire his almighty power our Saviour defers his coming till Lazarus had been dead four days. 2. The civil usage of mourning with those that mourned for the dead: Anciently they mourned thirty days;

days, and sometimes forty for a dear relation, Num. xx. 29. During which time, neighbours and friends came to visit and relieve them in their sadness, with such consolatory arguments as they had. Christian religion doth not condemn natural affection: Human passions are not sinful, if not excessive; to be above the stroke of passions is a condition equal to angels; to be in a state of sorrow without the sense of sorrow, is a disposition beneath the beasts; but duly to regulate our sorrows, and set boundaries to our grief, is the wisdom, the duty, the interest, and the excellency of a christian. As to be above all passions will be our happiness in heaven, so to regulate and rectify our passions is a great part of our holiness on earth. Note, 3. Although Martha was a true mourner for the death of her brother, yet she doth not so far indulge to grief, but, upon the first notice of Christ's approach, she arises to go forth to meet him, with a mournful moan in her mouth; Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. Where note, How faith and infirmity were mixed together; faith appeared in that firm persuasion which she had of Christ's power, as if death durst not shew his face in Christ's presence. Hadst thou been here my brother had not died. But then her infirmity appeared in limiting Christ both to time and place; to place, If thou hadst been here: As if Christ could not (if he pleased) save his life, absent as well as present. Then to time, Now he stinketh: as if he had said, "You are come, but, alas! too late; you have staid too long, he is past recovery, the grave hath swallowed him up." As if death would not deliver up his prisoner at the command of Christ: Oh! the imperfect composition of the best of saints! what a mixture of faith and infirmity is found in the holiest and best of christians! This farther also appears in her next words, ver. 21. I know that whatsoever thou shalt ask of God he will give it thee: She seems not to believe that Christ was able to raise him by his own immediate power, but must obtain power of God to do it, as the prophets were wont to do that raised the dead. She thought Christ a person highly in God's favour, but scarce believed him able to raise Lazarus by his own power; had her faith extended to a belief that Christ was equal with the Father, and that the fulness of the Godhead dwelt in him, she would not have questioned his power to raise him from the grave; for though Christ as Mediator did apply himself by prayer to God at the raising of dead Lazarus, ver. 41, 42. yet as God, he had a power of himself to raise Lazarus, an almighty power communicated with his essence from the Father, by an eternal and ineffable generation.

23 Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall rise again. 24 Martha saith unto him, I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day. 25 Jesus saith unto her, I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; 26 And whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die. Believest thou this?

Here note, 1. Christ's meek answer to Martha's passionate discourse. He takes no notice of the forementioned failings but comforts her with a promise of her brother's resurrection: Thy brother shall rise again. Thence learn, That the knowledge and belief of the general resurrection, is and ought to be a sufficient support under the loss of our endeared friends, who die in the Lord. 2. That the doctrine of the general resurrection was no new doctrine; Job believed it, chap. xix. Daniel published it, chap. xii. 1. the Pharisees had a notion of it; but Martha here makes it an article of faith, I know he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day. 3. How Christ particularly instructs Martha in the cause of her resurrection, acquainting her, that he himself is the author and efficient cause of it; I am the resurrection and the life. That is, I am the author, and principal efficient cause of the resurrection; and this with respect to both natures: 1. His divine nature is the efficient cause of the resurrection: He shall raise our bodies out of the dust, by the power of the Godhead. 2. His human nature is the exemplary cause or pattern of the resurrection; for which reason Christ is called the first born from the dead. For though some were raised before him, yet was his resurrection the cause of their's. Hence St. Paul argues from Christ's resurrection, the certainty of his member's resurrection; Christ and believers are one mystical body, therefore is not Christ perfectly risen till all his members are risen with him. Indeed Christ's personal resurrection was perfect when he arose, and all believers arose representatively in him, yet till all believers arise personally, the resurrection of Christ has not received its utmost perfection, but there is somewhat behind of the resurrection of Christ. Most fitly then might our Saviour assert, I am the resurrection and the life. 4. That Christ not only asserts himself to be the resurrection, but also the life; I am the resurrection and the life; that is, I am the cause of life natural, spiritual, and eternal: And whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die; that is, eternally: though his body shall die because of sin, yet his spirit shall live because of righteousness.

27 She saith unto him, Yea, Lord: I believe that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world. 28 And when she had so said, she went her way, and called Mary her sister secretly, saying, The master is come, and calleth for thee. 29 As soon as she heard that, she arose quickly, and came unto him. 30 Now Jesus was not yet come into the town, but was in that place where Martha met him. 31 The Jews then which were with her in the house, and comforted her, when they saw Mary that she rose up hastily, and went out, followed her, saying, She goeth unto the grave to weep there. 32 Then when Mary was come where Jesus was, and saw him, she fell down at his feet, saying unto him, Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died.

Note here, 1. The full confession which Martha makes of her faith in Christ: Thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world. A confession which comes nearest to that of St. Peter (Matt. xvi. 16.) of any that we meet with in scripture: Nay, it seems more full than Peter's we meet with in scripture: Nay, it seems more full than Peter's confession; for those additional words, which should come into the world, are not in his confession; the sum is, she believed Christ to be the very Messiah, who was typified and prefigured, prophesied of, and promised to the Old Testament saints, as the person that in the fulness of time should come into the world for the redemption and salvation of it. Thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world. Hence learn, That Christ is never rightly believed in, nor regularly depended upon, for salvation, except he be owned and acknowledged to be the eternal Son of God. Martha was now fully persuaded of Christ's divine nature, of which the best of the disciples, till after our Saviour's resurrection, had but a faint and uncertain persuasion. 2. How earnest and intent our Saviour was to dispatch the errand he came upon; namely, to raise Lazarus from the grave, and to comfort the two mournful sisters: He would not so much as enter the house, till he had effected his work; and therefore he goes strait to the grave, which probably was the place where Mary met him: Lord! it was thy meat and drink to do the will of thy Father; it was thy meat and drink by day thy rest and repose by night. How unlike are we to thyself, if we suffer either our pleasures or our profit to divert us from our duty? 3. What haste and speed Mary makes to attend upon our Saviour? she arose quickly, and came unto him. Mary's love added wings to her motion.— The Jews observing her hasty motion, having a loving suspicion that she is gone to the grave to weep there; but their thoughts were too low; for whilst they supposed that she went to her dead brother, she was waiting for a living Saviour. And she that used to sit at Jesus's feet, now falls at his feet, with an awful veneration; the very gesture was supplicatory. And her humble prostration was seconded with a doleful lamentation, Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. Where note, A mixture of faith with human infirmity. Here was strength of faith in ascribing so much power to Christ, that his presence could preserve from death; but here was infirmity in supposing the necessity of Christ's presence for this purpose. Certainly he that did raise him from death, being present could have preserved him from dying, being absent, had he pleased. This was Mary's moan, Lord, hadst thou been here, my brother hadst not died; full of affection, but not free from frailty and infirmity; However, Christ takes no notice of her errors and infirmity, but all the reply we hear of is a compassionate groan, which the following verses acquaint us with.

33 When Jesus therefore saw her weeping, and the Jews also weeping which came with her, he groaned in the spirit, and was troubled, 34 And said, Where have ye laid him? They say unto him Lord, come and see, 35 Jesus wept. 36 Then said the Jews, Behold how he loved him! 37 And some of them said, Could not this man which opened the eyes of the blind, have caused that even this man should not have died?

Note here, 1. The condolency and tender sympathy expressed by our Saviour upon this occasion he groaned in his spirit, and was troubled: Or as the original has it, he troubled himself, intimating that our Saviour's passions were pure and holy, not like ours, muddy and mixed with sinful imperfection. The commotions of his affections, were like the shaking of pure water in a crystal glass, which still remains clear; and they arose and were calmed at his pleasure: he was not overpowered by them, but had them at his command. Learn hence, That as Christ took upon him the human nature, so he did assume also human affections, thereby evincing himself to be our brother and near kinsman, according to the flesh. (2.) That the passions and affections, which our Saviour had and expressed, were always holy and innocent; he was not without them, but he was above them; they did never violently and immoderately trouble him, but when he pleased he troubled himself. Jesus groaned in spirit, and troubled himself. Note, 2. How our Saviour manifests his condolency and tender sympathy with Martha and Mary, by his weeping, Jesus wept; partly for compassion, and partly for example; in compassion, first to humanity, to see how miserably sin had debased the human nature, and rendered man like unto the brute beasts that perish. Secondly, in compassion to Lazarus, whom he was now about to bring back into a sinful and troublesome world. Thus St. Jerom, Non flevis Christus lachrymus nostras &c. "Christ, says he, did not weep our tears; he mourned over Lazarus, not because dead, but because now to be brought again to life."— Again, Christ wept for our example, to fetch sighs and tears from us, at the sight of others' miseries, and especially at the funerals of our godly friends. Learn hence, That mourning and sorrow, and this expressed by tears and weeping, is an affection proper for those that go to funerals, provided it be decently kept within due bounds, and is not excessive: for immoderate sorrow is hurtful to the living, and dishonourable to the dead; neither is it an argument of more love, but an evidence of less grace. Note, 3. How the Jews observing Christ's sorrow for, admire his love to dead Lazarus: Behold, how he loved him! Christ's love to his people is admirable and soul amazing; such as see it may admire it, but can never fully comprehend it. 4. How some of the malicious Jews attempt to lessen the reputation of our Saviour, not willing to own him to be God, because he did not keep Lazarus from dying; as if Christ could not be the Son, because he did not at all times, and in all cases exert and put forth his divine power. Whereas Christ acted freely, and not necessarily, governing his actions by his own wisdom, as he saw most conducing to the ends and purposes of his own glory.

38 Jesus therefore again groaning in himself, cometh to the grave. (It was a cave, and a stone lay upon it. 39 Jesus said, Take ye away the stone. Martha, the sister of him that was dead, saith unto him, Lord, by this time he stinketh: for he hath been dead four days. 40 Jesus saith unto her, Said I not unto thee, that if thou wouldst believe, thou shouldst see the glory of God? 41 Then they took away the stone from the place where the dead was laid. And Jesus lifted up his eyes, and said, Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me. 43 And I knew that thou hearest me always: but because of the people which stand by I said it, that they may believe that thou hast sent me. 43 And when he had thus spoken, he cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth. 44 And he that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave clothes: and his face was bound about with a napkin: Jesus saith unto them, Loose him, and let him go.

In these verses we find our Lord addressing himself to the miracle of raising Lazarus from the grave. First, he commands them to take away the stone. But could not that voice which raised the dead remove the stone? Yes, no doubt; but it is always the will of Christ, that we put forth our utmost endeavours, and do what we can in order to our own deliverance. To remove the stone, and untie the napkin, was in their power; this therefore they must do; but to raise the dead was out of their power, this therefore will Christ do alone. Our hands must do their utmost before Christ will put forth his help. The stone being thus removed, his eyes begin; they are lifted up to heaven, his Father's throne, from whence he expects to derive his power: His tongue seconds his eyes, and he prays unto his Father; Christ, as God, wrought this miracle by his own power. Consider him as mediator, and so he looks up to his Father by prayer; yet we hear of no prayer, but a thanksgiving only: Christ's will was his prayer; whatever Christ willed, God granted; Christ and his Father having one essence, and nature, and one will. Neither was it fit for Christ to pray vocally and audibly, lest the unbelieving Jews should say, he did it by intreaty, nothing by power. Farther, That as Christ, when he spake to his Father, lifted up his eyes; so, when he spake to Lazarus, he lifted up his voice, and cried aloud. This Christ did, that the strength of the voice might answer the strength of the affection, since we vehemently utter what we earnestly desire; also, that the greatness of the voice might answer to the greatness of the work; but especially that the hearers might be witnesses, that this mighty work was performed; not by any magical enchantments, which are commonly mumbled forth with a low voice but by an authoritative and divine command. In a word, might not Christ utter a loud voice at the raising of Lazarus, that it might be a representation of that shrill and loud voice of the last trumpet at the general resurrection, which shall sound into all graves, and raise all flesh from their bed of dust? Next, As the manner of our Lord's speaking with a loud voice, so the words spoken by him; Lazarus, come forth. Christ doth not say, Lazarus, revive; but, as if he supposed him already alive, he says, Lazarus, come forth; to let us know, that they are alive to him, who are dead to us. What a commanding word this was, Come forth. Not that it was in the power of these loud commanding words to raise Lazarus, but in the quickening power of Christ which attended these words. O blessed Saviour! it is thy voice which we shall ere long hear sounding into the bottom of the grave, and raising us from our bed of dust; It is thy voice that shall pierce the rocks, divide the mountains, and echo forth throughout the universe, saying Arise, ye dead, and come to judgment. Lastly, How readily obedient Lazarus was to the call and command of Christ; He that was dead came forth: And if Lazarus did thus instantly start up at the voice of Christ in the day of his humiliation, how shall the dead be roused up out of their graves by that voice which will shake the powers of heaven and move the foundations of the earth in the day of his glorification! Quest. But where was Lazarus's soul all that while that he was dead? If in heaven, was it not a wrong to him to come from thence? if not, doth it not prove that the soul sleeps as well as the body? Ans. Souls go not to heaven by necessitation, as the fire naturally and necessarily ascends upwards, but are disposed of by God, as the supreme Governor; those that have served him go to heaven, and those that have served the devil go to hell; and those that are not yet adjudged to either place, but are to live presently again upon earth, as Lazarus was are reserved by God accordingly; whether shut up in the body as in a swan, or whether kept in the custody and hands of an angel not far from the body, waiting his pleasure, either to restore it to the body, or to return it to its proper place of bliss or misery, the scripture has not told us whether; and it would be too great a curiosity to enquire and greater presumption to determine.

45 Then many of the Jews which came to Mary and had seen the things which Jesus did, believed on him. 46 But some of them went their ways to the Pharisees, and told them what things Jesus had done. 47 ¶ Then gathered the chief priests and the Pharisees a council, and said, What do we? for this man doeth many miracles. 48 If we let him thus alone, all men will believe on him: and the Romans shall come, and take away both our place and nation.

Note here, 1. The different effects which this miracle had upon those Jews who were present at the raising of Lazarus: Some of them believed on Christ; but others, persisting in their unbelief, went to the Pharisees and informed against them. Notwithstanding all the evidence which our Saviour gave of his being the Messiah, by the miracles which he wrought, yet many rejected him, and refused to believe in him, to their unutterable and inevitable condemnation. 2. How greatly disturbed the Pharisees were upon the account of our Saviour's miracles: knowing how proper an argument they were to convince men, they concluded, that if Christ were suffered to go on and work miracles, he would draw all men after him. Learn hence. That Jesus proved himself to be the true Messiah by the miracle which he wrought, his enemies themselves being judges: For we find here, the worst of our Saviour's enemies were afraid of his miracles that by them he would draw all men after him; If we let him alone, all men will believe on him. Note, 3. What was the ground of the Pharisees fear, if they let Christ go on to work his miracles, that he would have to many followers as would alarm the Romans and awaken their jealousy, and cause them to come upon them with an army, to deprive them of the little liberty they indulged them, and take away their place and nation: Their place; that is, their place of worship, the temple: And their nation; that is, bring the whole body of the Jewish nation to utter destruction. Learn hence, How all the enemies and opposers of Christ and his kingdom do endeavour to colour their quarrel with some specious pretences, that they may hide the odiousness of their practices from the eye of the world, and may not be openly seen to fight against God. Thus the Pharisees here persecute our Saviour, not as the Messiah (though the miracles he wrought were a sufficient evidence that he was such) but as one who would bring ruin upon their nation: If we let him alone, the Romans will come, and take away both our place and nation.

49 And one of them; named Caiaphas, being the high priest that same year, said unto them, Ye know nothing at all, 50 Nor consider that it is expedient for us, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not. 51 And this spake he not of himself: but being high-priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation: 52 And not for that nation only, but that also he should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad:

The foregoing verses acquainted us with the apprehension which the chief priests had the necessity of taking away the life of our blessed Saviour: Lest the Romans should take away both their place and nation: Now here in these verses Caiaphas the high-priest delivers his opinion, for the preventing of this danger: He tells the rest, that they ought not to boggle at the matter, but come to a positive and peremptory resolution to provide for the public safety, right or wrong; and that it is a great folly to prefer one man's life, though never so innocent, before a nation's welfare: a most wicked and devilish speech: as a judge he regarded not what was lawful, But as a wicked politician he consulted what was expedient; he declares, that one man though never so good and holy, though never so just and innocent, had better die than a whole nation suffer; as where it is in any case unlawful to do evil that good may come. Learn hence, That although it be the duty of all persons to pray for, and endeavour after the public welfare of a church and nation, whereof they are members; yet it is altogether unlawful to promote the greatest national good by wicked and unlawful means. Learn hence, How God overruled the tongue of Caiaphas beyond his own intention, prophetically to foretel that great good, which by our Saviour's death should come to the world, and that the fruit and benefit of his death should not only extend to the Jews, but to the Gentiles also; and that he should gather in one body, or church, all that truly believe in him, though far and wide dispersed upon the face of the earth. Learn 1. That the spirit of prophecy did fall sometimes upon very bad men, and God has been pleased to reveal some part of his mind to the worst of men. Thus Pharaoh and Nebuchadnezzar had in their dreams a revelation from God, what things he intended to do. 2. That it is consistent with the holiness of God, sometimes to make use of the tongues of the worst of men, to publish and declare his will. Caiaphas here, though a vile and wicked man was influenced by God to prophecy and speak as an oracle Almighty God may, when he pleases, employ wicked men this way, without any prejudice to his holiness: This Caiaphas spoke not of himself, but, being high priest that year, &c.

53 Then from that day forth they took counsel together for to put him to death. 54 Jesus therefore walked no more openly among the Jews; but went thence unto a country near to the wilderness, into a city called Ephraim, and there continued with his disciples. 55 ¶ And the Jews passover was nigh at hand: and many went out of the country up to Jerusalem before the passover to purify themselves. 56 Then sought they for Jesus, and spake among themselves as they stood in the temple, What think ye, that he will not come to the feast? 57 Now both the chief priests and the Pharisees had given a commandment, that if any man knew where he were, he should shew it, that they might take him.

Note here, 1. How baneful and destructive evil counsel is, especially out of the mouths of leading men, and how soon embraced and followed. Caiaphas no sooner propounds the putting of Christ to death, but from that day forward they lie in wait to take him. The high priests had satisfied their consciences, and now they make all possible speed to put their malicious designs and purposes in execution. 2. The prudential care and means which our Lord used for his own preservation; to avoid their fury, he withdraws himself privately into a place called Ephraim, and there continued with his disciples. Learn, As Christ himself fled, so it is lawful for his servants to flee, when their life is conspired against by their bloody enemies, and the persecution is personal. 3. When the time was come that he was to expose himself, when the time of the passover drew near, in which he, being the true paschal Lamb, was to be slain, to put an end to that type, he withdraws no more, but surrenders himself to the rage and fury of his enemies, and dies a shameful death for shameless sinners, as the next chapter more at large informs us.

C H A P. XII.

THEN Jesus, six days before the passover, came to Bethany, where Lazarus was, which had been dead, whom he raised from the dead.

The latter end of the foregoing chapter acquainted us with the prudential care of Christ, in withdrawing from the fury of his enemies in and about Jerusalem, who were consulting his destruction: His time not being fully come, he gets out of the way of his persecutors: but now the passover being at hand, which was the time this Lamb of God was to die as a sacrifice for the sin of the world; our Lord comes forth, first to Bethany, and then to Jerusalem, not fearing the teeth of his enemies, but with a fixed resolution to encounter death and danger for the salvation of his people. His example teacheth us, That although we are bound by all lawful means and prudential methods to preferre ourselves from the unjust violence of our persecutors; yet when God's time for our sufferings is come, and we evidently see that it is his will that we suffer for his sake, we ought to set our faces very chearfully towards it, and resign up ourselves to the wisdom and will of God.— Thus did Christ here, chap. xi. 54. we find he withdrew from suffering, his hour not being then come: But now when the passover was nigh at hand, which was the time when he was to suffer, he set his face towards Jerusalem, and withdraws no more.

2 There they made him a supper, and Martha, served: but Lazarus was one of them that sat at the table with him. 3 Then took Mary a pound of ointment, of spikenard, very costly, and anointed the feet of Jesus and wiped his feet with her hair: and the house was filled with the odour of the ointment. 4 Then saith one of his disciples, Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, which should betray him, 5 Why was not this ointment sold for three hundred pence, and given to the poor? 6 This he said, not that he cared for the poor, but because he was a thief, and had the bag, and bare what was put therein. 7 Then said Jesus, Let her alone: against the day of my burying hath she kept this. 8 For the poor ye have always with you, but me ye have not always.

In these verses, an account is given of our Saviour's entertainment at Bethany after he had raised Lazarus. A supper is made for him, at which Martha served, and Lazarus sat with him, but Mary anoints Christ's feet with precious ointment. Where note, 1. The action which this holy woman performed, she pours a box of precious ointment upon our Saviour's head, as he sat at meat, according to the custom of the Eastern countries at their feasts. I do not find that any of the apostles were at thus much charge and cost to put honour upon our Saviour as this poor woman was. Hence learn, That where strong love prevails in the heart, nothing is adjudged too dear for Christ, neither will it suffer itself to be out-shined by any examples. The weakest woman that strongly loves her Saviour will vie with the greatest apostle, and piously strive to express the fervour of her affection towards him: Note, 2. How this action was resented and reflected upon by murmuring Judas, who valued this ointment at three hundred pence, and grudged the bestowing of it upon Christ. He accused this holy woman of needless prodigality. Lord! how doth a covetous heart think every thing too good for thee? He that sees a pious action performed, and seeks to lesson and undervalue it, shews himself possessed with a spirit of envy. Judas's invidious spirit makes him censure an action which Christ highly approved. Hence learn, That men who know not our hearts, may, through ignorance or prejudice censure and condemn those actions which God doth commend, and will graciously reward. Happy was it for this poor woman, that she had a more righteous Judge to pass sentence upon her action than wicked Judas. 3. How readily our holy Lord vindicates this poor woman; she says nothing for herself, nor need she, having such an advocate, who gives the reason for her action: She did it for my burial. As kings and great persons were wont in those Eastern countries, at their funerals, to be embalmed with odours and sweet perfumes, So saith our Saviour, this woman, to declare her faith in me, as her King, and Lord, doth with this box of ointment, as it were, before hand, embalm my body for its burial. True faith will put honour upon a crucified, as well as a glorified Saviour. This holy woman accounts Christ worthy of all honour in his death, believing it would be a sweet sinelling sacrifice unto God, and favour of life unto his people.

9 Much people of the Jews therefore knew that he was there: and they came, not for Jesus' sake only, but that they might see Lazarus also, whom he had raised from the dead:

Note here, It was not zeal, but curiosity, which brought these persons at this time to Christ; they had an itching desire to see Lazarus, to inquire after the truth of his death and possibly after the state of the dead, and the condition that separated souls are in after death. Thus the miracles of Christ drew many followers after his person, who were never converted by his doctrine. It was the sin of many, when Christ was here upon earth, that they flocked after him, rather out of curiosity than out of conscience, and chose rather to gaze upon his works, than to fall in love with the worker. The multitude here came to Bethany, not for Jesus' sake only, but that they might see Lazarus also.

10 ¶ But the chief priests consulted, that they might put Lazarus also to death; 11 Because that by reason of him many of the Jews went away, and believed on Jesus.

Observe here, 1. The unreasonableness of that rage and madness, which was found in the chief priests against Lazarus. They consulted together how they might put Lazarus to death. But supposing that Christ had spoken blasphemy, in making himself equal with God, or supposing that he had broken the sabbath, by curing the man that was born blind, on that day; yet what had Lazarus done that he must be put to death? But from hence we learn, That such as have received special mercy and favour from Christ, or are made the instruments of his glory, must expect to be made the mark and the butt of malicious enemies. Christ had highly honoured Lazarus, by raising him from the grave, and here there is a resolution against his life, whom Christ had thus highly honoured; The chief priests consulted that they might put Lazarus to death also. 2. The cause why the chief priests consulted that they might put Lazarus to death; namely, Because that by reason of him, many of the Jews went away, and believed on Jesus. That is, many of the Jews, seeing the miracle of Christ's raising Lazarus from the grave, were drawn thereby to believe in Jesus Christ: and this so enraged the chief priests against Lazarus Lazarus, that they sought to put him to death. Learn hence, That nothing so enrages the enemies of Christ, as the enlargement of his kingdom, and the sight of the number of believers daily increasing. This provokes the devil's wrath and his servants rage.

12 ¶ On the next day much people that were come to the feast, when they heard that Jesus was coming to Jerusalem, 13 Took branches of palm-trees, and went forth to meet him, and cried, Hosanna: Blessed is the King of Israel that cometh in the name of the Lord. 14 And Jesus, when he had found a young ass, sat thereon; as it is written, 15 Fear not, daughter of Sion: behold, thy King cometh, sitting on an ass's colt. 16 These things understood not his disciples at the first: but when Jesus was glorified, then remembered they that these things were written of him, and that they had done these things unto him.

Here we have recorded the carriage of the multitude towards our Saviour, when he came near the city of Jerusalem: They take palms in their hands, and go forth to meet him, and cast their garments on the ground before him to ride upon: yea, they do not only disrobe their backs but expend their breath in joyful acclamations, and loud hosannas, wishing all manner of prosperity to their meek, but mighty King. In this prince like, yet poor and despicable pomp, doth our Saviour enter the famous city of Jerusalem. Lord! how far was thou from affecting worldly greatness and grandeur? Thou despisest that glory which our hearts fondly admire: Yet because Christ was a King he would be proclaimed such, and have his kingdom confessed, and applauded, and blessed; yet, that it might appear that his kingdom was not of this world, he abandons all worldly magnificence.

17 The people therefore that was with him, when he called Lazarus out of his grave, and raised him from the dead, bare record. 18 For this cause the people also met him, for that they heard that he had done this miracle. 19 The Pharisees therefore said among themselves; Perceive ye how ye prevail nothing? Behold, the world is gone after him. 20 ¶ And there were certain Greeks among them, that came up to worship at the feast: 21 The same came therefore to Philip, which was of Bethsaida of Galilee, and desired him, saying, Sir, we would see Jesus. 22 Philip cometh and telleth Andrew: and again, Andrew and Philip tell Jesus.

Observe here, 1. How the multitude at Jerusalem came forth to meet Christ, when he was making his public entry into the city, hearing the fame of his miracles; For this cause the people also met him, for that they had heard that he had done this miracle. 2. How amongst others who came forth to meet our Saviour, certain Greeks, or Gentile profelytes, who came up to worship at the outward court of the temple, apply themselves to Philip, that he would help them to a sight of Jesus. Sir, we would see Jesus. It is probable that this desire to see Christ, in these persons proceeded from curiosity only: but if it did produce true faith in them, we may hence infer, that a spiritual sight of Christ by the discerning eye of a believers faith, is the most glorious, and consequently, the most desirable sight in the world; and so must needs be, for it is a soul-ravishing, a soul satisfying, a soul-transforming, and a soul-saving sight. This sight of Christ by faith will constrain a soul highly to admire, and greatly to commend him. It will incline a soul to chuse him, and cleave unto him, and will set a soul a longing for the full fruition, and final enjoyment of him, Luke ii. 29. Mine eyes have seen thy salvation: Now let thy servant depart. How the envious Pharisees were galled, and cut to the heart, to see such a multitude both of Jews and Greeks crowding into the city, to meet Jesus in his triumphant entrance into the city: The Pharisees said, Behold the world is gone after him. Learn hence, That in the day of Christ's greatest solemnity and triumph, there will not be wanting some persons of such a cankered disposition, that they will neither rejoice themselves, nor can they endure that others should. This was the case of the wicked Pharisees here.

23 ¶ And Jesus answered them, saying, The hour is come that the Son of man should be glorified. 24 Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground, and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit. 25 He that loveth his life shall lose it: and he that hateth his life in this world, shall keep it unto life eternal.

Observe here, 1. How our blessed Saviour entertains his followers with a discourse concerning his approaching death and sufferings: The hour is coming, that the Son of man shall be glorified. 2. How he arms his disciples against the scandal of the cross, by shewing them the great benefit that would redound by his death unto all mankind; and this by a similitude taken from grain; Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone. That is, as corn sown, lodged in the barn, or laid up in the chamber, never multiplies or increases: but sown in the field, and bury it in the earth, and it multiplies and increases and brings forth a plentiful crop: So, if Christ had not died, he had remained what he was, the eternal Son of God, but he had had no church in the world: whereas his death and sufferings made him fructify: That brought a plentiful increase of exaltation to himself, and salvation to his people. 2. How plainly our Saviour dealt with his followers; he did not deceive them with a vain hope and expectation of temporal happiness, but tells them plainly, that all that will be his disciples, must prepare for sufferings, and not think their temporal life too dear to lay down for him when he calls them to it, this being the surest way to secure to themselves life everlasting. He that loveth his life shall lose it, but he that hateth his life in this world, shall keep it unto life eternal. Learn hence, That the surest way to attain eternal life, is cheerfully to lay down our temporal life life, when the glory of Christ, and the honour of religion, requires it at our hand.

26 If any man serve me, let him follow me: and where I am, there shall also my servant be: if any man serve me, him will my Father honour.

That is, "If any man assumes the title, and enters into the sacred engagement of being Christ's servant, let his conversation correspond with his profession, and let him be willing to follow me in the thorny path of affliction and sufferings, from this assurance, That all his grievous sufferings shall end in eternal joys; Where I am, there shall my servant be, and him will my Father honour." Learn hence, 1. That all that will be Christ's servants, must be his followers; they must obey his doctrine, and imitate his example. 2. That Christ's servants must not expect better usage at the hands of an unkind world than he their Master met with before them. 3. That such as serve Christ by following of him, shall at death see him as he is, and be with him where he is; Where I am, there shall also my servant be. 4. That God will crown the fidelity and constancy of Christ's servants with the highest dignity and honour: If any man serve me, him will my Father honour.

27 Now is my soul troubled: and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour: but for this cause came I unto this hour. 28 Father, glorify thy name. Then came there a voice from heaven, saying, I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again.

Whilst our Saviour was thus preaching of his own death and sufferings, a natural horror of his approaching passion (though such as was without sin) seizes upon him; his Father giving him a taste of that wrath which he was to undergo upon the cross for our sins. Hereupon he betakes himself to prayer, Father, save me from this hour: this was the harmless inclination of his sinless nature, which abhorred lying under wrath, and therefore prays against it; yet (as it were) recalling himself, he submits to what his office, as our surety, required of him, and prays again to his Father to dispose of him as may most and best conduce to the purposes of his glory: Father, glorify thy name. Learn hence, 1. That mere trouble is no sin; Christ's soul was troubled; Christianity doth not make men senseless; grace introduceth no stoical stupidity. 2. That fear of death, especially when accompanied with apprehensions of the wrath of God, is more perplexing and soul amazing: My soul is troubled, and what shall I say? 3. No extremity of sufferings ought to discourage us from laying claim to that relation, which God stands in to us as a Father. Our Saviour, in the midst of his distress, calls God Father: Father, save me from this hour. 4. In the extremity of our sufferings, we may be importunate, but must not be preremptory in our prayers; as Christ in his agony prayed more earnestly, so may we in ours, but always submissively; Father save me from this hour; but for this cause came I unto this hour. 5. That our exemption from suffering may sometimes be inconsistent with the glory of God. Father, save me from this hour; Father, glorify thy name.

Note, lastly, The Father's answer to the Son's prayer: There came a voice from heaven, saying, I have glorified it, and will glorify it again. That is, as God the Father had been glorified in his Son's life, doctrine, and miracles; so he would farther glorify himself in his death, resurrection, and ascension; as also by the mission of the Holy Ghost, and the preaching of the gospel for the conversion of the Gentiles to the ends of the earth. Learn hence, That the whole work of Christ, from the lowest degree of his humiliation, to the highest degree of his exaltation, was a glorifying of his Father: he glorified his Father by the doctrine which he taught, he glorified his Father by the miracles which he wrought, by the unspotted innocency of his life, and by his unparalleled sufferings at his death, by his victorious resurrection from the grave, and by his triumphant ascension into heaven.

29 The people therefore that stood by, and heard it, said that it thundered: others said, An angel spake to him. 30 Jesus answered and said: This voice came not because of me, but for your sakes. 31 Now is the judgment of this world: now shall the prince of this world be cast out. 32 And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me. 33 (This he said, signifying what death he should die.)

Note here, 1. The way of God in speaking to his people by a voice in thunder for the greater declaration of his glory and majesty. Thunderings and lightnings, usually attended the voice of God, even in consolations, and when he spake comfortably to his own servants. Oh! how dreadful and terrible then must the voice of God be to his enemies, when he shall come in flaming fire, to render vengeance to them! If there was such a dread and terror such thunderings and lightnings at the giving of the law; Lord, what will there be another day, when thou comest to punish the violation of that law! 2. The end why God the Father now spake with an audible voice to God the Son; it was for his consolation, and the people's confirmation. His soul being troubled, he stood in need, as mediator, of comfort from his Father; and the people had here a farther and fuller confirmation of his being the promised and true Messiah that so they might believe in him: This voice came not because of me; that is, not only or chiefly because of me, but to confirm your faith in the belief of this great truth, that I am the Son of God, by whom the Father hath glorified, and will farther glorify his name. 3. Our Saviour declares a double effect and fruit of his death: 1. The judgment of this world: Now is the judgment: now shall the prince of this world be cast out: That is, my death will be the devils overthrow; will bring down sin, and deliver the world from the tyranny and dominion of sin and Satan. Hence, learn, 1. That Satan is the Prince and ruler of all those who live in sin; not a Prince by legal right, but by tyrannical usurpation. 2. That this usurper Satan will not quit his possession, unless he be cast out. 3. That Christ by his death has cast out Satan, and dethroned him, and deprived him of his tyrannical usurpation. Now is the prince of this world cast out; that is, I will shortly by my death deliver the world from the slavery of sin, and dominion of Satan, and particularly from that idolatry, which the greatest part of the world were then in slavery under. The second effect and fruit of Christ's death, which is here declared, is his drawing all men unto him: When I am lifted up from the earth, I will draw all men unto me. There is a twofold lifting up of Christ; the first ignominious, when he was hung upon the cross; the second glorious, in the preaching of the gospel; by this he draws all men unto him; that is, by the preaching of the gospel, he calls and invites all persons to himself; he offers the benefits of his death to all, and gathereth a church to himself out of the Gentile as well as the Jewish world. Learn, 1. That all persons are naturally unwilling to come to Christ, they must be drawn. 2. That Christ meritoriously by his death, and instrumentally by the preaching of the gospel, draws sinners unto himself. 3. That it is not a few, or small number, but a very great number, consisting both of Jews and Gentiles; bond and free, persons of all nations, sexes, and conditions, whom Christ draweth: Not that all are effectually drawn to Christ, so as savingly to believe in him; but, by the preaching of the gospel, they are called and invited to him, and the benefit of his death are offered to them. Thus Christ being lifted up upon his cross, and on the pole of his gospel, draws all men unto him; that is, doth what is sufficient to prevail with all men to believe on him, and to render those that do not so, everlastingly inexcusable.

34 The people answered him, we have heard out of the law, that Christ abideth forever: and how sayest thou, The Son of man must be lifted up? Who is this Son of man? 35 Then Jesus said unto them, Yet a little while is the light with you: walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you: for he that walketh in darkness knoweth not whither he goeth. 36 While ye have light, believe in the light, that ye may be the children of light. These things spake Jesus, and departed, and did hide himself from them.

Observe here, 1. The objection which the Jews make against our Saviour's being the true Messiah. Their argument is thus: "It was foretold under the law, that Christ, or the Messiah abideth for ever; but thou sayest, that the Son of man must be lifted up and die. How then canst thou be the promised Messiah?" The answer is, "In his state of humiliation unto death, he was lifted up; but, in his state of exaltation, he abideth for ever." Learn hence, That Christ's lifting up by death, and his abiding forever, do very well consist together; for both are true of him; the one in his state of humiliation, the other in his state of exaltation. 2. Our Saviour returns no answer to their cavilling objection, nor doth he undertake to demonstrate how his sufferings and his abiding for ever are consistent; but gives them intimations that he was the light of the world, and advises them, whilst they had the light with them, to prize it highly, and improve it faithfully: Yet a little while the light is with you, walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you. Note here, 1. A choice and singular privilege enjoyed; the light is with you, a personal light, Christ; a doctrinal light, the gospel: Both these brought with them a light of knowledge, answering our darkness of ignorance; a light of grace and holiness, answering our darkness of sin, which we had brought upon ourselves; and a light of joy and comfort, answering the darkness of misery and horror, which we lay under by reason of our guilt. 2. The time of enjoying this privilege limited; yet a little while is the light with you. The time of a people's enjoying the light and liberty of the gospel, it is a limited time, it is a short time. 3. A duty enjoined, by Christ, answerable to the privilege enjoined by us; Walk whilst ye have light. An uniform and constant course of holy walking, according to the rule of the gospel, is the indispensable duty and obligation of all those that enjoy the light and liberty of the gospel; namely, to walk according to the precepts and commands of the gospel answerable to the privileges and prerogatives of the gospel, answerable to the helps and supplies of grace which the gospel affords, and answerable to the glorious hope and expectation which the gospel raises us unto. 4. A danger threatened to the neglectors of this duty; lest darkness come upon you: Namely, a darkness of ignorance and judicial blindness, a darkness of error and seduction, a darkness of horror and despair, and the fatal and final darkness of death and hell; for all contemners of gospel light, there is reserved the blackness of darkness forever. Where sin and torment run parallel, there torment makes them sin, and their sin feeds their torment.

37 ¶ But though he had done so many miracles before them, yet they believed not on him: 38 That the saying of Esaias the prophet might be fulfilled, which he spake, Lord, who hath believed our report? and to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed? 39 Therefore they could not believe, because that Esaias said again, 40 He hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart; that they should not see with their eyes, not understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them. 41 These things said Esaias when he saw his glory, and spake of him.

The place which our Evangelists allude to, is, Isa. vi. ver. 3. Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts, the whole earth is full of his glory. From whence a clear argument for Christ's divinity may be thus drawn. He whom Isaiah saw environed with seraphims, and praised as most holy by them, was the true and eternal God; for such acclamations belong to none but the great Jehovah, God blessed for evermore. But, says St. John, it was the glory of Christ that Isaiah saw in his vision, it was Christ whom he called, Holy, holy, &c. therefore Christ is undoubtedly God blessed for evermore. For the Evangelist was not speaking of the Father, but the Son, and cites these words out of Isaiah; so that it was the Glory of the second person that Isaiah saw and spake of, if the words of the Evangelist be of any credit. Besides, the angels are too holy to give acclamations belonging to God, to any but him that is God. Note here, 1. The astonishing infidelity and unbelief of the Jews, who heard our Saviour's doctrine, and were eye-witnesses of his miracles; though he had done so many miracles before them, yet they believed not on him. Let not the faithful ministers of Christ be discouraged, and overmuch dejected, at their want of sense in dispensing of the gospel, when they observe and consider the small success of our Saviour's own ministry in the hearts and lives of his hearers; yea, though his ministry was accompanied with miracles, and though his miracles were many in number, mighty in nature, clear and obvious to sense, being wrought before their eyes, yet his ministry succeeded not, and his miracles prevailed not: Lord, what little success has the offer of Christ in the gospel met with, from the first original tender to this day? Obstinate infidelity, and cursed hypocrisy, draw more souls to hell than all the devils in hell.

2. How the present infidelity of these unbelieving Jews was long before foretold, and prophesied of, by the prophet Esaias, chap. liii. 1. Lord, who hath believed our report? That is, our preaching. Where note, That Esaias's complaint of the small success of his preaching, was a prophecy and prediction of the large success that Christ and his ministers should have under the gospel. Learn hence, That the gospel in all ages has met with more that have rejected it by unbelief, than have savingly entertained it by faith. Esaias complained before Christ, and his apostles and ministers in every age since, that few have believed their reports.

3. That though the present unbelief of the obstinate Jews was long foretold by the prophets of God, yet the prophets prediction was no cause of their unbelief, or that which laid them under an impossibility of believing; but the fault lay in their own obstinate will, with respect to which, by the just judgment of God, they were blinded and hardened, for their contempt of Christ, the promised Messiah. When men close their eyes wilfully, and say they will not see, it is just with God to close their eyes judicially and say, They shall not see. He hath blinded their eyes and hardened their hearts, &c. Learn hence, That the infidelity of the people is to be resolved into the perverseness of their own wills, and the evil dispositions of their own hearts, not to any judicial blindness or obduration wrought by God upon them, antecedent to their own sin: God's act of hardening was consequential upon their sinning.

42 ¶ Nevertheless, among the chief rulers also many believed on him: but because of the Pharisees they did not confess him, lest they should be put out of the synagogue. 43 For they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God.

Note here, 1. That though the generality of the Jews were thus hardened under Christ's ministry and miracles, yet there were some, and those of the chief rank, even rulers that did believe on him; that is, they were under strong and powerful convictions, that he was the true and expected Messiah. Even in times and places where obstinacy and infidelity most prevails, the ministry of the word shall not be altogether without its fruit; Christ here had some, and those of the rulers too, who believed on him, when others under the same word were hardened: Nevertheless among the chief rulers also, and many believed on him. 2. That though many of the chief rulers had a secret belief, or an inward persuasion, that Christ was the promised and expected Messiah, yet it was not sufficient to make them openly own, confess, and avow him to be such, for fear of excommunication from the Pharisees: They did not confess him, lest they should be put out of the synagogue. Slavish fear of men, and suffering by them, has hindered many from believing on Christ, and kept more from an open owning and confessing of him: Because of the Pharisees they did not confess him. 3. As the fear of suffering on one hand, so the love of reputation on the other, kept them from owning and confessing Jesus to be the Christ: They loved the praise of men more than the praise of God; that is, they valued honour and applause from men, more than Gods honouring and approving them. There is no greater snare to draw persons from their duty, than inordinate love and affection to their own credit and reputation. Oh! how often is the applause and commendation of men preferred before the testimony and approbation of God! Here was their snare: They loved the praise of men, &c.

44. ¶ Jesus cried and said, he that believeth on me, believeth not on me, but on him that sent me. 45 And he that seeth me, seeth him that sent me. 46 I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me: should not abide in darkness. 47 And if any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not: for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world. 48 He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him: the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day. 49 For I have not spoken of myself: but the Father which sent me, he gave me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak. 50 And I know that his commandment is everlasting life: whatsoever I speak therefore, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak.

In these verses we have our Blessed Saviour's farewell sermon to the Jews concerning his person, office and doctrine: As touching his person, he acquaints them with his divine nature, his oneness and equality with the Father; and accordingly challenges not only the assent, but also the obedience and adoration of their faith. Jesus cried, saying, He that believeth on me, believeth not on me, but on him that sent me: That is, that believeth on me, doth not believe on a mere man, but on him that is truly and really God, as well as man: And therefore he being true God, one in essence, and equal in power and glory with the Father, their believing in him was believing in God the Father that sent him. 2. The argument which our Saviour uses to prove that believers in Christ do believe in the Father: He that seeth me, seeth him that sent me: That is, "He that seeth me spiritually, and by faith, seeth my Father to be one with me in essence, though not in person; and he that seeth me in my miraculous works which I do, seeth him also that sent me, by whom I do these mighty works." Learn hence, That we do not see Christ aright with the eye of our faith, unless we see him, and believe him to be truly and really God; one with, and equal to the Father: He that seeth me, seeth in me him that sent me. 2. That the Father is not to be seen but in the Son: nor can believers know what the Father is, but by seeing what the Son is; and what they see the Son to be; That the Father is in him. 3. The dreadful judgment which Christ denounces against all unbelievers, and such as reject him, by rejecting of his gospel; for though, at Christ's first coming, his errand was not to judge the world, but to save the world, that is, to offer the tenders of salvation to lost sinners; yet at his second coming he would judge them at the last day; when the word preached to them, and rejected by them, will give a judicial testimony against them. Learn hence, 1. That Christ and his doctrine are inseparable: to receive his doctrine, is to receive him; and to reject his doctrine, is to reject him. 2. That such rejecters of Christ and the doctrine of the gospel, shall not escape the judgment of Christ at the great day. 3. That at the great day, were there no other witness against the rejecters of Christ and his gospel, but the word preached, yet that alone will be sufficient both for conviction and condemnation: The word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day. The word is now the rule of living, and it shall be hereafter the rule of judging: Now it is the rule by which we must live to Christ, then it shall be the rule by which we shall be judged of Christ. 4. The argument and reason which our Saviour produces, to prove that the word of God and the doctrine of the gospel slighted and rejected, should condemn sinners at the great day, namely, from the divine authority of his doctrine; for albeit his doctrine was his own, as he was true God; yet as man, and as Mediator, it was not his own, but the Fathers which sent him; so that his word and doctrine being divine, and the Father's as well as his, (for he did not speak of himself; that is, of himself alone without the Father) it is sufficient to judge and condemn all the rejecters and despisers of it. Learn thence, 1. That though the doctrine of the gospel be Christ's own, as he is truly and really God, yet it was not his own as a mere man, exclusive of the Father, who is one God with him, and who gave him a commission and instruction, as Mediator, to preach and publish the glad tidings of the gospel; For, says he, I have not spoken of myself, but the Father which sent me gave me a commandment. 2. That the doctrine which Christ delivered by command from the Father, doth point out the way to eternal life, and will bring lost sinners thereunto, if they sincerely believe it, and obey it: I know that his commandment is life everlasting. 3. That therefore sinners who rejected the doctrine of Christ contained in the gospel, do highly dishonour, offend, and affront both the Father and Son, and bring upon themselves a righteous judgement, and expose themselves to unutterable and inevitable condemnation.

C H A P. XIII.

NOW before the feast of the passover, when Jesus knew that his hour was come, that he should depart out of this world unto the Father, having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end. 2 And supper being ended, (the devil having now put into the heart of Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, to betray him,) 3 Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands, and that he was come from God, and went to God;

In this chapter is recorded the history of our Saviour's washing his disciples feet; an action full of humility and condescension, and propounded to his followers imitation. The circumstance of the time is here noted, when this act was done; namely, at the passover, when the time of our Saviour's departure was at hand; and having constantly and immutably loved his own, he expresses the premanency of his love towards them to the end, by this action of his, in washing their feet. Here note, How Christ chose the time of the Jewish passover to suffer in, that he might prove himself to be the substance of that type; that he was the true paschal lamb, who by the sacrifice of his death did atone divine displeasure, and taketh away the sins of the world. 2. The means which the wisdom of God permitted to bring the Lord of life to his ignominious death; and that was the treason and perfidiousness of one of his own disciples, Judas Iscariot. Where observe, 1. The person betraying, Judas; Judas a professor and a preacher; Judas an apostle; being one of the twelve, whom Christ had chosen out of all the world to be his dearest friends. Can we wonder to find friends unfriendly or unfaithful towards us, when our Saviour had a traitor in his own house? 2. The heinousness of Judas's sin in betraying Christ; he betrayed Christ Jesus a man, Christ Jesus his Master, Christ Jesus his Maker: The first was murder, the second treason Lord! it is no strange and uncommon thing, for the vilest sins, and most horrid impieties, to be acted by persons making the most eminent profession of thy holy religion. 3. What hand the devil had in the sufferings of our Saviour: He put it into Judas's heart to betray Christ, that is, he did suggest and inject such thoughts into his mind, which Judas instantly closed with. The devil, being a spirit, has quick access to our spirits, and can instil his suggestions into them. As Christ did breathe upon his disciples, and they received the Holy Ghost, and were filled with the Spirit; so Satan breathes filthy suggestions into the Spirits of men, and fills them with all manner of wickedness, even with the spirit of hell itself.

4 He riseth from supper, and laid aside his garments, and took a towel, and girded himself: 5 After that he poured water into a bason, and began to wash the disciples feet, and to wipe them with the towel wherewith he was girded.

Note here, The admirable humility and great self-denial of our Lord and Master; He arises from supper, whilst his disciples sat still, and he that came in the form of a servant performs all the offices of the meanest servant to his disciples; He lays aside his upper garments, he girds himself with a towel, pours water into a bason, and begins to wash
and

and wipe their feet, which lay out behind them, as they leaned at the table: All which was a most servile employment. Learn hence, That the wonderful humility of Jesus Christ inclined him to do the meanest offices of service unto his people, even to become a servant to them in the day of his humiliation; and though now glorified in heaven, he retains the same compassionate heart towards them, as when here on earth: Hereby instructing us, that it is our duty, in whatever station providence shall place us in the world, to stoop to the lowest offices of love and service to our fellow brethren. Lord! thou hast left the most amazing instance of self-denial for our encouragement and example. Quest. But how far doth this example bind us? Ans. It does not oblige to the individual act, but to follow the reason of the example; that is, after Christ's example, we ought to be ready to perform the lowest and meanest offices of love and service to one another.

6 Then cometh he to Simon Peter: and Peter saith unto him, Lord, dost thou wash my feet? 7 Jesus answered and said unto him, What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter. 8 Peter saith unto him, Thou shalt never wash my feet. Jesus answered him, If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me. 9 Simon Peter saith unto him, Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head. 10 Jesus saith unto him, He that is washed, needeth not, save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit: and ye are clean, but not all. 11 For he knew who should betray him; therefore, said he, Ye are not all clean.

Note here, 1. How Simon Peter refuses to admit of such a condescending act from Christ his Lord and Master, as the washing of his feet: Lord! Thou shalt never wash my feet. It is a sinful humility to refuse the offered favours of Christ, because we are unworthy to receive them. Though we are not worthy of Christ, and of his love, yet Christ is worthy of us, and of our faith. 2. Our Saviour's reply to Peter's refusal: 1. He tells him, That there was more in it, than the bare act of washing did at first sight import, and that he should know hereafter what he did not understand now. What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter. Learn hence 1. That the servants of God themselves are often much to seek, and cannot apprehend and understand at present the workings and dealings of God with them; they understand not either the intent or the event of God's dispensations. 2. That although God's dealings with his children and people are for a while in the dark, and are not presently made known, yet there will come a time for the clearing and evidencing of them, when they shall understand that all his dispensations were in mercy to them. The second part of our Saviour's reply to St. Peter follows, If I wash thee not; thou hast no part with me; as if Christ had said, "Peter, this external act of mine in washing thy feet, doth signify something farther, and imports my washing of thy soul from the guilt and defilement of sin, without which thou canst neither have interest in me, nor communion with me." Learn hence,

1. That so universal is the pollution of sin, that every soul stands in need of washing. 2. That Christ washeth all that have a part and interest in him, both from the guilt and pollution of their sin. 3. That St. Peter now understanding better what was meant by this outward washing, namely that it did signify and represent the cleansing of the soul from the defilement of sin, he is so far from refusing that Christ should wash his feet, that he offers his hands and head, and all, to be washed by him; Lord, not my feet only. &c. Learn hence, That so thoroughly sensible are the saints of the filthiness and pollution of sin, that they desire nothing more than an inward, thorough, and prevailing purification of their whole man, by the blood and Spirit of the Lord Jesus. 4. Our Saviour's reply to St. Peter's last request, He that is washed, needeth not, save to wash his feet; plainly alluding to the custom of those countries, where going abroad bare foot, or with thin sandals, covering only a part of their feet, they had frequent occasion to wash their feet, but need not to wash their whole bodies: in like manner, the saints and servants of God, who are already washed and cleaned by the blood of Christ from the guilt of their sins, and have a real work of renovation and sanctification begun in them by the Spirit of Christ, they ought to be daily purging and purifying their affections and actions, and labouring daily after farther measures and degrees of sanctification. Learn hence, 1. That the holiest, the wisest, and the best of saints, whilst here in a world of sin and temptation, do stand in need of a daily washing by repentance, and according to their repeated acts of sin. 2. That all justified persons are in God's account clean persons: Ye are clean, but not all; that is, you are justified and pardoned, sanctified and cleansed, all of you, excepting Judas, whose heart was known to Christ, though his hypocrisy was hid from the disciples.

12 So after he had washed their feet, and had taken his garments, and was set down again, he said unto them; Know ye what I have done to you? 13 Ye call me master, and Lord: and ye say well; for so I am. 14 If I then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet. 15 For I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done unto you. 16 Verily, verily, I say unto you, The servant is not greater than his Lord; neither he that is sent, greater than he that sent him.

In these words our Saviour declares to his disciples his intention and design in washing of their feet; namely, to teach them by his example the duty of humility; that as he had performed that act of abasement towards them, so should they be ready to perform all offices of love and condescension one toward another: Behold, I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done unto you. Learn thence, That humility and mutual condescension amongst the members and ministers of Jesus Christ, is a most necessary grace and duty, which the Son of God not only taught by his doctrine, but recommended and enforced by his example. Farther, The argument which Christ makes use of to press the imitation of his example upon them; and that is drawn from the titles given to him by his disciples: Ye call me Master, and Lord, and so I am. Now servants to imitate their masters, and subjects to obey their lord and king. Christ is a master to teach and direct; a Lord to govern and protect. As he is a Master, we are to learn in his school; as he is Lord, we are to serve in his house: He must be submitted to as a Prince, as well as a Saviour. It is in vain to expect salvation from him, if we do not yield subjection to him. Another argument which our Lord makes use of to press his disciples to imitate his example, is drawn from his dignity and superiority over them; The servant is not greater than his master. As if Christ had said, "Though you my disciples are to have a very high and honourable station in the gospel church, yet let not this swell you with pride, but be you mutually condescending to each other, remembering you are but servants to myself, and ought to be so to one another: And the servant is not greater than his Lord. Learn hence, 1. That whatever dignity Christ confers upon his servants and officers, yet he is over them all, superior to them, and above them. 2. That the consideration of Christ's dignity, and his minister's meanness, ought to keep their minds humble and lowly, and far from affecting superiority over their brethren: The servant is not greater than his lord, nor he that is sent; greater than he that sent him.

17 If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them.

Our Lord here intimates to us these two things: 1. The necessity of knowledge, in order to practice. 2. The necessity of practice, in order to happiness. A man may know the will of God indeed, and not do it; but he can never do the will of God (acceptably) and not know it. The knowledge of God's will and our duty is necessary to the practice of it. The knowledge of our duty and the practice of it, may be, and too often are separated; but the practice of religion, and doing what we know to be our duty, is the only way to true happiness. Learn thence, 1. that Christ doth not approve of a blind obedience in his people, but requires that their practice and obedience be founded upon understanding and knowledge. 2. That the first care of those that will be Christ's disciples and followers, must be this, with all seriousness to apply themselves to the knowledge of their master's will. 3. The next to the knowledge of our duty, our first and chief care must be to the practice of every thing that we understand and know to be our duty. 4. That a right knowledge and practice of our duty will certainly make us happy; If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them.

18 ¶ I speak not of you all; I know whom I have chosen; but that the scripture may be fulfilled, He that eateth bread with me, hath lifted up his heel against me.

If the chusing spoken of here be understood of eternal election, a chusing to everlasting life, then it affords a strong argument to prove Christ to be God: Thus: he that is the author of eternal election, is God; but Christ is such.

I know whom I have chosen. Consider Christ as God; so we are chosen by him: Consider him as mediator, and so we are chosen in him. If the chusing here be meant of chusing to the work of the apostleship, then our Saviour tells his disciples, that it need not seem strange to them, that he chose one to be an apostle, whom he knew would prove a traitor; for hereby that scripture prophecy, Psal. xli. 9. would be fulfilled; He that eateth bread with me, hath lifted up his heel against me; which though it was literally spoken of Achitophel's treachery against David, yet was it prophetically spoken of Judas's treason against Christ; and the expression of lifting up the heel is metaphorical, taken from a fed beast, that kicks against his master. Learn hence, That Christ did, as his followers do daily, suffer not only from open enemies, but from bosom and familiar friends. Lord, how many are there in the world, who by profession lift up their hand unto thee, who yet by treason and rebellion lift up their heel against thee.

19 Now I tell you before it come, that when it has come to pass, ye may believe that I am he.

Here another argument occurs, to prove the divinity of our blessed Saviour, from his foreknowledge of Judas's treason: the person who, the time when, and the place where, were all known to Christ. I tell you before it come to pass. The argument lies thus: "He that foresaw the future actions of men, and infallibly foreknew the future events and issues of things, is certainly God; but Christ did this, therefore he is really God." And tells us here, That for this very reason he foretold now the treason of Judas; Now I tell you before, that when it has come to pass, ye may believe that I am he. What he doth he mean? What he could foretel so many things to come, which did not depend upon necessary, but contiguous causes only? This he was not a mere man surely, for he knows not what shall be on the morrow; but must be real God, because he knew all things, not by revelation, as the prophets knew things to come, but by immediate inspection, and simple intuition, so that we may say with Peter, Lord, thou knowest all things: And because thou knowest all things thou art God.

20 Verily, verily, I say unto you; He that receiveth whomsoever I send, receiveth me: and he that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me.

Lest his apostles should think, that for the treachery of one of them they should all become odious and abominable to the whole world, our Saviour encourages and gives them an assurance, that there would be those that would receive them, and that he would take it as kindly as if they received himself; He that receiveth you, receiveth me. Learn hence, That it is a sweet encouragement to the ministers of Christ unto the faithful discharge of their duty, that Christ and the Father account that respect paid to the ministers of the gospel is paid to themselves; and on the contrary, that all the contempt cast upon them, reflects upon themselves: He that receiveth you, receiveth me; and he that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me.

21 When Jesus had thus said, he was troubled in in spirit, and testified, and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me: 22 Then the disciples looked one to another, doubting of whom he spake.

Oh, what an astonishing word was this! One shall betray me! one of my disciples shall betray me! yea, one of you my disciples and apostles shall do it! Well might they look one upon another with sorrow and amazement, to hear that their Master should die; that he should die by treason, and that the traitor should be one of themselves; yet do they not censure one another, but inspect themselves saying, Master is it I? not, Master, is it Judas? Learn hence, 1. That it is possible for secret wickedness to lurk, yea, for the greatest villainy to lodge in the hearts of professors, in whose conversation appeareth nothing that may give a just suspicion to others. 2. That it is both the duty and property of the disciples of Christ to have so much candour and brotherly love, as not to rashly censure and judge one another but to hope the best of others, and to fear the worst of themselves.

23 Now there was leaning on Jesus' bosom, one of his disciples whom Jesus loved: 24 Simon Peter therefore beckoned to him, that he should ask who it should be of whom he spake. 25 He then lying on Jesus' breast, saith unto him, Lord who is it? 26 Jesus answered, He it is to whom I shall give a sop, when I have dipped it. And when he had dipped the sop, he gave it to Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon. 27 And after the sop, Satan entered into him. Then said Jesus unto him, That thou doest, do quickly. 28 Now no man at the table knew for what intent he spake this unto him. 29 For some of them thought, because Judas had the bag, that Jesus had said unto him, Buy those things that we have need of against the feast: or, that he should give something to the poor. 30 He then having received the sop, went immediately out: and it was night.

Note here, 1. The character given of St. John the beloved disciple: he leaned on Christ's bosom: that is, he had most intimate converse with Christ, one whom Christ treated with greater freedom and familiarity than the rest, and one that knew more of his heart than most of his disciples. We commonly call a very near friend, a bosom friend. Learn, That although Christ had an endeared love for all his disciples and followers, yet there were degrees in Christ's own love, and he had a familiarity with some disciples beyond others, whilst he was here upon earth, even as now in heaven; though his heart be towards all his children here on earth, yet he is pleased to let out more kind manifestations of himself, and more sensible evidences of his love towards some than towards others. John was the disciple that lay in Jesus's bosom. 2. The way which our Saviour took to discover Judas to the rest of his disciples, not by naming him, but by giving him a sop; partly because he would not give Judas any provoocation by mentioning his name, and partly because this sign of eating the sop, was most agreeable to the prophetic prediction, Psal. xli. 9. Mine own familiar friend, who did eat of my bread, hath lifted up his heel against me. 3. The time when Judas received the sop, and the consequent that followed upon receiving it; it was at that time when he had with an unbelieving heart and an unthankful spirit, been eating the passover which was a type of Christ. Now Satan enters into him; that is takes fuller possession of him, and he gives himself up more freely and fully to the devil's conduct and suggestion. Satan gets possession of wicked men gradually and by degrees; not all at once; the only way to be safe, is to resist at the beginnings of sin, for when Satan once gets footing, it is hard to prevent a more full possession. 4. The place where Judas now was, namely, at Bethany, some miles from Jerusalem, and it was now night; yet so intent was he upon the devil's work, that away he trudges to Jerusalem, and at that time of night repairs to the high priests, and sells his Saviour into their hands. Oh, what a warmth and zeal was here in the devil's cause! Men given over by God, and possessed by Satan, are so restless and unwearied in sin, that neither by day nor by night can they cease from the contrivance and execution of it.

31 ¶ Therefore when he was gone out, Jesus said, Now is the Son of man glorified, and God is glorified in him. 32 If God be glorified in him, God shall also glorify him in himself, and shall straightway glorify him.

Note here, 1. Our blessed Lord calls his death his glory: Now is the Son of man glorified: that is, now is the time at hand when I am to die, and shall by my death finish the work of man's redemption, and therefore eminently glorify God. God the Father was eminently glorified in the obedience and sufferings of his dear and only Son. It is true that the sufferings of Christ were ignominious in themselves, yet were they the way to his own glory, and his Father's also, for by them he redeemed a lost world, trampled upon Satan, triumphed over sin; and the Father was exceedingly glorified by the Son's giving obedience to his will, and so cheerfully suffering: Now is the Son of man glorified, and God is glorified in him, 33 Little children, yet a little while I am with you. Ye shall seek me: and, as I said unto the Jews, Whither I go, ye cannot come; so now I say unto you.

Note here, An endearing compellation, a sweet title given by Christ to his disciples; Little children; intimating that tender affection which he bears unto them, though now upon the point of departing from them. Learn thence, That whatever Christ's dealings are, or may be with his people, in respect to his removing and withdrawing from them, yet he still retains the relation of a father to them, and will in his absence from them, exercise such a care over them, as parents have of their young and tender children; so much doth the title of children imply and import. Observe farther, The plain intimation which our Saviour gives to his disciples of his death being very nigh

(for it was the very next day) he tells them he was going to heaven; And whither he went, they could not come; that is, not presently; they should follow him their forerunner afterwards; but at present he had a great deal of work for them to do, though his own work was done; and till they had finished their work, whither he went they could not come. Learn hence, That though it be rest which the saints may lawfully desire, an everlasting rest with Christ in glory, yet must they not refuse to labour, whilst their Lord will have it so: Till their work be done, whither Christ is gone they cannot come: Ye shall seek me, but whither I go, at present, ye cannot come.

34 A new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another.

Our Saviour having mentioned his departure from his disciples in the former verse; I go away, and whither I go ye cannot come; in this and the following verses, he gives them a strict charge, that in his absence they should love one another. This he calls a new commandment; not that it was new in regard of institution, but of restitution; not new in regard to the substance of it, for it was a branch of the law of nature, and a known precept of the Jewish religion; but he calls it a new commandment, 1. Because purged from the old corrupt glosses of the Pharisees, who had limited this duty of love, and confined it to their own countrymen; whereas Christ enlarges the object, and obliges his disciples to love all mankind, even their very enemies. 2. Because this duty of love was so greatly advanced and heightened by our Saviour, as to the measure and degrees of it, even to the laying down of our lives for one another. 3. It is called a new commandment, because urged from a new motive, and enforced by a new example; As I have loved you, that ye also love one another. Never was this duty so effectually taught, so mightily encouraged, so much urged and insisted upon, by any teacher, as our Saviour; and never was there such an example given of it as his own. 4. It is a new commandment, because with the rest it was never to wax old, but to be always fresh in the memory and practice of Christ's disciples to the end of the world.

35 By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye love one another.

To recommend the foregoing duty of loving one another, with the greater advantage our Saviour tells us here that it will be the best evidence of our relation to him as sincere disciples; By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples. The disciples of John were known by the austerity of their lives; the disciples of the Pharisees by their habit and separation from other men; Christ will have his disciples known by their profound affection to each other, which in the primitive times was so conspicuous, that the very heathens did cry out and say, See how the christians love one another! Here observe, 1. Our Saviour doth not say, By this men shall conjecture and guess you belong to me, as being my disciples, but they shall certainly know it. 2. He doth not say, By this shall you know yourselves to be my disciples, and one another to be so; but by this shall all others know it as well as yourselves. 3. He doth not say, By this shall all men know that you look like my disciples; but that you are indeed what you pretend to be, namely, by your loving one another. 4. Christ doth not say, By this shall the world know that ye are my disciples, namely, by your frequent fastings, by your reading the scriptures daily, by your hearing sermons weekly, by your receiving sacraments monthly; all these, put together, will be no sufficient evidence of your discipleship, if you keep a secret grudge in your hearts one against another: But by this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye love one another. Learn hence, That one of the best proofs and evidences we can have of our relation to Christ, as his sincere disciples, is an hearty love and good-will one towards another.

36 Simon Peter said unto him, Lord, whither goest thou? Jesus answered him, Whither I go thou canst not follow me now; but thou shalt follow me afterwards. 37 Peter said unto him, Why cannot I follow thee now? I will lay down my life for thy sake? 38 Jesus answered him, Wilt thou lay down thy life for my sake? Verily, verily, I say unto thee The cock shall not crow till thou hast denied me thrice.

Here we find Peter reflecting upon what our Saviour had said just before, ver. 33. Whither, &c. he is inquisitive to know of Christ whither he went. Our Lord tells him that for the present he could not follow him, but should hereafter; he was not strong enough to suffer for him, as he should and did afterwards, St. Peter, grieved at this rashly resolves to follow him, though he should die for his sake. Christ advises him not to be over confident of his own strength and standing, for he should deny him thrice, within the time of cock-crowing. Note here, 1. How that fond conceit which our Lord's disciples had of his temporal kingdom here in this world, did abide and continue with them to the very last; for when Christ spake of leaving them by ascending into heaven, Peter understands him of a removal that was earthly, from one place to another; whereas Christ intended it of a removal from earth to heaven. The opinion that the Messiah was to be a temporal prince, and that his kingdom should be of this world; was so deeply rooted in the minds of the Jews, that they stumbled at it fatally; and Christ's own disciples had so drank in the notion, that they wonder to hear Christ say, that he is going from them, and that whither he goes they cannot come.— 2. That Christ's disciples shall certainly follow their Master afterwards, and be forever with the Lord; but they must wait their Lord's time, and finish their Lord's work; they must patiently wait for their change, and not peevishly wish for it: for though they do not follow Christ presently to heaven, they shall follow him afterwards. 3. The greatness of St. Peter's confidence; I will lay down my life for thy sake. Good man! he resolved honestly, but too, too much in his own strength. Little, O little did he think what a feather he should be in the wind of temptation, if once God left him to the power and prevalency of his own fears!

fears! The holiest of men knows not his own strength, till temptation brings him to the trial. Lastly, How detestable St. Peter's presumption and self-confidence was to Christ and how fatal and pernicious to himself: Wilt thou lay down thy life for my sake? As if Christ had said, "Peter, thou sayest more than thou canst do; thine own strength will fail thee, and thy self-confidence deceive thee: I know thy heart better than thou dost thyself, and I foresee, that before the cock crows thou shalt deny me thrice." Thence learn, That none are so near falling, as those that are most conscious of their own standing.

C H A P. XIV.

LET not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me. 2 In my Father's house are many mansions: If it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. 3 And if I go to prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also. 4 And whither I go ye know, and the way ye know.

Our blessed Saviour, in the foregoing chapter having acquainted his disciples with his approaching death, by the treachery of Judas, their hearts were thereupon overwhelmed with grief and trouble: Accordingly in this chapter, by sundry arguments, he comforts his disciples against the perplexity of their fears and sorrows. Observe 1. How Christ addresses himself to his disciples in a very endearing and affectionate manner: Let not your heart be troubled. Whence learn, (1) That the best and holiest of God's children and servants, whilst here in an imperfect state, are subject to desponding, disquieting, and distrustful fears. (2.) That no work is more delightful to our Saviour, than to comfort the troubled and perplexed spirits of his servants. Observe 2. The remedy which Christ prescribes for the calming of their present fears, and for arming them against future troubles, and that is, faith in the Father and in himself; Ye believe in God, believe also in me. Hence learn, 1. That God is the supreme object of faith; his unchangeable love and faithfulness, with his infinite power in the accomplishment of his promise, is the security of believers. 2. That Christ, as Mediator between God and guilty creatures, is the immediate object of our faith. 3. That Christ's being the true and proper object of our faith, is a proof of his being truly and really God. Christ doth here assert his own Deity in the substance of the command, in making himself an object of faith in conjunction with God the Father; Ye believe in God, believe also in me. Observe next, The arguments of consolation which Christ propounds for the support of his disciples, under the sorrow which they had conceived for his approaching departure: 1. He tells them, That heaven, whither he was now going, was his Father's house; a place of happiness, not designed for himself alone, but for many more to enjoy a perpetual rest and abode in, as in everlasting mansions; In my Father's house are many mansions. Heaven is God's house, in which he will freely converse with his domestics, his children and servants, and they shall enjoy full glory there, as in a quiet and capacious habitation. A second ground of comfort is, That he assures them, he will come again and receive them to himself that they may live together in the heavenly mansions. This promise Christ makes good to his saints partly at the day of their death, and perfectly at the day of judgment when he shall make one errand for all, and take up all his children to himself, and make them completely happy both in soul and body with himself. Learn hence, That though Christ has removed his bodily presence from his friends on earth, yet his love to them is not ceased, nor will he rest satisfied, till he and they meet again eternally to solace themselves in each other's company; I will come again and receive you to myself, that where I am, there ye may be also A third argument for consolation is, that notwithstanding Christ was to leave them, yet they knew whither he went, namely, to heaven, and which was the way thither; Whither I go ye know, and the way ye know. It contributes much to the comfort of believers, as to know God and heaven, so to know the way that leads thither, that so they may be armed against all the difficulties of that way.

5 Thomas saith unto him, Lord, we know not whither thou goest; and how can we know the way? 6 Jesus saith unto him, I am the way, and the truth, and the life. No man cometh unto the Father but by me.

Note here, 1. How Thomas, and probably divers others of the apostles, notwithstanding all that Christ had said to the contrary, did still dream of a temporal kingdom, and supposed him to speak of some earthly palace which he was going to; and therefore he tells our Saviour, he knew not whither he was going: But Christ meaning not a temporal but heavenly kingdom, tells them, that if they intended to follow him, and be with him in heaven, he himself was the only way thither: I am the way, and the truth, and the life; that is, I am the true and living way to the Father: And no man cometh to the Father but by me: that is no man can have any access to God by prayer, or any other act of religious worship here on earth, or any access to God in heaven, but by me, as Mediator. As if Christ had said, "I am the author of the way that leadeth unto life, the teacher of the truth which directs to it, and the giver of that life which is to be obtained by walking in it:" I am the way and the truth, and the life.

7 If ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also: and from henceforth ye know him, and have seen him. 8 Philip saith unto him, Lord, shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us. 9 Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? he that hath seen me, hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, shew us the Father? 10 Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? the words that I speak unto you, I speak not of myself; but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works. 11 Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me: or else believe me for the very works sake.

Note here, 1. What a gross conception the apostles had and St. Philip in particular, of the divine nature and being as if God the Father could be seen with mortal eyes: Show us the Father, and it sufficeth us. It is not easy to determine what degrees of ignorance may consist with saving grace: doublets as the degrees of revelation and means of knowledge are more or less, so a person's ignorance is more or less excusable before God. 2. How meekly our blessed Saviour reproves their ignorance; Have I been so long with you, and hast thou not known me, Philip? and then proceeds to instruct them in, and farther acquaint them with, the oneness of himself with the Father, and the personal union of the divine and human nature in himself. Learn hence, That the Father being invisible in his essence to know or see him with mortal or bodily eyes is impossible; but he was seen in his own Son, who is the express image of the Father, being one in essence with him, and one in operation also; He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father.

12 Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on me, the works that I do, shall he do also, and greater works than these shall he do; because I go to my Father.

Here Christ gives his disciples a promise of enduing them with power, after his departure, to work miracles, in some respects greater than what he wrought himself: not greater in regard of the manner, for he wrought by his own power and they wrought all in his name; but greater in regard of the matter of them; particularly, their speaking with strange tongues, their giving the Holy Ghost by laying on of hands, their healing of diseases by the very shadow of their bodies, but especially by their wonderful conversion of the Gentiles from idolatry to serve the living God. When St. Peter converted three thousand at one sermon, then Christ made good this promise; the disciple at that time appeared to be above his Master; Christ all his time was angling for a few fishes, and caught but an hundred and twenty, Acts i. 15. whilst Peter comes with his dragnet, and catches three thousand at one cast; the reason might be, because Christ was not properly to be the builder, but the foundation itself, He subjoins the reason for all this; Because I go unto my Father; that is, to send down, and pour forth unto you my apostles, the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost; which was the great cause of the apostles miraculous operations. Hence learn, That it pleased the wisdom of Christ to do greater things by the hand of his weak servants here in the world, than he was pleased to do himself, who was God over all, blessed for evermore.

13 And whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son. 14 If ye shall ask any thing in my name, I will do it.

In these words our Saviour produces another argument to quiet his disciples hearts under their perplexity and trouble for the loss of his bodily presence; he assures them that whatever comforts they enjoyed by his presence, they shall obtain by their prayers. Note here, 1. The qualification requisite in prayer; we must pray in Christ's name; that is, for the sake of his merits and mediation, in obedience to Gods command, and with an eye to his glory, and for things agreeable to his will, and for things which his wisdom sees good for us. To pray in Christ's name, is more than to name Christ in prayer. It implies three things: 1. To look up to Christ, as having purchased for us this privilege; that we may pray; for it is by the blood of Christ that we draw near to God, and that a throne of grace is open to us. 2. To pray in the name of Christ, is to pray to the strength of Christ, and by the assistance of the holy Spirit of Christ. 3. To pray for the name of Christ, is to pray in the virtue of the present mediation of Christ; believing, that what we ask on earth, Christ obtains in heaven. To pray thus, is no easy matter; yet unless we pray thus, we do not pray at all. Note, 2. The promise made to such prayers; Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do; He saith not, that will my Father do. but that will I do, to testify his divine power and oneness with the Father. This evidently proves him to be God; 3. The repetition of the promise for the further confirmation of it: If ye shall ask any thing in my name, I will do it. The promise is doubled for the confirmation of it, that so we might be free from all fears and doubts of being heard, when we put up our prayers to God, in the name and mediation of Jesus Christ, for things agreeable to his will. Learn hence, That although the children of God have sometimes many jealousies and fears arising in their mind concerning the answer of his prayers, yet they are altogether groundless; for it is most certain their desires shall be granted them, so far as the wisdom of God sees fit and convenient for them; and for that reason our Saviour redoubles the promise: If ye shall ask any thing in my name, I will do it.

15 If ye love me, keep my commandments.

In these words our Saviour implicitly reproves his disciples for their fond way of expressing their love to him, by doting upon his bodily presence, and sorrowing immoderately for his absence, and he expressly warns them to evidence their love to him, by their obedience to his commands; If ye love me, keep my commandments. Where note, Christ requires an obedient love, and loving obedience. Love without obedience is but dissimulation; obedience without love, is but drudgery and slavery. Such a love as produces obedience, must be a dutiful love; a love of reverence and honour to him, as a commander, and an operative and working love, a labour of love, as the apostle calls it: Not waiters, but workers, are the best servants in Christ's esteem. And such an obedience as is the product of love, will be a willing, easy, and cheerful obedience, a pleasing and an acceptable obedience, a constant and abiding obedience; all other motives without love are servile and base and beget in us the drudgery of a slave, but not the duty of a son; He that fears God only, is afraid of smarting; but he that loves God, is afraid of offending. Learn hence, That the best and surest evidence we can have of our love to the Lord Jesus Christ, is an humble, cheerful, and universal, and persevering obedience to his commands: Keep my my commandments; that is, endeavour it without reserve; for though we cannot keep the commandments to a just satisfaction, yet we may perform them to a gracious acceptance. And the word my, my commandments, is a sweet and alleviating word. Moses's law, an unupportable load, but Christ's law an easy burden. The law from Sinai, dreadful; the law from Sion gracious; it pardons weakness, and accepts sincerity.

16 And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another comforter, that he may abide with you forever, 17 Even the spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him; but ye know him, for he dwelleth in you, and shall be in you.

Christ comforts his disciples here, with a promise of the mission of the holy Spirit, to supply the want of his bodily presence. Where note, 1. The procurer of this blessing, and that is Christ, by his prevailing prayer and powerful intercession: I will pray: It runs in the future tense, and so is a promise of Christ's continual intercession. As long as Christ is in heaven, a christian shall not want a supply of comfort and consolation here on earth. 2. The author and donor of the blessing, and that is, God himself; I will pray the Father, and he shall give. The Father, that is, my Father, your Father, and he that is the Father of comfort and consolation; I will pray, and he will give. It is an expression of great assurance. 3. The blessing itself, the Holy Ghost, called here Another comforter. Where observe, 1. The divinity of the Holy Ghost: he that will supply the comforts of Christ's presence, must be, as Christ is the God of all comfort. 2. The person of the Holy Ghost: He is a divine person, not a quality or operation; then we might call him a comfort, but not a comforter. 3. The office and employment of the Holy Ghost: He is a comforter: that is, an advocate, an intercessor to sue for us; an encourager, and one that administers consolation to us; and he is an holy Spirit, so are his comforts, holy comforts. Note 4. The stability of this blessing; that he may abide with you forever. The best of our outward comforts are sudden flames, not lasting flames; but the consolations of the holy Spirit are strong consolations, they are abounding consolations, and everlasting consolations; especially the holy Spirit will be the comforter of good men in the day of affliction, in the day of temptation, at the hour of death, when all other comforts flag and fail. Lastly, the additional title given to the Holy Ghost, he is called the Spirit of truth: partly in opposition to Satan, who is called a lying spirit; partly because he teacheth and revealeth the truth, leading his people into all truth, and sealeth and confirmeth truth to the soul of believers: he is the spirit of truth, both in his essence and in his operations. Learn hence, That as the holy Spirit is true in his essence and nature, so is he true in his office as a comforter to good men; all his consolation being real and solid, and free from imposture and delusion.

18 I will not leave you comfortless; I will come to you.

Here note. 1. The condition which the disciples were in upon the account of Christ's removal from them, and that was sad and comfortless; fatherless or orphans, as the word signifies. Learn hence, That Christ's departure, or the loss of his gracious presence, is very sad and comfortless to a pious soul: well might the disciples here lament and mourn, upon the occasion of Christ's leaving of them, seeing thereby they should be deprived of his doctrine and instructions, of his advice and counsel, and of the benefit of his holy and instructive example. 2. The care of Christ for his disciples, in reference to this their sad and disconsolate condition: He would not leave them comfortless. Where remark, He doth not say, I will not suffer you to be comfortless, but I will not leave you so; that is, he will not desert or disown them in their comfortless condition: he will not leave them, either in point of affection, or in point of activity; he will not cease to love them, nor cease to bestir himself for them. Learn hence, That Christ will not leave his friends in a sad and comfortless state and condition, though for a time they may be brought into it: I will not leave you comfortless, I will come unto you. Christ's coming here unto them, is to be understood of his coming to them by his holy Spirit; in the gifts of it, and in the graces of it, and in the comforts of it: thus he did not long leave them comfortless, but at the feast of Pentecost came to them again.

19 Yet a little while, and the world seeth me no more: but ye see me: because I live, ye shall live also. 20 At that day ye shall know that I am in my Father, and you in me, and I in you.

Here our Saviour foretells his approaching death; that within a little time the men of the world should see him no more; for though he rose again, the world saw him no more after his death; for we read of no appearance of him after his resurrection to any, but to his disciples only. In deed the hour is coming when the world shall see him again; namely, at the day of judgment, when every eye shall behold him with terror and amazement. Note farther, The consolation given to his disciples, Ye shall see me; and because I live, ye shall live also. Because I am raised from the grave, I will quicken your dead bodies in the grave, and ye shall live also; and as I live by my ascension into heaven, so shall you, my disciples, live a life of grace here, and a life of glory with myself hereafter. Learn hence, That a believer's spiritual life is derived from Christ, who by his Spirit communicates a quickening virtue to all his members; Because he lives, they shall live also. See how Christ binds up their life together with his own! As if he had said, "Whilst there is vital sap in the root, you that are branches in me shall not wither and die." Lastly, a farther privilege insured to believers after Christ's ascension, and the Spirit's mission; they should more perfectly understand the essential union betwixt Christ and the Father, and the mystical union betwixt Christ and his members: At that day ye shall know that I am in my Father, &c. The knowledge which the saints now have of the mysterious and mystical union is but dark and imperfect; but in heaven they shall understand these things clearly: Then and there the essential union of Christ and his Father, and the mystical mistical union between Christ and believers, will be more clearly understood, than we are capable to understand them in this our imperfect state.

21 He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me: and he that loveth me, and be loved of my Father, and I will love him; and will manifest myself to them.

Our blessed Saviour in these words, repeats what he had before enjoined at ver. 15. namely, to evidence the sincerity of our love to him, by the universality of our obedience to his commands: He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me. Where note; 1. The necessity of knowledge in order unto practice. 2. The necessity of practice in order unto happiness. We must first have Christ's commandments, before we can keep them; we must have them in our understandings and judgments, in our wills and affections; not have them only in our eyes to read, in our ears to hear, or in our mouths to talk of them, but to hide them in our hearts, that we may not sin against Christ, in the wilful violation of them. Farther, We must keep as well as have, these commandments. This denotes an universal, diligent, and persevering obedience to them. Hence learn, That although many loose professors pretend to love Christ, because they hear, read, know, and talk of his commandments; yet in Christ's account none do truly love him, but those who make conscience of their obedience to him: He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me. Note, next, The gracious promise of Christ to such as thus express their love to him: It shall be loved of my Father, and of myself. And shall he not be loved of the Holy Ghost too? Yes, no doubt. But why is he not named then? Because the Son dwelleth in us by the Spirit, and sheds his love abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost. 2. I will manifest myself unto him; that is, such obedient christians shall not only enjoy the fruit and benefit of my love, but they shall enjoy the sense of my love, and experience the sensible manifestations and inward diffusions of my love in their own souls. Learn hence, That the only way to have Christ love us, and to let out his love upon us, and to know that he loves us, is to look diligently to our obediential walking with him and before him. We may as rationally think to relish our bodies with poison, as to enjoy the manifestations of Christ's love in a way of sin.

22 Judas saith unto him (not Iscariot) Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us, and not unto the world?

Some understand these words of a temporal manifestation, and think that Judas the brother of James, who spake them, still expected that Christ should be a temporal prince, and have such a kingdom as should be conspicuous to all the world, and therefore puts the question, How he could possibly shew himself to his disciples, and the world not see him? Others understand it of a spiritual manifestation; as if he had said, "Lord, who or what are thy disciples, that we should enjoy more special manifestations of thy love to us, than to the rest of the world? Why should we be dignified by such distinguishing favours above others?"

Learn, 1. That there is a real difference put by Christ betwixt his own children and the world, in the matter of special manifestation. 2. That there being no cause from the creature why Christ should make this difference, his discriminating grace is matter of great and just admiration. Well might the apostle out of a deep admiration say; Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us, and not unto the world.

23 Jesus answered and said unto him, If a man love me, he will keep my words: and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him. 24 He that loveth me not, keepeth not my sayings: and the word which you hear is not mine, but the Father's which sent me.

Observe here, How our Saviour still goes on to direct and encourage his disciples to evidence the sincerity of their love to his person, by the universality of their obedience to his commands; and tells them how great their advantage would be by so doing. For, first, The Father would love them; that is, manifest his favour to them in farther dispensations of grace and comfort. Learn thence, That all the manifestations of divine love to the souls of believers, depend upon their close walking with God, in the paths of holiness and strict obedience. Secondly, We will make our abode with him. He shall have Father and Son's company. An allusion to a parent that has many children; he will be sure to live with them that are most dutiful to him, and most observant of him. The expression of making their abode with us, denotes that sweet and intimate fellowship which shall be betwixt God and us, and the perpetuity and constancy of it at all times: till we are taken up by him into heaven, he will make his abode with us, by the indwelling presence of his holy Spirit, the graces and comforts whereof shall abide with us for ever.

25 These things have I spoken unto you, being yet present with you. 26 But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you.

Here we have a repeated promise of the mission of the Holy Ghost, called The Comforter, and his special office declared, namely, to teach, and to bring to remembrance what Christ had taught: He shall teach you all things, As the Spirit of God is the great comforter, so he is the special teacher of his children; he teacheth condescendingly, stooping to the meanest capacities; he teaches efficaciously, inclining the heart to receive instruction, as well as opening the ear to hear it; he teaches plainly and clearly, unerringly and infallibly; he is truth itself, therefore his teachings are most sure. And as the holy Spirit is the saint's teacher, so he is also their remembrancer: He shall bring all things to your remembrance; that is, all truths needful to be known, and necessary to salvation. Here note, That the holy Spirit teaches nothing but what Christ taught; the Spirit teaches in the word, and by the word, but never teaches any thing contrary to the word: He shall teach, &c.

27 Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, I give unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid.

As if our Lord had said, "Whatever outward trouble the world gives you, be not afraid of it before it comes, nor troubled at it when it is come; for I will give you inward peace in the midst of all your outward troubles: Not as the world giveth, give I unto you." Where note, That Christ's peace is vastly different from that peace which is given or enjoyed by the world: the world may wish peace, yet never intend it; or they may wish it, yet not be able to give it; but Christ's peace is real and effectual, solid and substantial; the world's peace is only a freedom from outward trouble, but Christ's peace is a deliverance from inward guilt; and though it doth not give us an exemption from outward troubles, yet it gives us a sanctified use and improvement of them, and assures us of a joyfull issue and deliverance out of them.

28 Ye have heard how I said unto you, I go away, and come again unto you. If ye loved me, ye would rejoice, because I said, I go unto the Father: For my Father is greater than I.

That the disciples of Christ might neither be overfet with fears, nor overwhelmed with grief, he tells them that they ought to entertain the news of his departure rather with joy, and exultation, than with sorrow and dejection; If ye loved me, ye would rejoice because I go to the Father. True love to Christ will make us rejoice in his advancement and exaltation, although it be our own disadvantage. These words, My Father is greater than I, must be understood with reference to his human nature as Mediator; for so was he the Father's servant, and the Father, as God, was greater than he as man. Again, the Father may be said to be greater than Christ, in regard of his paternity, as being the fountain of the Deity; the Father is of himself, but the Son is begotten of the Father; but, being of the same substance with the Father, he is consequently God; as the Father is God; for the inequality arises not from the essence, but from the order and manner of substance. Thus the Father was greater than he; Greater than he as his original, the Son being begotten by him; and greater is he that gives, than he that receives; but, as to his essence, they are both one God, and so equal. Three ways the Father was greater than Christ; 1. With respect to his human nature. Who can doubt but a dependant creature is inferior to that almighty Being that made him? 2. With respect to the eternal generation of his divine person; as he was begotten of the Father, who is therefore called the fountain of the Deity. 3. With respect to his office as Mediator, for thus he was the Father's servant. O wonderful condescension! that the eternal word, who, as such, was equal with the Father, should, in compassion to us, accept a station, and sustain a character, in which the Father was greater than he! now, though under each of these considerations, God the Father is greater than the Son, yet none of them are inconsistent with the Sons being God by nature.

29 And now I have told you before it come to passe, that when it is come to passe, ye might believe. 30 Hereafter I will not talk much with you: for the prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me. 31 But that the world may know that I love the Father; and as the Father gave me commandment, even so do I. Arise, and let us go hence.

The time of our Saviour's death now nearer and nearer approaching, he prepares the expectation of his disciples for it, because evils that surprize us suddenly, do sink our spirits sadly; whereas what we fear, for that we prepare. Accordingly our Lord arms his disciples against all disquietude and overwhelming sorrow for his departure from them: I have told you before, that when it comes to passe, ye might believe: that is, be assured that I am not mere man, but truly and really God, and depend upon me for life and salvation. 2. How our Saviour points out the cause of his suffering; namely, Satan and his instruments: The prince of this world cometh; that is, by Judas, the soldiers, and the high priests: But he hath nothing in me; that is, "He will add no sin or corruption in me to side with his temptation, or so guilt upon me to give him any advantage against me, for I shall die as a perfectly innocent person." Christ, in suffering for our sins, did not only conflict with the wrath of God, but with the rage of men and devils; yet all the power and policy, all the malice and cruelty of Satan, cannot prevail against Christ, any farther than he voluntarily yields and submits himself unto it: The prince of his world cometh, but hath nothing in me. 3. That it was Christ's love and obedience to his Father, that carried him forth so cheerfully to the work of sufferings, supported him under it, and carried him through it: The world may know that I love the Father, and as the, &c. True love to God will draw all men to obedience in the hardest service and sufferings; the grand motive of Christ's sufferings was love to his Father obedience to his commands, and a regard to his glory. Lord, let thy love and obedience to thy Father, in all thy sufferings, be the subject of our admiration, and the matter of our imitation also. As the Father gives us commandment, so let us always do.

CH A P. XV.

I AM the true vine, and my Father is the husbandman. 2 Every branch in me that beareth not fruit, he taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit.

Observe here, How our blessed Saviour, under the metaphor of a vine, elegantly sets forth himself in his relation to his visible church, shewing under that similitude, what his Father meant to do with Judas, and all unfruitful branches like unto him, even take them away; cut them off, and throw them into the fire: but such as are fruitful, he purges by his word and Spirit, by ordinances and providences, by mercies and actions, that they may be more abundantly and abidingly fruitful. Learn hence, 1. That Jesus Christ in his office for, and relation to his people, doth most fitly resemble resemble a vine. As the vine is weak, mean, and small in outward appearance, not like the cedar for height, or like the oak for strength; so was Christ in his state of humiliation; there was no beauty in him, Isa. liii. As the vine is a fruitful plant though it has little pomp, yet it has much plenty, and is only used for fruit bearing, and brings forth plenty and variety of sweet fruit to make glad the heart of man: Thus the fruits of Christ's death, resurrection, ascension, and intercession, are many and great, and delightful and sweet. In a word, as the fruit of the vine is pressed that it may be drink unto men, so Christ submitted to be trod in the winepress of God's wrath, that thereby the sweetest fruit and benefit might redound unto his people. Finally, as the vine is the root from which all the branches derive their nourishment and fruitfulness; in like manner is Christ the stock into which all his members are ingrafted, the root in which they all subsist, and the fountain from whence their spiritual life and faithfulness doth proceed and flow. 2. That as Christ is the vine, so his Father is the husbandman; he ingrafts and implants all the branches into this vine; the plants of righteousness are of his own planting, he takes notice what store of fruit every branch doth bring forth, and it is his daily care to dress and dung, to purge and prune, to support and shelter his vineyard, that it may bring forth fruit abundantly. 3. That there are two sorts of branches in this vine, some fruitful, others unfruitful, some have the visibility, but not the reality of branches, some are branches only by external profession, others are so by real implantation. 4. That the true touch-stone whereby to discern one sort of branches from another, is not by the fair leaves of profession, but by the substantial proofs of an holy and righteous conversation. 5. That in the most fruitful branches, in the best and holiest of christian's, there remains much corruption to be purged out, in order to future and farther fruitfulness. 6. That the husbandman's hand, (God the Father's) manages the pruning knife of affliction, in order to his people's improvement in grace and holiness; he had rather see his vine bleed, than see it barren. Lastly, That such branches as after all the husbandman's care and cost, remaineth unfruitful, shall be finally cut off and cast away, as was Judas here; who, in this discourse of our Saviour, seems particularly and especially to be aimed at: He was a branch in him that bare no fruit, who was shortly after taken away, and went to his own place.

3 Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you. 4 Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me. 5 I am the vine, ye are the branches: he that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit: for without me ye can do nothing.

Our Saviour having in the former verses distinguished his disciples into two sorts, some that were members of his body the church, and branches of him the true vine, by outward shew and visible profession only, others that are spiritually ingrafted into him, and bring forth much fruit;

now in this third-verse. Christ tells his disciples, which number they were of: Now (saith he) ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you; that is, now that Judas the traitor, that dead, rotten, fruitless branch, is cut off and cast out, ye are all clean through the cleansing power and virtue of my word and doctrine. Learn hence, 1. That such as are justified by the blood, and sanctified by the Spirit of Christ, are in Christ's account clean, notwithstanding their many spots and manifold imperfections: Now are ye clean. 2. That as the blood of Christ is the meritorious, and the Spirit of Christ the efficacious, so the word of Christ is the instrumental cause of a believer's purification and cleansing: Now are ye clean through the word which I have spoken unto you. Abide in me, and I will abide in you: That is, abide in me not only by an outward and visible profession, but by a real and fiducial adherence, and I will abide in you by the influences and operation of my holy Spirit. The union and conjunction between Christ and his members is mutual; they abide in him by faith and dependance, and he abideth in them by the indwelling presence of his grace and spirit: Abide in me, and I will abide in you. Farther, The reason which Christ gives, why they should thus abide in him; because without union with him, without interest in him, without influences of grace derived from him, they could bring forth no fruit of him, nor do any thing that is truly acceptable and well pleasing to him: As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me; for without me ye can do nothing: That is, "As branches severed from the vine cannot live and bear fruit, so neither can Christians separated from Christ, and without deriving virtue from him, do any thing spiritually good and well-pleasing in the sight of God." Learn hence, That not only unregenerate men do labour under an impotency to that which is spiritually good, but even disciples themselves, without daily dependance upon Christ and without constant communications of grace from him, can do nothing in a lively and acceptable way and manner unto him: Without me ye can do nothing; you that are branches of me the true vine. As christians, without me, that is, without my spirit abiding in you, and uniting you to me your head, you can do nothing acceptable to me, or worthy of my gospel. Again: As apostles, it may denote, that, without the gifts and powerful assistance of the holy Spirit, they could do nothing to convert the world to christianity; in both respects might Christ truly say, Without me ye can do nothing.

6 If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned.

Here our holy Lord discovers the sad and deplorable condition of such professors, who, pretending relation to Christ, do yet bring no fruit unto him; he calls them withered branches, fit only for the fire. Learn hence, That such as have had a long standing in God's vineyard, and contented themselves with a withered profession, are in great danger of having God's blasting added to their barrenness. All their parts and gifts, and common graces, will wither, and their fair blossoms of profession will drop off, and at the great day the angels will gather these fruitless branches together, and cast them into hell fire.
lets

7 If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you.

Note here, 1. A glorious privilege declared: Ask what ye will, it shall be done unto you: Not that we are hereby warranted to ask what we please at God's hand, but our will must be limited by the word and will of God; we must pray in faith, and in the name and meditation of Jesus Christ, with a single eye at the glory of God. 2. The condition upon which this privilege is attainable: If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you; that is, practically and experimentally. If my doctrine and command abide in your hearts, and dispose you to an holy fruitfulness in your lives, then shall all your just requests be granted. Learn, That such as by faith embrace the promises, and by obedience live up to the precepts of the gospel may in prayer humbly ask of God what they will, with a due submission to the wisdom and will of God.

8 Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit, so shall ye be my disciples.

Our Lord here exhorts his followers to an holy fruitfulness in good works by a double argument. One drawn from the glory of God: Herein is my Father glorified: The other from their own advantage: So shall ye be my disciples: That is, hereby ye shall evidence and prove yourselves to be my disciples. Learn hence, That a christian's abounding fruitfulness in good works will abundantly conduce to the honour and glory of God, and also to his own peace and comfort, by being the best evidence of his discipleship.

9 As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you: continue ye in my love.

Lord, what a comparison is here! As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you: He doth not say, As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved him; but so have I loved you; but, As the Father! It is verbum dilectionis, a word importing dearness of affection: Nor doth he say, The Father hath loved me, and I love you; but, As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you; Nor doth he say, As the Father hath loved me, so will I love you; but So have I loved you. This shews the priority of Christ's love, that he loved us first, and also denotes the invincible constancy of his love, and the indubitable certainty thereof: I have loved you: Follow me from heaven to earth, and from earth to heaven again, and you will find that every step I have taken hath been in love. Learn, 1. That the Lord Jesus Christ hath given full and ample demonstration of his great and wonderful love unto his church and people. 2. That it is the duty, and ought to be the singular care, of every christian, to preserve the sweet sense and inward diffusions of Christ's love in their own souls.

10 If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love: even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love.

Christ had told his disciples in the foregoing verse, that he had loved them, even as his Father had loved him: That is, with an eternal love, with a real and operative love, with an immutable and constant love. In this verse he directs them how they may continue in the sense of his love; namely, by their constant obedience to his commands, as his obedience to his Father's commands had secured him a continuance in his Father's: If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in his love: That is, in the sense of my love, and under the sweet apprehensions of it. Learn hence, That as our obedience to Christ is the best evidence of our love to him, so is it the best mean to preserve and keep us in the sense and assurance of his love to us.

11 These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full.

In these words our Saviour declares the ground and reason why he did so earnestly press and urge the duty of being universally fruitful upon his disciples, and that was twofold: 1. That his joy might remain in them; that is, that the joy which he had in their holiness and obedience might remain with him; nothing is more desired by Christ, than that he may have cause continually to rejoice in the faith and fruitfulness of his people. 2. That their joy in him might be full. This latter arises from the former; our joy in Christ results from Christ's joy in us; his delight in us, causes us abundantly to delight in him. Learn hence, that nothing is more desired by Christ, than that the joy of his people should be a full, solid, constant, and uninterrupted joy. 3. That the only way and mean, in order thereunto is by an holy fruitfulness in good works: All these things have I spoken, &c. The observation of God's commandments does give a christian here the fullest and most perfect joy.

12 This is my commandment, that ye love one another as I have loved you.

Our Lord had often in this farewell sermon of his to his dear disciples, pressed upon them the duty of loving one another, chap. xiii. xiv. And yet here he enforces it again from his own example: As I have loved you, so love you one another; that is, as truly and sincerely for the manner, though not in the same proportion and degree. Learn hence, That for the disciples of Christ to love one another upon such grounds, and in such a way as he loved them, is that which his heart desires, and is very much set upon. 2: That Christ's love unto unbelievers is both an obligation unto mutual love, and also a pattern and example for it. This is my commandment, that, &c.

13 Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.

Here our Saviour gives his disciples an evidence of the greatness of his love unto them; namely, in his readiness to lay down his life for them, which is the highest expression of love to our dearest friends, because life is the greatest earthly blessing. Learn hence, that Christ's love in laying down his life for his people, was a matchless love; for whilst they were enemies to him; he had a friendly respect for them; and never ceas'd till he had brought them into a covenant of friendship with himself.

14 Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you.

Here Christ invites his people to obedience, by the honourable title of friends: Ye are my friends. 1. Actively, you will declare and manifest yourselves to be my friends. 2. Passively, I will declare myself to be your friend. Learn hence, 1. How condescending is the love of Christ, in calling his servants by the name of friends. 2. How glorious is the believers relation to Christ, in being one of his friends. 3. How grateful is obedience to Christ, seeing it dignifies the practisers of it with the title of his friends. 4. Our conformity to Christ consists not so much in imitation of what he did, as in obedience to what he prescribed. Some actions of Christ are inimitable, but all his commands are obeyable. 5. That nothing short of an humble, uniform, chearful, and constant obedience to the commands of Christ, will evidence the truth of our relation to him, and the sincerity of our friendship with him: Then only are ye my friends, when ye do whatever I command you.

15 Henceforth I call you not servants, for the servant knoweth not what his Lord doeth: but I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard of my Father, I have made known unto you.

By these words Christ declares the reason why he was pleas'd to change his stile, and call his disciples friends instead of servants; namely, because of his communication of secrets to them, which servants are not admitted to the knowledge of: Henceforth I call you not servants; that is, not mere servants; not that they were to be exempted from obedience, (for that is call'd for in the foregoing verse) but Christ treated them now with the kindness and familiarity of friends; being about to leave them, he unbosoms himself unto them, saying, All things that I have heard of my Father, I have made known unto you. Not as if Christ had communicated the infinite treasures of knowledge to them which the Father hath imparted to him; but he speaks here as the prophet of his church, that as such he had revealed all things needful for them to know in order to salvation, all things belonging to their case and state; as a counsellor doth not impart all his knowledge to his clients; but all that is necessary for his client to understand and know, that he makes known unto him relating to his own case. Learn hence, 1. That all Christ's disciples are his servants, and all his servants are his friends, in regard of intimate communion and tender usage: Henceforth I call you not servants, but friends. And after his resurrection, he called them brethren, John xx. 17. The dignity of believers is a growing dignity, the longer they follow Christ the higher privileges are indulg'd to them. 2. That all the Father's counsel concerning our salvation, and so far it is needful and necessary for us to know, is faithfully revealed by Christ to his church, he being constituted by God the Father to be the great prophet and instructor of it: All things, &c. that is, all things fit for them at present to know; namely, concerning his passion, resurrection, ascension, mission of the Holy Ghost, a future judgment, and promise of eternal life.

16 Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain: that whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name, he may give it you.

Here our Saviour gives another instance and evidence of his love to his disciples; he tells them, that his mercy and free goodness had prevented them in their election to eternal salvation, and in their vocation unto the office of apostleship: Ye have not chosen me to be your Master and Lord but I have chosen you to be my disciples, friends, and servants. 2. He acquaints them with the end, design, and intention of his chusing of them; namely, that they should bring forth fruit, and preserve therein, even in all the fruits of holiness and obedience, which are to the praise and glory of God by Jesus Christ; I have ordained you, that you should bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain. 3. He directs them, that in order to their being fruitful, they should have access to the Father through him, for whatever they wanted and stood in need of: Whatever ye shall ask, &c. Learn hence, That all those whom God hath chosen, and called to the knowledge and service of Jesus Christ, ought to make it their care and endeavour to bring forth fruit, and to persevere therein to their lives end: I have chosen you, that you should, &c.

17 These things I command you, that ye love one another. 18 If the world hate you, ye know that it hated me before it hated you. 19 If ye were of the world, the world would love his own: but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you. 20 Remember the word that I said unto you, The servant is not greater than the Lord. If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you. If they have kept my saying, they will keep yours also. 21 But all these things will they do unto you for my name's sake, because they know not him that sent me.

Note here, 1. With what frequency and importunity our Lord inculcates and presses the duty of mutual love upon his disciples: I command you to love one another. It denotes the great importance of the duty, and the great averfeness and backwardness of our hearts to the performance of it. And if we consider the disciples as apostles and ministers of the gospel, it intimates to us the necessity of mutual love amongst the dispensers of the gospel, as conducing exceedingly to the welfare and benefit of the church of God, over which he hath set them. 2. The argument which our Saviour makes use of, to press his disciples in general, and his ministers and ambassadors in particular, to love each other; and that is, because the world would certainly hate them. Learn hence, That the world's hatred of the members and ministers of Christ, is, and ought to be, esteemed by

by them a strong argument to excite and persuade them to love one another; for this is subjoined as an argument to press mutual love, that we are sure to meet with the world's hatred. 3. The several arguments by way of encouragement which Christ propounds to comfort his members and ministers against the world's hatred: The first argument is taken from his own lot and usage; when here in the world he met with the very same before them: The world hated me before it hated you. Learn hence, That hatred and persecution from the world need not seem hard to the saints, if they consider what a stock Christ had before them upon him; he is the prime object of the world's hatred and they who hate him much, do hate his members more, because of their likeness to him, and resemblance of him. A second argument of comfort under the world's hatred is this; that it will evidence they are not of the world, but chosen out of the world, ver. 19. Because ye, &c. Hence learn, 1. That the children of God, though in the world yet they are not of the world, they have not the spirit of the world in them, nor is the conversation of the world, led by them. 2. That the difference betwixt them that are of the world, and those that are chosen out of the world, is of God's making: I have chosen you out of the world. 3. That such christians as are separated from the world in judgment, affection, and practice, must for that reason expect to be hated and persecuted by the world: Because ye &c. The third argument for consolation and support under the world's hatred, is taken from our relation to Christ, as servants to a master, ver. 20. Remember that the servant is not greater than the Lord: as if Christ had said "Is it equal that you should expect better treatment than myself, either as to your person or ministry, or that you should expect that the world should better receive your doctrine than it did mine before you?" Learn hence, That neither the members nor ministers of Christ can, nor ought to expect better entertainment in and from the world than their Master found before them: The servant is not above his master, nor greater than his lord. A fourth argument to support them under the burden of the world's hatred, is taken from the goodness of the cause for which they were to suffer: namely, for Christ's name's sake, ver. 27. All these things will they do unto you for my name's sake. Hence learn, 1. That it is the duty of all, but especially the ministers of Christ to own the name of Christ, to stand up in defence of his name and truth, his glory and honour what opposition soever they meet with for the same. 2. That the great quarrel of the world against the disciples of Christ, is for the name of Christ: whatever may be pretended; this is the ground of the quarrel.

22 If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin: but now they have no cloke for their sin.

These words are not to be understood absolutely, but comparatively; as if Christ had said, "Had not I come amongst them in my incarnation, and preached personally to them the doctrine of salvation, and confirmed that doctrine by miraculous operations, they might have pleaded ignorance in some measure, and they had not had sin; that is, they had not had the sin of unbelief and gospel contempt to answer for, or had not so great a measure of any kind of sin to answer for, as now they have; but would have had more to say in excuse, or for a cover for their sin, than now they can: But now they have no cloke for their sin: that is, they are totally inexcusable, and have not the least colour or pretence for their obstinate unbelief." Learn hence, 1. That sins of ignorance are, as it were, no sins, compared with sin's committed against light and knowledge. 2. That sin's committed against gospel light are of an heinous nature and aggravated guilt, as being committed against the very remedy. 3. That the gospel, where it is plainly preached, doth take away all pretence, and excuse from sinners: Now they have no cloke for their sin.

23 He that hateth me, hateth my Father also.
24 If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had sin; but now they have both seen and hated both me and my Father. 25 But this cometh to pass, that the word might be fulfilled that is written in their law, They hated me without a cause.

These words declare the heinous nature of the Pharisees sin, in hating and persecuting Christ who had done before their eyes such works as no man beside him, or before him ever did; he acting by his own power. Peter healed the same man, Acts iii. but it was in the name of Jesus of Nazareth; but Christ healed the sick, and raised the dead in his own name, and by a special word of command: I say unto thee, Arise: Yet did the Pharisees hate him and his Father, according to the prediction, Psal. xxxv. 19. They hated me without a cause. Which being spoken of David in type, received a more eminent accomplishment in Christ, the Son of David. Learn thence, 1. That let men pretend to never so much holiness or respect to God, yet if they hate Christ, and despise his gospel, they are haters of God, who is one in essence and nature with his Son; He that hateth me, hateth my Father also. 2. That no miracles wrought by mortal men were ever comparable with the miracles wrought by Christ the Son of God; his did surpass them all in number kind, and manner of doing them; by his own authority, in his own name, and not as others, who obtained their power by prayer from God: I have done amongst them the works which none other man did. 3. That Christ having confirmed his doctrine by such unparalleled miracles as the world was never before acquainted with, doth aggravate the sin of those that are haters of his person, despisers of his doctrine, and reproachers of his miracles: It being just with God, when men obstinately will shut their eyes and will not see, judicially to close their eyes, and say, They shall not see.

26 But when the comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me. 27 And ye also shall bear witness; because ye have been with me from the beginning.

Here our holy Lord confirms himself, that though he had laid them under many aspersions and scandals from the world, yet all these should be done away by the coming of the the Holy Spirit, who should testify of him, and make his person and doctrine to be acknowledged in the world; and that they themselves should bear witness of him, who had been with him from the beginning; that is, since he first began to exercise his prophetic office. Note here, 1. That Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, are three distinct persons in the Godhead. 2. That the Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Father and the Son: Here the Son is said to send him; and, as to the Father, he is said to proceed from him. If the Holy Ghost doth not proceed from the Son, why is he called The Spirit of the Son? Gal. iv. 6. Why is he said here to be sent by the Son? The comforter whom I will send unto you from the Father. And if the Spirit doth not proceed from the Son, what personal relation can we conceive betwixt the Son and the Spirit? 3. That it is the highest dignity and honour of the apostles and ministers of Christ, that the Spirit beareth no testimony unto Christ; but with and according to the testimony given by them; for here is conjoined, he shall testify of me; and ye shall also bear witness, who have been with me from the beginning.

C H A P. XVI.

THESSE things have I spoken unto you, that ye should not be offended. 2 They shall put you out of the synagogues: yea, the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you, will think that he doeth God service. 3 And these things will they do unto you, because they have not known the Father, nor me. 4 But these things have I told you, that when the time shall come, ye may remember that I told you of them. And these things I said not unto you at the beginning, because I was with you.

In the close of the foregoing chapter, our blessed Saviour had acquainted his disciples with the hatred and hard usage which they were like to meet with in the world, and here he intimates to them the reason why he did so much insist upon that subject; namely, not to sadden their hearts, and grieve their spirits, before their sufferings came, but that they might not be offended, discouraged or scandalized, at them, when they came, but prepared for them, and armed against them. Hence learn, 1. That all afflictions, but especially persecutions, are so searching and trying, that the best of christians have need to be guarded against them, that they may not be offended at them. 2. That it was the great design of Christ to arm his disciples against the scandal of the cross, lest stumbling at what they expected not, they should fall from the profession of christianity. These things have I spoken unto you, that you should not be offended. 2. How our Saviour instances in two particular sorts and kinds of sufferings, which his disciples were to expect in the world, and from the world; namely, excommunication and martyrdom, ver. 2. They shall put you out of their synagogues; that is, exclude them from all their assemblies, both civil and religious, and shall not only think it lawful, but a very acceptable service to God, to put them to death: Whosoever killeth you, will think that he doeth God service. 3. How Christ discovers to his dear disciples the cause and ground of the world's hatred against them, and enmity towards them; namely, their ignorance of the Father, and of himself, ver. 3. these things will they do, because they have not known the Father, nor me. From whence we may learn, That all the persecutions of the saints, do speak in persecutors an ignorance both of God the Father, and of Jesus Christ his Son. All persecution springs from ignorance as well as from malice. And men, who continue ignorant of God and Christ, are in danger of turning persecutors, if they have a temptation to it. 4. How our Lord again forewarns his disciples of their approaching sufferings, to the intent that they might remember that he had foretold them of them; and would not fail to support them under them. He had often told them in general of persecutions and troubles which they must expect to meet with, but did not till now intimate the kinds and degrees of those sufferings, with respect to their weakness; and because whilst he was with them, he himself bore the brunt of all, the world's rage falling upon him, letting them alone; but after his ascension, when the malice of Satan and wicked men could not reach him, then did the storm fall upon them. Learn hence, 1. That Christ is so tender of his disciples weakness, that he will not put them upon the hardship of sufferings, till they be trained up and prepared for them. 2. That it may encourage the saints in and under their sufferings, that Christ himself is the great object of the persecutors' malice, and they only for his sake; for could they reach him, they would not concern themselves with them. 3. That the saints of God, after long exemption and freedom from sufferings, must expect that storms will arise, clouds gather thick, and trials come on apace; and their being under one trial will not hide or shelter them from another.

5 But now I go, my way to him that sent me, and none of you asketh me, Whither goest thou?

6 But because I have said these things unto you, sorrow hath filled your hearts.

Note here, How our Saviour again intimates to his disciples his speedy departure from them, and reproves them for being so saddened at it, and concerned for it, without considering the end and design of it, and the benefit and advantage they were to receive by it. Here we see how the disciples thoughts were wholly taken up about themselves, what they should do for want of Christ's bodily presence, without being instant with him, to know whither he was going, and what benefit he should reap, and they might expect from his departure. Learn hence, That Christ's disciples ought not so much to have lamented the loss of his bodily presence, as to have rejoiced in his glorious exaltation, and in their own advantages by his death resurrection, ascension? None of you asketh me, whither goest thou? But sorrow has filled your heart.

7 Nevertheless, I tell you the truth; It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you.

In these works our Saviour urges his disciples to submit to his departure, as that which would make way for his sending the Comforter to them; which, he assures them, would be of more advantage to them than his own stay and continuance amongst them. Thence learn, That the presence of the holy Spirit with us is a greater comfort and advantage to us than the presence of Christ in the flesh amongst us. Christ's bodily presence was comfortable, but the spirit is more intimately a Comforter than Christ in his fleshy presence; because the spirit can comfort all believer's at once, in all places; but Christ's bodily presence can comfort but few, and that in one place only at once. Christ did converse with his disciples outwardly, but the Spirit possessed himself of their hearts inwardly. Now for the Spirit to dwell in us is more advantageous than to have Christ dwell in the flesh amongst us. The benefit of Christ's conversation was great; but the advantage of the Spirit's renovation and holy inspiration was much greater: The one encourages and incites us to be holy, but the other quickens and enables us to be holy. Therefore well might Christ say, It is expedient, or highly necessary and advantageous for you, that I go away. He subjoins a reason; If I go not away, the Comforter will not come; but if I depart, I will send him to you. Whence we learn, That Christ's ascension was indispensably necessary, in order to the Spirit's mission; the Spirit could not have descended, if Christ had not first ascended; the Spirit could not come, but by the gifts and mission of the mediator. Now the sending of the Spirit being a part of Christ's royalty, as Mediator, it was not convenient that the Spirit should be sent, till Christ was crowned, and sat down on his throne in his kingdom; then the Spirit was to make application to us of the redemption purchased for us.

8 And when he is come, he will reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment: 9 Of sin, because they believe not on me; 10 Of righteousness, because I go to the Father, and ye see me no more; 11 Of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged.

In these and the following verses, our Saviour acquaints his disciples with the advantages that will redound by the coming of the Comforter. First, The advantage to the world. Secondly, To the apostles. And, thirdly, to himself. To the world, 1. He shall convince them of sin, righteousness and judgment. Of sin; that is of their sinful state and nature, of the large extent of sin, and particularly of the sin of unbelief. Learn 1. That the Spirit of God is the author of conviction of sin, and that all convictions of sin do either mediately or immediately flow from him. 2. That unbelief is a sin of the greatest malignity against Christ, and the greatest danger to a christian's soul: He shall convince the world of sin, because they believe not on me. Secondly, Of righteousness; that is, of the insufficiency of all human righteousness, and of the necessity of the righteousness of a mediator; by which alone we are to expect acceptance with God; or of a complete and perfect righteousness in me, imputable to sinners for their perfect justification; and that it is so, appears, Because I go to the Father, and ye see me no more. As if Christ had said,

"Hereby you may be satisfied, that by my active and passive obedience I have fully satisfied my Father's justice for you, and you shall never be charged or condemned; because, when I go to heaven, I shall abide there in glory with my Father, and never be sent back again; ye shall see me no more, as I must have been, if one thing had been omitted by me." Farther, That none are convinced of righteousness who are not first convinced of sin. None will come to Christ by faith, till convictions of sin have awakened and distressed them. Thirdly, Of judgment; that is, the Spirit shall convince the world, that Jesus is both Lord and Christ, that he had power to judge Satan the prince of the world, and that he did by his death put down the kingdom of darkness. Learn hence; 1. That Satan is a prince, who by unjust usurpation, and sinners voluntary consent, has exercised a tyrannical power over the world. 2. That Christ by his death did judge, condemn, and overcome this mighty prince, and hath made his conquest evident to the consciences of men, by the conviction of his holy Spirit: The Spirit shall convince of judgment; that is, that Satan the prince of this world is judged.

12 I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now. 13 Howbeit, when he the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all truth: ---

The second benefit, which our Saviour declares was to be expected by the coming of the holy Spirit, relates to the apostles themselves: He shall guide you into all truth; that is, into all truth necessary for you to know in order to salvation. This is a principal text which the Papists bring for their doctrine of infallibility, but groundlessly: For this promise was made to all the apostles, as well as Peter; nay, not only to the apostles, but to all their successors; yea, not to the apostles only and their successors, but to all believers also; for they are led by the Spirit of God, and that into all truth too; not absolutely, but into all necessary truth; and so far as a private christian follows the conduct and guidance of the divine Spirit, he is more infallible than either pope or council, who follow the dictates and directions of their own spirits only.

—For he shall not speak of himself; but whatever ye shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will shew you things to come.

That is, he shall not teach you a private doctrine, or that which is contrary to what you have learned of me, but whatsoever ye shall hear of me, and receive from me, that shall he speak; and he will shew you things to come. This affords an argument, to prove the holy Spirit to be God; He that can shew us things to come, he that clearly foreseeth and infallibly foretelleth what shall be, before it is, is certainly God. But this the holy Spirit doth; He will shew you things to come. Men and devils may guess at things to come, but none can shew you things to come, but he that is truly and really God; therefore the Spirit is so.

14 He shall glorify me: for he shall receive of mine, and shall shew it unto you. 15 All things that the Father hath, are mine: therefore said I, that he shall take of mine, and shall shew it unto you.

Here, Christ shews the advantage, which would redound to himself by the coming of the Comforter; he declares, that the Spirit should glorify him, by his testimony, gifts, and miracles, and shall in all things accord with him, and thereby, evidence that he hath his mission from him; He shall receive of mine, and shall shew it unto you. And, all things that the Father hath are mine. Hence learn, That although the union in essence amongst the persons in the Trinity is the Same, yet the order of their subsistence and operation is distinct; the Son being from the Father, and the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son. For all things that the Father hath are mine. And the Spirit shall take of mine, and shall shew it unto you. Note, farther, That these words, afford a strong argument to prove the divinity of Christ; All things which my Father hath are mine. Where, Christ challenges to himself, the incommunicable attributes of God, and consequently that essence which is inseparable from them. Dost the Father know the secrets of all hearts? So doth Christ, Rev. ii. 23. All the churches shall know that I am he that searcheth the reins and hearts. Is the Father eternal? So is Christ; Prov. viii. 23. I was yet up from everlasting, &c.

16 A little while and ye shall not see me; and again, a little while and ye shall see me, because I go to the Father. 17 Then said some of his disciples among themselves, What is this that he saith unto us. A little while and ye shall not see me: and again, a little while and ye shall see me: and, because I go to the Father? 18 They said therefore, What is this that he saith, A little while? we cannot tell what he saith. 19 Now Jesus knew that they were desirous to ask him, and said unto them, Do ye inquire among yourselves of that I said, a little while and ye shall not see me: and again a little while and ye shall see me? 20 Verily, verily I say unto you, that ye shall weep and lament, but the world shall rejoice: and ye shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy. 21 A woman, when she is in travail, hath sorrow, because her hour is come: but as soon as she is delivered of the child, she remembereth no more the anguish, for joy that a man is born of the world. 22 And ye now therefore have sorrow: but I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you.

In these words our holy Lord proceeds to comfort his disciples with a promise, that, however he was now to be removed from them, yet they should shortly see him again; namely, after his resurrection; it being impossible that he should be held by death but must arise and go to his Father. his disciples not understanding what he meant, but labouring under the prejudices of their national errors, concerning the temporal kingdom of their Messias, knew not what to make those words; A little while; and ye shall not see me. Our Saviour therefore explains himself to his disciples, telling them, that they should have a time of sad sorrow and grief of heart, during the time of his sufferings and absence from them, but their sadness shall soon be turned into joy, when they shall see him alive again after his resurrection. This he illustrates by the similitude of a travelling woman, who soon forgets her sorrow after she hath brought forth a child. Thus will their hearts revive upon the sight of him risen from the grave; and no man shall be able to take their joy away from them, because he shall die no more, but go to heaven, and there live forever, to make intercession for them. Learn hence, 1. From the apostles not understanding Christ's words concerning his departure though so often inculcated upon them; A little while; and ye shall not see me, because I go to the Father. Hence note, How unreasonable it is to arrogate to man's understanding a power to comprehend spiritual mysteries; yea, to understand the plainest truths, till Christ enlightens the understanding; let the doctrine be delivered never so plainly, and repeated never so frequently, yet will men continue ignorant, without divine illumination. How often had this plain doctrine of Christ's departure to his Father been preached to the disciples by Christ's own mouth? Yet still they say, What is this that he saith? we cannot tell what he saith. 2. The different effects which Christ's absence should have upon the world, and upon the disciples: The world will rejoice, but ye shall weep and lament. Note, 1. That it is the wretched disposition of the world to rejoice in the absence and want of Christ out of the world. When I am gone, the world will rejoice. 2. That nothing is the cause of so much sorrow and sadness to sincere disciples, as Christ's absence and removal from them: Such is their estimation of the worth of him, so great is their apprehension of the want of him; that there is no loss comparable to his absence and removal from them; ye shall weep and lament at my departure, though the world will rejoice. Learn 3. That the believer's sorrow for Christ's absence, though it be very great, yet it shall not be perpetual; Ye have now sorrow; but I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy shall no man take from you. The joy of saints may be interrupted, it shall never be totally extinguished; it is a permanent joy, of which they shall never be totally deprived, till they enter into the ocean of eternal joy; your joy no man taketh from you.

23 And in that day ye shall ask me nothing: Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it you. 24 Hitherto ye have asked nothing in my name: ask and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full.

At the first reading of the twenty third verse there seems to be a contradiction in the words. Christ tells them in the former part of the verse, that they shall ask him nothing in that day; and yet promises, that whatever they ask shall be given to them, in the latter part of the verse, to resolve this, know, that there is a twofold asking, one by way of question, the other by way of petition. The former is asking that we may know; or be informed in what we doubt; the latter is asking what we may receive, and be supplied with what we want. Now when Christ saith in that day, ye shall ask me nothing, it is as much as if he had said, At present you understand but little of the mysteries of religion, and therefore ye put questions about many things; but in that day, when the comforter comes ye shall be so clearly enlightened by him, that ye shall not need to ask me any more questions. But when Christ saith, Whatsoever ye will ask of the Father in my name, he will give it, the meaning is, "in that day, when I have left the world and ascended to my Father, you shall not need to address your prayers to me, but to my Father in my name." But what is it to pray in the name of Christ? Ans. It is more than to name Christ in prayer; it is easy to name Christ in prayer, but no easy thing to pray in the name of Christ. To pray in the name of Christ, is, 1. To look up to Christ, as having purchased for us this privilege, that we may pray; for it is by the blood of Christ that we draw near to God, and that a throne of grace is open to us. 2. To pray in the name of Christ, is to pray in the strength of Christ, by the assistance of his grace, and the help of his holy Spirit. 3. To pray in the name of Christ, is to pray by faith in the virtue of Christ's mediation and intercession, believing that what we ask on earth, he intercedes for, and obtains in heaven. To pray thus is no easy matter, and unless we do pray thus, we do not pray at all. Ver. 24. Hitherto ye have asked nothing in my name. That is, explicitly and expressly in my name, or by me as mediator between God and man, and with respect to my merits. Do this after my death, resurrection, and intercession at the right hand of God, and you shall receive such answers as will fill you with joy; for the saints of God under the Old Testament, and the apostles themselves under the New, had hitherto put up all their petitions in the name of the Messiah, though not in the name of Jesus. But now he exhorts them to eye his mediatory office in all their addresses to God, and promises to them, whatsoever he had purchased of the Father by his sufferings and satisfaction, they should obtain it for the sake of his prevailing intercession. Learn hence, That it is a mighty encouragement to prayer, that now, under the gospel, the person of the mediator is exhibited in our flesh, has satisfied Divine Justice in our nature, and in that nature intercedes as Mediator, for whatever he purchased as our Surety. Hence is the encouragement, Whatsoever ye ask the Father in my name, he will give to you.

25. These things have I spoken unto you in proverbs: the time cometh when I shall no more speak unto you in proverbs, but I shall shew you plainly of the Father.

Here our Saviour tells his disciples, that although he had spoken many things to them in dark parable, and figurative expressions, yet now the time was approaching, namely, the Comforter's coming, when he would by the Holy Ghost clearly enlighten their understandings in the knowledge of divine mysteries, and the things pertaining to the kingdom of God, and particularly in the knowledge of God as his Father, and their Father in him. Hence learn, 1.

That the clearest truths will be but parables, proverbs, and dark mysteries, even to disciples themselves, till the holy Spirit enlightens their understandings. 2. That the clear and full manifestation of divine truth was reserved till the coming of the comforter, who did communicate it to the apostles, and by them to the church, or body of christians: I, by him, will shew you plainly of the Father.

26. At that day ye shall ask in my name: and I say not unto you, that I will pray the Father for you: 27. For the Father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me, and have believed that I came from God.

At that day ye shall ask in my name; that is, after I am ascended into heaven, and have sent down the Holy Ghost upon you, you shall put up all your prayers and requests to God in my name; And I say not that I will pray the Father for you, for the Father himself loveth you; that is, I need not tell you (though I certainly do it) that I will intercede with the Father for you, for he of himself is kindly disposed and affected towards you, for my sake. When Christ says, I do not say that I will pray the Father for you, the meaning is not, that he will lay aside his office as intercessor for believers, but that they had not only his intercession, but the Father's love, upon which to ground their hope of audience. Learn hence, 1. That the christians prayers, put up in Christ's name, cannot fail of audience and acceptance, for the sake of the Mediator's intercession and the Father's love. 2. That in our prayers we ought to eye and look up to Christ's intercession, as not to overlook or forget the Father's love, but ground our hopes of audience upon both; I say not that I will pray the Father for you, though I shall assuredly do it, for the Father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me.

28. I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world; again, I leave the world, and go to the Father. 29. His disciples said unto him, Lo, now speakest thou plainly, and speakest no proverb. 30. Now are we sure that thou knowest all things, and needest not that any man should ask thee: by this we believe that thou camest forth from God.

Here observe, 1. A proof of our Saviour's Godhead: He came forth from the Father into the world. He came out from the Father in his incarnation, and came into the world to accomplish the work of our redemption. Learn hence, That Jesus Christ is true God, equal with the Father; for he was not only sent by him, but came forth from him; I came forth from the Father. 2. That it pleased Christ, out of love to his people, to leave the Father, and come into the world; not by being separated from the Deity, but by obscuring the Deity with the veil of our flesh, in order to the finishing the great and glorious work of redemption for us; I came out of my Father and am come into the world. 3. That Christ having finished his suffering work here on earth, ascended into heaven, and sent down the holy Spirit to apply unto his church the redemption purchased by his blood: Again, I leave the world, and go to the Father. Lastly, how the apostles argue from the knowledge of Christ's omniscieny to the certainty of his divinity: Now are we sure that thou knowest all things; by this we believe that thou camest forth from God. The knowledge and experience of Christ's omniscieny, may and ought fully to confirm us in the belief of his Deity; for that attribute of the Deity cannot be communicated to any person without the communication of the divine nature.

31 Jesus answered them, Do ye now believe? 32 Behold, the hour cometh, yea, is now come, that ye shall be scattered, every man to his own, and shall leave me alone; and yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me.

In the foregoing verse, the apostle made a full profession of their faith in Christ's divinity, and in Christ's omniscieny: Now are we sure that thou knowest all things, and that thou camest forth from God. In this verse Christ intimates to them, that their faith should be put upon a great trial very shortly, namely, when his sufferings came on; and that then they should all forsake him, and take care of themselves: Ye shall be scattered, and leave me alone. Learn hence, 1. That Christ was forsaken and left alone by his own disciples, in the day of his greatest distress and danger. Learn, 2. That when the disciples left Christ, they were scattered every man to his own.

3 That when all forsook Christ, and left him alone, he was far from being simply alone, because God was with him: Ye shall leave me alone; and yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me. God was with Christ, and will be with christians in a suffering hour, in his essential presence, in his gracious and supporting presence: He that sent me, says Christ, is with me; the Father hath not left me alone; for I do always those things that please my Father.

33 These things have I spoken unto you, that in me ye might have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation: but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world.

These words are the conclusion of our Saviours farewell sermon to his disciples, in which he declares to them, 1. The inevitable necessity of the world's trouble: In the world ye shall have tribulation; that is, while ye have to do with the men of the world; while ye have any thing to do with the things of the world; nay, while ye have a being in the world, you must look for trouble, both from within and from without, from friends and foes, in body, soul, name, estate: heart breaking troubles, soul-rending troubles, such troubles as will make the heart to break, and the back to bend; and you, my disciples, must expect it as well as others: In the world ye shall have tribulation. Hence learn, That the disciples of Christ in this world may, yea, must expect and look for trouble. 2. The remedy provided by Christ against this malady: In me ye shall have peace, when in the world ye have tribulation. Ye shall have peace; that is, serenity of mind, a quiet and calm temper of spirit within, when the world like a tempestuous air, is full of storms without. Learn thence, That though in the world Christ's own disciples must look for and expect troubles, yet he has took effectual care, that, amidst all their troubles, in him they may have peace; Christ's blood has purchased peace for them, his word has promised it to them, and his Spirit seals it up to their souls. 3. The cordial provided by Christ for the support of his disciples spirits, under the sinking trouble of the worlds tribulations and troubles; But be of good cheer, I have overcome the world. I have taken away the sting out of every cross, and the venom out of every arrow. Learn hence, That it is a great comfort to a christian, under all troubles of this world, to consider, that Christ has overcome the world, that is all things in the world, which may hinder his people's comfort and consolation here, and their eternal happiness and salvation hereafter; namely, the prince of the world, the rulers of the world, the wicked men of the world, the troubles of the world, the temptations of the world, the corruptions that are in the world through lust. Now Christ having overcome the world, all persons and things in it are at his disposal, and can do nothing but by his permission; and as he has overcome the world himself so he will enable us through faith in him to overcome it also. 1 John v. 4. This is the victory over the world even our faith

CHAP. XVII.

THESE words spake Jesus; and lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, Father, the hour is come; glorify thy Son, that thy Son may also glorify thee.

Our blessed Saviour having ended his consolatory and valedictory sermon, contained in the three foregoing chapters; in this chapter we have recorded his last prayer, with and for his disciples, before he left the world, which is a copy left upon earth, of what he doth now intercede for, as an advocate in heaven. "It is good (saith one) to compare scripture with scripture, but not to prefer scripture before scripture; all scripture being written by inspiration of God;" but if any part of scripture be to be magnified above another, this chapter claims the pre-eminence; it contains the breathings out of Christ's soul for his church and children before his departure; not for his disciples only but for the succeeding church to the end of the world. In the verse before us, observe, 1. The order of our Saviours prayer: These words spake Jesus; that is, after he had finished his excellent sermon, he closes that exercise with a most fervent and affectionate prayer; teaching his ministers by his example, to add solemn prayer and supplications to all their instructions and exhortations: if every creature of God to be sanctified by prayer, much more the word of God, which works not as a natural agent, but as a moral instrument in God's hand. Now as God sets the word of work, so is it prayer that sets God on work. 2. As the order of Christ's prayer, so the gesture in which he prayed; he lifted up his eyes to heaven, as an indication of his soul's being lifted up to God in heaven to signify his reverence of God, whose throne is in heaven; and to denote his confidence in God, and raised expectation of aid and help from from God, and not from any creature. Learn, That the gestures which we use in prayer, should be such as may express our reverence of God; and denote our affiance and trust in him. 3. The person prayed to, God, under the appellation of a Father; it intimates a sweet relation; it is a word of endearing affection, and implies a great reverence towards God, and great confidence, and trust in him. Learn It is very sweet and comfortable in prayer, when we can come and call God Father. 4. The mercy prayed for: The hour is come; glorify the Son, that thy son may also glorify thee. The hour is come; that is, "The hour of my sufferings, and thy satisfaction; the hour of my victory, and of thy glory; the hour, the sad hour, determined in thy decree and purpose." No calamity can touch us, till God's hour is come; and when the sad hour is come, the best remedy is prayer, and the only person to fly unto for succour, is our heavenly Father. Father, the hour is come the doleful hour of my death and passion; glorify thy Son, glorify him at his death, by manifesting him to have been the Son of God; glorify him in his death, by accepting it as the death of thy Son for the sins of the world; glorify him after his death by a speedy resurrection from the grave, and triumphant exaltation at thy right hand. Here note, How the glory of the Father and the Son are inseparably linked together; it was the Father's design to glorify the Son, and it was the Son's desire to have glory from the Father, for this end, that he might bring glory to the Father: Glorify thy Son, that thy son may also glorify thee.

2 As thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him.

Note here, 1. The dignity which Christ was invested with, power over our flesh; that is, authority to judge and sentence all mankind. 2. How Christ came to be invested with this power; it was given him by his Father: Thou hast given him power over all flesh. Hence the Socinians would infer, that he was not God, because he received all from God; But the text speaks not upon his divine power as God, but of his power as Mediator. And the note is, That all mankind is under the power and authority of Jesus Christ as Mediator: He has a legislative power, or a power to execute the laws which he hath given. 3. The end for which Christ was invested with this power; That he might give eternal life to as many as God hath given him. Here note, 1. That all sincere and serious christians, are given by God the Father, unto Christ; they are given to him as his charge, to redeem, sanctify and save; and as his reward, Isa. liii. 13. Note, 2. All that are given to Christ, have life from him; a life of justification and sanctification on earth, and a life of glory in heaven. 3. The life which Christ gives to them that are given him, is eternal life. 4. That this eternal life is a free gift from Christ unto his people; though they do not work for wages, yet they shall not work for nothing: I give unto them eternal life.

3 And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.

That is, "This is the true way and means to attain eternal life, namely, by the true knowledge of God the Father, and of Jesus Christ the Mediator who was commissioned and sent by his Father, to accomplish the work of redemption for a lost world." Here note, Christ calls God the Father the only true God, not in opposition to the Son and Holy Ghost, who being one in essence with the Father, are truly and really God, as well as the Father, but in opposition to idols and false gods. There is a great difference betwixt these two propositions: The Father is the only true God, and the Father only is true God. Christ saith the former, This is life eternal, to know thee the only true God. The Socinians say the latter; This is life eternal, to know only thee to be the true God; and that neither Jesus Christ nor the Spirit are God; but the Father only. But how comes eternal life to depend as well upon the knowledge of Jesus Christ, as of God the Father, if Jesus Christ be only man, and not truly and really God? For thus our Saviour affirms, This is life eternal, to know thee and Jesus Christ. Whence learn, 1. That the beginning, increase, and perfection of eternal life lieth in holy knowledge. 2. That no knowledge is sufficient to eternal life, but the knowledge of God and Jesus Christ, who is also God; for who can think that the knowledge of a mere creature should be accounted equally necessary to salvation, with the knowledge of the great and mighty God? Surely if our happiness consists equally in the knowledge of God and Christ, then God and Christ are of the same nature equal in power and glory. The comprehensive sense of the words seems to be this, "That the knowledge of the only true God, and of Jesus Christ the Mediator, is the life of grace, and the necessary way to the life of glory."

4 I have glorified thee on the earth:—

Learn hence, That the whole life of Christ, while here on earth, was a glorifying of his Father; he glorified his Father by the doctrine which he preached; he glorified his Father by the miracles which he wrought; he glorified his Father by the unspotted purity and innocency of his life, and by his unparalleled sufferings at his death.

—I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do.

That is, I am now about to finish it: He speaks of what he was resolved to do, as already done. Here note, 1. That it is work that glorifies God. 2. That every man has his work, his proper work, assigned him by God. 3. This work must be finished here upon earth. 4. That when we have done our proportion of work, we may expect our proportion of wages. 5. That it is a blessed thing at the hour of death to be able to say in sincerity and uprightiness that we have glorified God in the world, and have finished the work which he appointed us to do: Father, I have glorified thee on earth, and have finished the work which thou gavest me to do.

5 And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was.

From the connection of this in the former verse, learn,

Learn, 1. That whoever expects to be glorified with God in heaven, must glorify him first here upon earth. 2. That, after we have glorified him, we may expect to be glorified with him, and by him. I have glorified thee. And now, O Father, glorify thou me; it follows, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was. Here note, 1. That Christ, as God, had an essential glory with God the Father before the world was; He had this glory not in the purpose and decree of God only, as the Socinians would have it; for he doth not say, "Glorify me with the glory which thou didst propose and prepare for me before the world was;" but, "by which I had and enjoyed with thee before the world was;" by which words our Lord plainly asserts his own existence and being from eternity, and prays for re-exaltation to that glory which he enjoyed with his Father before his incarnation. 2. That Christ, as Mediator, did so far humble himself, that he needed to pray for his Father to bestow upon him the glory which he wanted; namely, the glory of his ascension and exaltation. Now, O Father, glorify me with thine own self. As if Christ had said, "Father, glorify me, embrace and honour me as thy Son, who have been in the eyes of the world, handled disgracefully as a servant." It is an actual glory which Christ speaks of, not in degree and purpose only, for that believers had as well as he; but this was a glory when no creature had a being.

6 I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest out of the world: thine they were, and thou gavest them me; and they have kept thy word.

By the name of God, we are here to understand his nature, his properties and attributes, his designs and counsels for the salvation of mankind; Christ, as the prophet of his church, made all these known unto his people. Learn hence, That Jesus Christ has made a full and complete discovery of his Father's mind and will unto his people; I have manifested thy name unto them which thou gavest me. Thine they were, and thou gavest them me; and they have kept thy word. Learn, 1. That all believers are given unto Christ as his purchase and as his charge: 1. They are given him as his subjects, as his children, as the wife of his bosom, as the members of his body. 2. That none are given to Christ, but those that were first the Father's: Thine they were, and thou gavest them me. 3. That all those that are given unto Christ, do keep his word; they keep it in their understandings, they hide it in their hearts they feel the force of it in their souls, they express the power of it in their lives, They have kept thy word.

7 Now they have known that all things, whatsoever thou hast given me, are of thee.

Note here, 1. The faithfulness of Christ in revealing the whole will of his Father to his disciples. 2. The proficiency of his disciples in the school of Christ, they know all the things which Christ had told them; namely, that whatsoever he had, was given him of the Father, and that he had these things from him to be a Mediator. Learn hence, That Christ hath approved himself a faithful prophet to his church, a faithful messenger from his Father to his people, in that he hath added nothing to his message, nor taken nothing from it. 2. That it is our duty to know and believe on Christ, the only messenger and Mediator sent of God. Now they have known that all things, &c.

8 For I have given unto them the words which thou gavest me, and they have received them and have known surely that I came out from thee, and they have believed thou didst send me.

As if Christ had said, "The message by thee, my Father committed to me, I have communicated to them my disciples, and they have received it, and will communicate it from thee to the world; being sufficiently assured that my coming and preaching was all by commission from thee." Hence learn that the doctrine of the gospel, which was revealed by Christ, was received from the Father. 2. That faith is a receiving of the word of Christ, and of Christ in and by the word. Receiving is a relative term and presupposes an offer: God offers on his part, and we receive on our part, the whole world with the whole heart. 3. That the ministers of the gospel are to preach that, and only that, which they have out of the word of God: I have given them the word, which thou gavest me.

9 I pray for them, I pray not for the world, but for them which thou hast given me, for they are thine.

That is, "I now offer up a prayer particularly, 1. For my apostles, designed for so great a work for the preaching of the everlasting gospel, to the obstinate Jews and obdurate Gentiles. 2. I intercede also for all believers at this time, for their perseverance in faith, and constancy in persecution; but I do not now intercede for the wicked and impenitent world, they not being capable (whilst such) of these mercies and blessings;" though at other times we find him praying for the world, yea for his very crucifiers. Father, forgive them, &c. Nay, in this very prayer, at verse 20, he prays for the world; that is for the Gentile world; all those that by the preaching of the apostles and their successors, should be brought to believe on him to the end of the world. Learn hence, 1. That the Lord Jesus Christ is the great and gracious intercessor. 2. That all believers, all the children of God in general are under the fruit and benefit of Christ's intercession. 3. That as all the members of Christ in general, so the ministers and ambassadors of Christ in special, have a peculiar interest in Christ's intercession; and great are the advantages of his intercession for them; 1. From the person interceding, Christ's consider the dignity of his person; God-man; the dearness of his person, God's Son. 2. From the manner of his intercession, not by way of intreaty, but meritorious claim. 3. From the sublimity of the office, our Intercessor is near to God, even at his right hand. 4. From the fruits of his intercession, it procureth the acceptation and justification of our persons, the hearing and answering of our prayers, the pardon and forgiveness of sins, our preservation in grace, and our hopes of eternal glory.

10 And all mine are thine, and thine are mine, and I am glorified in them.

1. We may understand this two ways; 1. Of all persons, all my friends, all my disciples are thine as well as mine. Thence learn, That the Father and Son have a like share and property in all believers. 2. The words in the original being of the neuter gender signify, All thy things are mine and all my things are thine; Christ and his Father are one and they agree in one; they have the same essence and nature, the same attributes and will; Christ hath all things that the Father hath; Willeth all things that the Father willeth, and doth all things that the Father doth; he is therefore really and essentially God. It followeth, and I am glorified in them; that is, I am made glorious by their owning and receiving me, by their believing in me, and accepting of me for their Lord and Saviour! Thence note, That the Lord Jesus Christ is eminently glorified in and by all those that believe in him, and belong unto him.

11. And now I am no more in the world, but these are in the world, and I come to thee. Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me, that they may be one as we are.

Here observe, 1. Our Saviour's present condition; I am no more in the world; that is, I shall continue on earth but a small time longer, and then ascend to my Father in heaven. Learn thence, That Jesus Christ, as he is man, he is gone out of this lower world, into the immediate presence of his Father; he had been abased before, he must be exalted now; he had no more work to do on earth, but much to do in heaven, therefore he left this work to go to heaven. 2. Our Saviour's prayer to his Father for his apostles before he left the world; Holy Father, keep them; that is; preserve them by thy divine power and goodness, for the glory of thy holy name. Here note, 1. The title and appellation given to God, Holy Father. Thence learn, That when we go to God in prayer, especially for grace and sanctification, we must look on him as an holy Father as essentially and originally holy, as infinitely and independently holy. 2. The supplication requested of God. Keep through thy name those which thou hast given me. Thence learn, That the perseverance of the saints in a state of grace is the sweet effect and fruit of Christ's prayer. Christ has begged it, and it cannot be denied, there being such a harmony and sweet consent between the will of the Father, and the will of the Son. Three things concur to the believer's perseverance: On the Father's part there is everlasting love, and all sufficient power. On the Son's part there is everlasting merit, and constant intercession. On the Spirit's part there is a perpetual inhabitation, and continued influence. Note 3. The end of Christ's supplication on behalf of his people; That they may be one as we are one. Here observe, 1. That the heart of Christ is exceedingly set upon the unity and oneness of his members. 2. The believer's union with Christ their head, and one with another, has some resemblance to that unity that is betwixt the Father and the Son: For it is an holy and spiritual union; a close and intimate union; an indissoluble and inseparable union.

12. While I was with them in the world, I kept them in thy name; those that thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost, but the son of perdition; that the scripture might be fulfilled.

Note here, 1. That those which shall be saved are given unto Christ and committed to his care and trust. 2. That none of those things are given unto Christ as his charge and committed to his care and trust, shall be finally lost: Those that thou gavest me have I kept, and none of them is lost. It follows, but the son of perdition. A person may be said to be a son of perdition two ways; actively, and passively. Actively he is so, who makes it his work and business to destroy others: Passively, he is a son of perdition, who, for his wickedness in destroying others destroyed himself. Judas was a son of perdition in both these senses; his heart was maliciously set upon destroying Christ, and wilfully set upon his own destruction: His covetousness and hypocrisy prompted him to betray our Saviour, his despair provoked him to destroy himself.

13. And now I come to thee, and these things I speak in the world, that they might have my joy fulfilled in themselves.

In these words our Saviour declares the great reason why he did at this time so publicly and solemnly pray for his disciples; It was to fill them with joy and comfort, that their joy might not be diminished by Christ's departure, but rather increased by the coming of the Comforter: That they may have my joy fulfilled in them; that is, the joy which they take in me, and the joy which they have from me. There is a double care which Christ takes of his people; namely, a care of their graces, and a care of their joy and comfort. How solicitous was he to leave his disciples comfort before he departed from them! He delights to see his people chearful, and he knows what great use spiritual joy is in the christian's course, both to enable us for doing, and to fit us for suffering. Learn hence, 1. That Christ is the author and original of the joy of his people; My joy. 2. That it is Christ's will, and desire, that his people might be full of joy: That my joy may be fulfilled in them. 3. That the great end of Christ's prayer and intercession was, and is, that his people's hearts might be full of joy: These things I speak in the world, &c.

14. I have given them thy word; and the world hath hated them, because they are not of the world even as I am not of the world.

I have given them thy word, partly by external revelation and partly by internal illumination; and for thy word's sake the world hates them, as also because they are not of the world. Learn, 1. That christians, especially ministers to whom Christ has given his word, must expect the world's hatred. Few of the prophets or apostles died a natural death: As their calling is eminent, so must their sufferings be exemplary. The best ministers, and the best men, are usually most hated. There is an antipathy against the power of godliness, or a cruel, causeless, implacable, and irreconcilable hatred against the saints, because of their strictness in religion, and contrariety to the world. 2. That it is in the honour of all believers, that they are like unto Christ, in being the objects of the world's hatred: The world hates them, because they are not of the world, as I am not of the world. This Christ adds both for information and consolation; for information, that they should look for such hatred, misery, and trouble, as they saw him grapple with; and for consolation, to think that the world can never hate us so bad as it has hated Christ.

15 I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that thou shouldest keep them from the evil. 16 They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world.

Here note, 1. That the wisdom of Christ sees fit to continue his children and people in the world, notwithstanding all the perils and dangers of the world. He has work for them, and they are of use to him for a time, in the world: till their work be done, Christ's love will not, and the world's malice cannot remove them from hence. Yet Christ prays that his Father would keep them from the evil; that is, from the sins, temptations and snares of this wicked world. Thence note, That a spiritual victory over evil is to be preferred before a total exemption from evil; it is a far greater mercy to be kept from sin in our afflictions, than from the afflictions themselves. Learn farther, How necessary divine aid is to our preservation and success even in the holiest and best of enterprises, and how necessary it is to seek it by fervent prayer. Note also, That such as sincerely devote themselves to Christ's service, are sure of his aid and protection whilst so employed.

17 Sanctify them through thy truth: thy word is truth.

Sanctify them not initially, for so they were sanctified already, but progressively: Let them increase more and more in grace and holiness. Learn hence, 1. That such as are already sanctified, must labour, and blyght to endeavour after further measures and higher degrees of sanctification: that the most holy may yet be more holy. 2. The word of God is the great instrument in God's hand for his people's sanctification. 3. That the word of God is the truth of God. Sanctify them through thy truth, thy word is truth. The word of God is a divine truth, an eternal truth, an infallible truth, an holy truth.

18 As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world.

Note here, 1. Christ's mission: The Father sent him into the world. Christ's sending implies the designation of his person, his qualification for the work, his authority and commission. Learn hence, That Christ himself did not of himself undertake the office of a mediator, but was sent; that is, authorized and commissioned of God so to do; Thou hast sent me into the world. Note 2. As Christ's mission, so the apostles' mission: As thou hast sent me, so have I sent them. Learn thence, That none may, or ought to undertake the ministry, without an authoritative sending from Christ himself; not immediately and extraordinarily by voice or vision, but mediately by the officers of the church. And such as are so sent, are sent by Christ himself; and if so, it is the people's duty to reverence their persons, to respect their office, to receive their message.

19 And for their sakes I sanctify myself, that they also might be sanctified through the truth.

The word sanctify here, is not to be taken for the cleansing, purifying, of making holy that which was before unclean; but Christ's sanctifying himself imports, 1. His separation or setting himself apart to be a sacrifice for sin. 2. His consecration or declaration of himself to his holy use and service. Here learn, That Jesus Christ did dedicate and solemnly set himself apart to the great work and office of a Mediator. Learn, 2. That the great end for which Christ did thus sanctify himself, was that he might sanctify his members; therefore did he consecrate and set himself apart for us, that we should be consecrated to, and wholly set apart for him.

20 Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word.

Hitherto our Saviour had been praying for himself and his apostles; now he prays for all persons, both Jews and Gentiles, that should believe on him, throughout the world by the preaching of the gospel. Hence learn, 1. That all believers have a special interest in Christ's prayers. 2. That in the sense of the gospel, they are believers, who are wrought upon to believe in Christ through the word. 3. That such is Christ's care of and love to his own, that they were remembered by him in his prayer, even before they had a being; I pray not for those alone, but for all that shall believe in me.

21 That they all may be one: as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee; that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me.

The special mercy and particular blessing which Christ prays for, on behalf of believers, is a close and intimate union betwixt the Father himself and them, and also betwixt one another; such an union as doth in some sort resemble that union which is betwixt God and Christ; not an unity of essence and nature, but of wills and affections. Hence note, 1. That the mystical union betwixt Christ and his members carrieth some resemblance with that union which is betwixt the Father and the Son. 2. That union amongst the ministers and members of Jesus Christ is of so great importance necessity and consequence that he did in their behalf principally and chiefly pray for it. An unity of love and affection, of faith and profession, an unity of practice and conversion, are mercies which Christ earnestly prayed for, and has clearly paid for; and nothing is more desired by him now in heaven, than that his disciples should be one among themselves here on earth. Father may they be one, as we are one, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me. Here Christ intimates one special advantage that would redound to the world by this desirable union betwixt the ministers and members of Christ; it will, if not convert, yet at least convince the world, that I and my doctrine came from God. Thence note, That union amongst Christ's disciples is one special mean to enlarge the kingdom of Christ, and to cause the world to have better thoughts of him and his doctrine.

22 And the glory which thou gavest me, I have given them that they may be one, even as we are one.

Here note, 1. Christ's communication of that glory to believers, which he had received of the Father : that is, not his essential glory, but his mediatorial glory : The glory which thou gavest me. Now Christ hath no glory given him as God, but much glory bestowed on him as Mediator. 2. The end of this communication, why he gave his disciples that glory which the Father had given him ; namely, that they might be one. Learn, 1. That God the Father hath bestowed much glory on Christ his Son, as he is man and Mediator of the church. 2. That the same glory for kind and substance, though not for measure and degree, which Christ as Mediator has received from the Father, is communicated to true believers. 3. That the great end of this communication was, and is, to oblige and enable his people to maintain a very strict union among themselves : The glory which thou gavest me, I have given them, that they may be one, even as we are one. 4. That unity amongst believer's is a part of that glory which Christ as Mediator hath obtained for them.

23 I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one, and that the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast loved them, as thou hast loved me.

Note here, 1. That as the Father is in Christ, so is Christ in believers, and they in him ; the Father is in Christ in respect of his divine nature, essence and attributes : and Christ is in believers, by the inhabitation of his holy Spirit. 2. That the believers' happiness consisteth in their oneness, in being one with God through Christ, and one amongst themselves : That they may be made perfect in one. 3. That God the Father loved Christ his Son : Thou lovest them as thou hast loved me. God loveth Christ first, as God ; so he is Primum amabile, the first object of his love, as representing his attributes exactly. Secondly as Mediator, John x. 17. Therefore doth my Father love me because I lay down my life for my sheep. 4. That God the Father loves believers, even as he loved Christ himself ; that is, he loves them upon the same grounds that he loved him ; namely for their nearness, and for their likeness to him. 1. For their nearness and relation to him ; he loveth Christ as his Son, believers as his children, 1 John iii. 1. Behold, what manner of love the Father bestoweth upon us, that we should be called the Sons of God ! 2. The properties of the Father's love towards Christ and believers are the same : Doth he love Christ with a tender love, with an unchangeable love, with an everlasting love ? So doth he love believers also. 5. That Christ would have the world know, that God the Father loveth the children of men, as well as himself ; Christ is not ambitious to engross all our love unto himself, but would have the world take notice of the good-will of his Father, as well as of himself, to lost mankind ; of the Fathers love in sending him, as well as of his own love in coming : That the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast loved them, as thou hast loved me.

24 Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am ; that they may behold my glory which thou hast given me : for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world.

Our Saviour had prayed for his disciples sanctification before, here he prays for their glorification ; 1. That they be where he is ; now Christ is with them in his ordinances, in his word, and at his table ; ere long they shall be with him as his friends, as his spouse, as his companions in his kingdom. 2. That they may be with him where he is, that is, more than the former ; a blind man may be where the sun is, but not with the sun, because he doth not enjoy the light and benefit of it : To be with Christ where he is, imports union and communion with him. That being with him where he is, they may behold his glory ; that is, to see it, and everlastingly possess and enjoy it. Learn 1. That all those that are given to Christ as his charge, and as his reward shall certainly come to heaven to him : Father, I will that they be with me, because I have merited that they should be with me ; I will that they behold my glory, because I have purchased it at so dear a rate. 2. That the work and employment of the saints in heaven chiefly consists in seeing and enjoying Christ's Glory ; for it will be a possessive sight : The language of every look will be, " This happiness is mine, This glory is mine." 3. That the top and height of the saints happiness in heaven consists in this, that they shall be with Christ.

25 O righteous Father, the world hath not known thee but I have known thee, and these have known that thou hast sent me.

Note here, 1. The appellation given to God : O righteous Father. This is the sixth time that Christ in this prayer has called God Father, It being so sweet a relation, and producing all love, delight, joy, and confidence in God, by him that practically improves it. But observe that at ver. 11. when Christ prayed for his people's sanctification, he said, holy Father, making use of that attribute which is the cause of all holiness in the creature ; but now praying for their glorification, he says O righteous Father : righteous in making good thy promises both to me and them. 2. What it is that our Saviour affirms concerning the wicked and unbelieving world, that they have not known God, the world hath not known thee : not as if the world hath not known him at all, but not known him aright ; the unbelieving and un sanctified part of the world having no saving knowledge of God, not living answerable to what they know to be their duty. What Christ affirms concerning himself : But I have known thee, and these have known thee. Intimating thus much unto us, that Jesus Christ knows God immediately, and all others know him by the means of Christ : Christ is the original and fountal cause of all the saving knowledge that believers have of God. There is not the least ray of saving illumination, that doth not descend from Christ and the Spirit of Cnr ft.

26 And I have declared unto them thy name, and will declare it: —

That is, "I have made known unto them thy nature, attributes, counsels, will and commands, and I will continue the manifestation of the same unto the end." Learn hence, That the saving knowledge of God was not attainable by natural abilities; but cometh to us by the special revelation of Jesus Christ: I have declared unto them thy name. 2. That they that have the name of God, his nature and will savingly declared to them, do not stand in need of any farther declarations and discoveries of God's nature and will to be made unto them: I have declared &c.

—That the love wherewith thou hast loved me, may be in them, and I in them.

That is, "That the love which is originally in thyself, as the fountain of all grace, may be communicated and dispensed from thee to them, and become inherent in them." Learn hence, That it is not enough for the people of God, that they are beloved of him, and that his love is towards them; but they must endeavour to have it in them; that is, experience it in the effects of it, and in the sense and feeling of it in their own souls. The safety of a christian lies in this, that God loves him: but the joy, the comfort, and happiness of a christian, consists in the knowledge, in the sensible apprehension and feeling of this love; therefore Christ closeth his prayer for his members, with this affectionate and comprehensive portion, Let the love, &c.

C H A P. XVIII.

WHEN Jesus had spoken these words, he went forth with his disciples over the brook Cedron, where was a garden into the which he entered, and his disciples. 2 And Judas also which betrayed him, knew the place: for Jesus oft-times resorted thither with his disciples.

No sooner had our dear Lord ended his divine prayer, recorded in the foregoing chapter, but he goes forth to meet his sufferings with a willing cheerfulness. He retires with his disciples into a garden, not to hide and shelter himself from his enemies; for if so it had been the most improper place he could have chosen, it being the accustomed place where he was wont to pray, and a place well known to Judas, who was now coming to seek him: Judas which betrayed him knew the place; for Jesus oft-times resorted thither with his disciples; so that Christ repaired to this garden, not to shun but to meet the enemy, to offer himself a prey to the wolves, which in the garden hunted him, and laid hold upon him: he also resorted to this garden now for privacy, that he might freely pour out his soul to God. Learn hence, That the Lord Jesus Christ was praying to his Father in the garden, when Judas with his black guard came to apprehend him. As the sin of the first adam, which brought destruction upon his posterity, was committed in a garden, so the salutary passion of the second Adam, which was to rescue us from that destruction, did begin in a garden also.

3 Judas then having received a band of men, and officers from the chief priests and Pharisees, cometh thither with lanthorns, and torches, and weapons.

Note, 1. What a multitude were here employed by the chief priests and Pharisees for apprehending a single person: gownmen and sword men; young and old, Jew and Gentile; all sorts of persons contriving his death, as all conditions of people were afterwards to receive benefit by it. But what need of these lanthorns and torches, it being then as some observe, full moon, when they sought him in the garden? All this urged their zealous industry for our Saviour's apprehension, that they might be sure to find him, in case he should hide himself in any hole or corners in the garden. Learn hence, That persecutors and wicked apostates are not asleep in their designs and actings, but very vigilant and active; when at the same time Christ's own disciples and followers are asleep and careless. How active was Judas, and how watchful was his bloody crew; even at that time when Christ's disciples could not keep their eyes open!

4 Jesus therefore knowing all things that should come upon him, went forth, and said unto them, whom seek ye? 5 They answered him, Jesus of Nazareth. Jesus saith unto them, I am he. And Judas also which betrayed him, stood with them. 6 As soon then as he had said unto them, I am he; they went backward, and fell to the ground.

Note here, 1. How our Lord's sufferings were all fore-known to himself, before they came upon him, and yet how willingly and cheerfully did he go forth to meet them. Should our sufferings be known unto us before they come upon us, how would it disquiet and disturb us, yea, not only discompose us, but distract us! In great wisdom, therefore, and tender mercy, has God concealed future events from us. But it was otherwise with Christ; he had an exact knowledge of those bitter sufferings which he was to undergo, and yet with a composed mind he goeth forth to meet them: Jesus knowing all things which should come upon him, went forth. "Lord, how endearing are our obligations to thyself, that when thou knewest beforehand the bitterness of that cup which the justice of God was about to put into thy hand, thou didst not decline to drink it off for our sakes?" 2. That it was not man's power, but Christ's own permission, which brought his sufferings upon him. How easily could Christ have delivered himself out of his enemies hands, who, with a word from his mouth, caused them to go backward and fall to the ground! Christ in speaking those words did let out a little ray or beam of his Deity, and this struck them down. Mark what a strange power was here in the word of Christ, and that not an angry word neither: He did not chide them, and say, "You wretches, how dare you lay hands on me, and carry me to judgment, who shall one day be your judge?" Christ only said, I am he, and down they fell. O what fear will Christ send out when he cometh to judge the world, who could send forth such a fear when he yielded up himself to be judged and condemned in the world! If there there was so much majesty in the voice of Christ, in one of the lowest acts of his humiliation what will the voice of glorified Christ be to sinners, when he shall come as a judge to condemn the world?

7 Then he asked them again, Whom seek ye? and they said, Jesus of Nazareth. 8 Jesus answered I have told you, that I am he: if therefore ye seek me, let these go their way. 9 That the saying might be fulfilled which he spake, Of them which thou gavest me, have I lost none.

Here note, 1. How voluntarily and freely Christ laid down his life. When his enemies were fallen to the ground he suffered them to rise again, and offers himself to them, to take and carry him away. Note, 2. How the sight of this glorious miracle of the soldiers falling to the ground did not deter or discourage them from their wicked purpose; they get up again, and go on with their bloody design. Learn hence, That obstinate and obdurate sinners will not be reclaimed by the most evident and convincing by the most miraculous and surprizing appearances of God against them. Note, 3. How mindful in the midst of his sufferings, Christ was of his dear disciples, to secure them, at this time, from death and danger: If ye seek me, let these go their way; that is, my disciples, against whom ye have no warrant at this time. Learn hence, That Christ is so tender of his followers, that he will not put them upon trials, or call them forth to suffering, till they are ripe and ready prepared for them. The disciples yet were weak and feeble, timorous and fearful, and Christ had much work and service for them to do in the world; namely, to plant and propagate the gospel in foreign countries; he therefore resolves not to lose any one of them by persecution at this time: And thus was his word fulfilled, Of them which thou gave me have I lost none.

10 Then Simon Peter having a sword, drew it, and smote the high priest's servant, and cut off his right ear. The servant's name was Malchus. 11 Then said Jesus unto Peter, Put up thy sword into the sheath:—

Observe here, St. Peter's love unto, and zeal for his Lord and Master, in defence of whom he now draws his sword: But why did he not rather draw upon Judas than upon Malchus? Possibly, because though Judas was most faulty, yet Malchus might be most forward to carry off our Saviour. Oh, how doth a pious breast swell with indignation at the sight of an open affront offered unto its Saviour! Farther, The rebuke which Christ gave St. Peter for what he did; though his heart was sincere, yet his hand was rash; good intentions are no warrant for irregular actions: Christ will thank no man for drawing a sword in defence of him, without a warrant and commission from him. To resist a lawful magistrate, even in Christ's own defence, is rash zeal, and discountenanced by the gospel.

—The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?

Here note, 1. A metaphorical description of Christ's sufferings: They are a cup put into his hand to drink off, and that by his own Father. They are a cup, and but a cup; God will not overcharge his people; and this cup is from the hand of the Father, yea, from the hand of our Father: The cup which my Father hath given me. 2. Our Lord's resolution to drink this cup, how bitter soever, being put to his mouth by his Father's hand: Shall not I drink it? that is, I will drink it. Learn hence, 1. That oft-times the wisdom of God is pleased to put a cup, a very bitter cup of affliction, into the hand of those to drink, whom he doth most sincerely love. 2. That when God doth so, it is their duty to drink it with silence and submission; Shall I not drink it? that is, I will certainly drink it with cheerfulness and resignation.

12 Then the band and the captain and officers of the Jews took Jesus, and bound him, 13 And led him away to Annas first (for he was father in law to Caiaphas, which was the high priest that same year.) 14 Now Caiaphas was he which gave counsel to the Jews, that it was expedient that one man should die for the people.

Judas having made good his promise to the chief priests and delivered Jesus a prisoner bound into their hands, those evening wolves no sooner seize the Lamb of God, but they thirst and long to suck his innocent blood; yet, lest it should look like a downright murder, they allow him a mock trial, and abuse the law, by perverting it to injustice and blood shed. How impossible it is for the greatest innocence and virtue to protect from slander and false accusation! and no person can be so innocent or good, whom false witnesses may not condemn.

15 ¶ And Simon Peter followed Jesus, and so did another disciple. That disciple was known unto the high priest, and went in with Jesus into the palace of the high priest. 16 But Peter stood at the door without. Then went out that other disciple which was known unto the high priest, and spake unto her that kept the door, and brought in Peter. 17 Then saith the damsel that kept the door unto Peter Art not thou also one of this man's disciples? He saith, I am not. 16 And the servants and officers stood there, who made a fire of coals (for it was cold) and they warmed themselves: And Peter stood with them, and warmed himself,

All the four evangelists give us an account of Peter's fall in denying his Master. And therein we have observable, 1. The sin itself which he fell into the denial of Christ, and this backed with an oath; he swears that he knew not the man. Lord! how may the slavish fear of suffering drive the holiest and best of men to commit the foulest and worst of sins: 2. The occasion of his fall. (1) His presumptuous confidence of his own strength and standing Though all men forsake ye, yet will not I. Lord! to presume upon ourselves is the ready way to provoke thee to leave us to ourselves. If ever we stand in the day of trial it is the fear of falling must enable us to stand; we soon fall, if we believe it impossible to fall. (2.) His being in bad company, among Christ's enemies; Peter had better been a-cold by himself alone, than warming himself at a fire which was compassed in with the blasphemies of the soldiers, where his conscience, though not feared, was yet made hard. 3. The reiteration or repetition of this sin; he denied Christ again and again; he denied him first with a lie, then with an oath and curse. Oh, how dangerous is it, not to resist the beginnings of sin! If we yield to one temptation, Satan will assault us with more and stronger. 4. The heinous and aggravating circumstances of Peter's sin. (1.) From the character of his person, a disciple, an apostle, a chief apostle; yet he denies Christ. (2.) From the person whom he denies, his Master, his Saviour. (3.) The time when he denied him; soon after that Christ had washed his feet, yea, soon after he had received the sacrament from Christ's own hand. How unreasonable then is their objection against coming to the Lord's table, that some who go to it, dishonour Christ as soon as they come from it! Such examples ought not to discourage us from coming to the ordinance, but should excite and increase our watchfulness after we have been there, that our after-deportment may be suitable to the solemnity of a sacramental table.

19 ¶ The high priest then asked Jesus of his disciples and of his doctrine. 20 Jesus answered him, I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort, and in secret have I said nothing. 21 Why askest thou me? ask them which heard me, what I have said unto them; behold, they know what I said.

Our Saviour being brought before Caiaphas the high priest, he examines him concerning his doctrine, and his disciples, pretending him to be guilty of heresy in doctrine and sedition, in gathering disciples and followers. Our Saviour answers, That, as to his doctrine, he had not delivered it in holes and corners, but had taught publicly in the temple and synagogues, and that in secret he had said nothing; that is, nothing contrary to what he had delivered in public. Christ never willingly affected corners; he taught openly, and propounded his doctrine publicly and plainly in the world. A convincing proof that both he and his doctrine were of God. Learn hence, 1. That it is not unusual for the best of doctrines to pass under the odious name and imputation of error and heresy. Christ's own doctrine is here charged; The high priest asked Jesus concerning his doctrine. 2. That the ministers of Christ who have truth on their side, may and ought to speak boldly and openly; I spake openly unto the world. "Veritas nihil erubescit proterquam abscondi." Truth blushes at nothing except at its being concealed. In secret, says Christ, have I said nothing.

22 And when he had thus spoken, one of the officers which stood by, struck Jesus with the palm of his hand, saying, Answerest thou the high priest so? 23 Jesus answered, If I have spoke n evil, bear witness of the evil: but if well, why smitest thou me? 24 (Now Annas had sent him bound unto Caiaphas the high priest.) 25 And Simon Peter stood and warmed himself: They said therefore unto him, Art thou not also one of his disciples? He denied it, and said, I am not. 26 One of the servants of the high priest (being his kinsman whose ear Peter cut off) saith, Did I not see thee in the garden with him? 27 Peter then denied again, and immediately the cock crew.

Note here, 1. How insolently and injuriously an officer strikes our Saviour in this court of judicature; One of the officers struck Jesus with the palm of his hand. What had the holy and innocent Jesus done to deserve these buffetings? He only made use of the liberty which their law did allow him, which was not to accuse himself, but to put them upon the proof of those accusations which were brought against him. But from this instance of our Saviour's sufferings we learn, That Christ did endure painful buffetings, ignominious and contemptuous usage, even from inferior servants; giving his cheek to the smiter's, to testify that shame and reproachful usage which was deserved by us, and to sanctify that condition to us whenever it is allotted for us. 2. The meek and gentle reproof which the Lord Jesus gives to this rude officer; he doth not strike him dead upon the place, nor cause that arm to wither which was stretched forth against the Lord's anointed; but only lets him know, that there was no reason for his striking of him. Where note, That though our Saviour doth not revenge himself, yet he vindicates himself, and defends himself both with law and reason: If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil; but if well, why smitest thou me? Hence we learn, 1. That we are not literally to understand the command Mat. v. of turning the cheek to him that smites us. For Christ himself did not this, but defends the innocency of his words. (2.) That to stand up in defence of our own innocency, is not contrary either to the duties of patience and forgiveness, or to the practice and example of our Lord Jesus. Note, 3. That when the soldier had struck Christ upon the cheek, he did not turn to him the other also, according to Mat. v. 39. Which evidently shews, that that precept, If they smite thee on one cheek, turn the other also, commands only this, rather than to take revenge, we should bear a second injury. Christians ought rather to suffer a double wrong, than to seek a private revenge: Christianity obliges us to bear many injuries patiently, rather than to avenge one privately; but though it bind upon hands for private revenge, yet it doth not shut our mouths from complaining to public authority. Christ's own practice here expounds the precept elsewhere Mat. v. 2. For he complains here of the officer's injustice in smiting him before the judicatory, and challenges the man to bear witness of the evil. Lastly, How our Lord was not only buffeted, but bound, and sent bound from Annas to Caiaphas, from Caiaphas to Pilate, from Pilate to Herod, and from Herod to Pilate again: And all this on foot through the streets of Jerusalem, from one end of the city to the other; partly to render his compassion more public, being a gazing stock to the world, and a spectacle both to angels and men. And his condescending to go bound from one high priest to another, and from one tribunal to another, teaches his people what delinquents they were before the tribunal of God, and what they deserved by reason of sin; even a sentence of eternal condemnation at the tribunal of a just and holy God.

28 ¶ Then led they Jesus from Caiaphas unto the hall of judgment: and it was early, and they themselves went not into the judgment hall, lest they should be defiled: but that they might eat the passover.

There were two courts of judicature which our blessed Saviour was brought before and condemned by: 1. That ecclesiastical court or sanhedrim, in which the high-priest sat as judge: Here he was condemned to death for blasphemy. 2. The civil court or judgment-hall, where Pontius Pilate, the Roman governor, sat judge, who, because he was a Gentile, they would not go into his house, lest they should be defiled: for they accounted it a legal pollution, to come into the house of a Gentile. Where note, The notorious hypocrisy of the Jews; they scruple the defiling of themselves by coming near the judgment-hall, where Pilate sat, but make no scruple at all to defile themselves with the guilt of that innocent blood which Pilate shed. When persons are over zealous for ceremonial observations, they are oftentimes too remiss with reference to moral duties. They brought him to the judgment hall; but they themselves went not in, lest they,

29 Pilate then went out to them, and said, What accusation bring you against this man? 30 They answered and said unto him, If he were not a malefactor, we would not have delivered him up unto thee.

Note here, 1. How Pilate humours these Jews in their superstition. They scruple to go into the judgment-hall to him; he therefore goes out to them, and demands what accusation they had against Christ. They charge him here only for being a malefactor, or an evil doer in the general; but else where Luke xxiii. they particularly accuse him, 1. For perverting the nation." 2. "For forbidding to pay tribute to Cæsar." 3. "For saying that he himself was Christ a King." All which was filthy calumny; yet Christ underwent the reproach of it without opening his mouth: Teaching us, when we lie under calumny and unjust imputation, to imitate him, who opened not his mouth but committed his cause to him that judgeth uprightly.

31 Then Pilate said unto them, Take ye him, and judge him according to your law. The Jews therefore said unto him, It is not lawful for us to put any man to death: 32 That the saying of Jesus might be fulfilled, which he spake, signifying what death he should die.

The Jews being now under the power of the Romans though they had a power of judging and censuring criminals in smaller matters, yet not in capital cases; they could not pronounce a sentence of death upon any person, say some: they might, and did, say others, punish blasphemers, by stoning them to death; but then their sentence is to be ratified by the Roman power: Accordingly, here they had in their ecclesiastical court condemned Christ for blasphemy, now they bring him to Pilate the Roman governor to confirm the sentence of death. From hence it appears, That Christ was the true Messias, being sent into the world when the sceptre was departed from Judah, according to that ancient prophecy of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 10. The sceptre shall not depart from Judah until Shiloh come. The Jews had no power absolutely to condemn any man, or put him to death; but this power the Roman emperor reserved to his own deputy. This contributed towards the fulfilling of our Saviour's words, Matt. xx. 19. That he should be delivered to the Gentiles, and should be crucified: Which was not a Jewish, but a Roman punishment. Had the Jews put him to death, they had stoned him. But Christ was to be made a curse for us by hanging upon a tree; and accordingly the Jews execute the counsel of God, though they knew it not, by refusing to put him to death themselves. Learn hence, How willing Christ was to undergo a shameful, painful, and accursed death, that he might testify his love unto, and procure a blessing for his people. Thus the saying of Jesus was fulfilled, which he spake, &c.

33 Then Pilate entered into the judgment-hall again, and called Jesus, and said unto him, Art thou the king of the Jews? 34 Jesus answered him, Sayest thou this of thyself, or did others tell it thee of me? 35 Pilate answered, Am I a Jew? Thine own nation, and the chief priests have delivered thee unto me: What hast thou done? 36 Jesus answered, My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews: but now is my kingdom not from hence.

Note here, 1. Pilate's ensnaring question, Art thou the king of the Jews? How jealous are great men of Jesus Christ, and how afraid they are of his kingdom, power and authority, as if it would be prejudicial to their authority and power in the world, which was far enough from Christ's thoughts! 2. The wisdom and caution of our Saviour's answer; he neither affirms nor denies. Though whenever we speak we are bound to speak the truth, yet we are not bound at all times to speak the whole truth. Christ tells him therefore, that upon the supposition that he was a king, yet his kingdom was not earthly, but a spiritual kingdom; he was no temporal king, to rule over his subjects with temporal power and worldly pomp, but a spiritual king, in and over his church only, to order the affairs, and look after the government thereof. Learn hence, That Christ as God hath an universal kingdom of power and providence even over the highest of men, and as a Mediator hath a spiritual kingdom in and over his church church. 2. That it is a clear evidence that Christ's kingdom is spiritual, in as much as it is not carried on by violence and force of arms, as worldly kingdoms are, but by spiritual means and methods: If my kingdom were of this world, my servants would fight for me; but now is my kingdom not from hence.

37 Pilate therefore said unto him, Art thou a king then? Jesus answered, Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice.

Pilate asks him again directly and expressly, Art thou a King or not? Our Saviour answers, "Thou sayest that I am a King, and so it is indeed as thou sayest; I am a King, and the King of the Jews too; but not a temporal King, to rule over them after the manner of earthly Kings, with temporal power, and worldly pomp and splendor; but I am a spiritual king, to rule and govern, not only the Jews, but my whole church consisting both of Jews and Gentiles, after a spiritual manner." Note here, 1. The dominion and sovereignty of Jesus Christ, he has a kingdom; My kingdom. 2. The condition and qualification of this kingdom, negatively expressed: My kingdom is not of this world. 3. The use and end of this kingdom, that the truth may have place among the children of men for their salvation; To this end was I born, and came into the world, to bear witness unto the truth. 4. The subjects of Christ's kingdom declared: Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice: That is, every one who is by divine grace disposed to believe and love the truth, will hear and obey Christ's doctrine.

38 Pilate saith unto him, What is truth? And when he had said this, he went out again unto the Jews and said unto them, I find in him no fault at all. 39 But ye have a custom that I should release unto you one at the passover: will ye therefore that I release unto you the king of the Jews? 40 Then cried they all again, saying, Not this man, but Barrabbas. Now Barrabbas was a robber.

Note here, 1. The question Pilate put to Christ, What is truth? A most noble and important question, had it been put forth with an honest heart, with a mind fairly disposed for information and satisfaction; but it is evident, Pilate's inquiry was not serious: nay it is generally thought that Pilate asked this question in scorn, contempt and derision; for he stays not for our Lord's answer, but as soon as he started his query, went off the bench in haste. Learn hence, That this question, What is truth? or how, may we come to the knowledge of the truth? is of unspeakable use and importance, and the question whereon the whole frame and constitution of religion depends; because truth is claimed by all parties of men, by all professors of religion. Ask the different parties, from the old gentleman at Rome, to the poorest Quaker and Muggletonian, Where is truth? and they will all tell you, They are in the possession of it: Every sect hath thus much of popery with it, that the professors of it think themselves infallible, and every one cries out, Here is truth. But God hath given us a two-fold light to search for truth; namely, the light of reason, and the light of scripture, or divine revelation. The former Solomon calls the candle of the Lord, set up in our breasts by God, on purpose to discover truth unto us. God allows us, yea, enjoins us, the free and impartial use of our understandings and judgments, in order to the finding out of divine truth; but because nature's light, or the light of natural reason is not clear and bright enough to give us a prospect of supernatural truths, (for nature and reason can never dictate those things which depend only upon God's free grace and good pleasure; such as the doctrine of a Saviour and Redeemer, and the method of man's Salvation by the sufferings of the Son of God) it has been blasphemy, once to have supposed such things, had not God revealed them in scripture: Therefore the second standard of divine truth is the infallible word of God. The gospel of Christ is the way and the truth; Truth came by Jesus Christ. And would men be ruled and conducted by these unalterable standards of truth, namely, right reason and divine revelation, they would easily agree in their judgments what is to be believed, and all duties and controversies would vanish. Right reason and inspired scriptures are the best judges of controversies; they being the fixed standards and measures of divine truth, can best resolve Pilate's question here, and tell us, What is truth. 2. How unwilling, how very unwilling Pilate was to be the instrument of our Saviour's death: He came forth three several times, and tells the Jews that he finds no fault in him; he bids them take him and judge him according to their law; Pilate, a pagan, absolves Christ, whilst the hypocritical Jews, that heard his doctrine, and saw his miracles, do condemn him. 3. Pilate having absolved Christ, I find no fault in him, endeavours next to release him, and takes occasion from their custom of having a prisoner released to them at their feast, to insinuate his desire that they should chuse Christ: Ye have a custom that I should release unto you one at the passover. Lastly, How the Jews prefer Barrabbas, a robber, before the holy and innocent Jesus; They all cried out, saying, not this man, but Barrabbas. Learn hence, That no persons, how wicked and vile soever, are so odious in the eyes of the enemies of God, as Christ himself was: and his friends and followers now are: Christ did find it thus in his own person when on earth: Barrabbas a robber was preferred before him; and now he is in heaven, he suffers in his members, the filth of the world being preferred before them.

CHAP. XIX.

THEN Pilate therefore took Jesus, and scourged him.

Note here, 1. That as the death of the cross was a Roman punishment, so it was the manner of the Romans to whip their malefactor's before they crucified them. Accordingly, Pilate took Jesus and scourged him. Oh! amazing sight, the great God of heaven and earth is lashed and scourged scourged like a base slave. Behold! hard hearted sinner, the lashes wherewith thy Redeemer is cruelly tormented, were to preserve thee from the severer lashes of thine own accusing and condemning conscience, and to save thee from being lashed by the rage and fury of devils to all eternity. 2. How unwilling, how very unwilling Pilate was to be the instrument of our Saviour's death; it is very evident, that he had a mind to release him; and it is concluded that Pilate wasthus forward to scourge Christ, hoping that the Jews would have been satisfied with this lighter punishment, and to have dismissed him. From this instance we may gather, that hypocrites within the pale of the visible church, may be guilty of such tremendous acts of wickedness, as the conscience of an Infidel and Pagan may boggle at and protest against. Pilate, a Pagan, absolves Christ, and seeks to release him, whilst the hypocritical Jews, who had heard his doctrine, and saw his miracles, condemn him. 3. How wretchedly Pilate suffers himself to be overcome with the Jews importunity, and, contrary to the light of his own reason and conscience, delivers the holy and innocent Jesus, first to be scourged and then crucified. Learn thence, That it is a vain apology for sin, when persons pretend that it was not committed with their own consent, but at the instigation and importunity of others. For such is the frame and constitution of man's soul, that none can make it either wicked or miserable, without his own consent: Then Pilate took Jesus and scourged him.

2 And the soldiers platted a crown of thorns and put in on his head, and they put on him a purple robe, 3 And said, Hail, King of the Jews: And they smote him with their hands.

Behold here, 1. The crown which they prepared for him, a crown of thorns, and with great cruelty they press it close to his sacred temples, whilst those sharp pointed briars piercing those tender parts, let out that blood which in a short time was to be more freely poured forth for the redemption of captive souls. The next part of our Saviour's sufferings consisted of cruel mockings: Christ had owned himself to be the king of the Jews; that is, a spiritual King, in and over his church: But the Jews expecting that the Messiah should have appeared in the pomp of an earthly prince; and finding it to be quite otherwise in our Saviour, they look upon him as a deceiver and impostor, and accordingly treat him as a mocking, with all the marks of derision and scorn: For, First, they put a crown upon his head, but a very ignominious and painful one; A crown of thorns: They put a sceptre in his hand, but it was that of a reed; a robe of scarlet or purple upon his body; and then bowed their knees unto him, as they were wont to do before their princes, crying, Hail, King. thus were all the marks of scorn imaginable put upon our dear Redeemer; yet what they did in jest, God permitted to be done in earnest; for all these things were ensigns and marks of sovereignty, and almighty God caused the royal dignity of his Son to shine forth, even in the midst of his greatest abasement. Whence was all this jeering and sport but to stout majesty? And why did the Son of God undergo all this ignomy, disgrace, and shame, but to show what was due unto us for our sins; as also to give us an example, to bear all the scorn, reproach, and shame imaginable, for the sake of him, who for the joy that was set before him, despised the shame, as well as endured the cross? Verily nothing was omitted that either the malice of men, or the rage of devils could possibly invent, either to torment or reproach him. but with what a lamb-like meekness, with what an astonishing patience, did he undergo these trials, both for our good, and in our stead!

4 Pilate therefore went forth again, and saith unto them, Behold, I bring him forth to you, that ye may know that I find no fault in him. 5 Then came Jesus forth, wearing the crown of thorns, and the purple robe. And Pilate saith unto them, Behold the man. 6 When the chief priests therefore and officers saw him, they cried out, saying, Crucify him, crucify him. Pilate saith unto them, Take ye him, and crucify him: for I find no fault in him,

Note here, 1. The great variety of our Saviour's sufferings; he is made the foot ball of cruelty and scorn; his sacred body is stript of its garments, and his back disguised with purple robes; his tender temples wounded with a thorny crown; his face spit upon, his cheeks buffeted, his head smitten, his hand sceptered with a reed. By his wearing a crown of thorns, he took away the bitterness of that curse; which our sins brought upon the earth, Gen. iii. 18. Thorns and briars shall it bring forth: Christ, by his bitter and bloody sufferings, has turned all the curses of his people into crowns and blessings. 2. The noble testimony given of Christ's innocency by the mouth of Pilate, I find in him no fault at all: He doth not say, I find him not guilty of what is laid to his charge; but gives an universal testimony of our Lord's innocency: I find no fault at all in him. In spite of all malice, innocency shall find some friends and abettors. Rather than Christ shall want witnesses, Pilate's mouth shall be opened for his justification: how fain would he have freed Jesus, whom he found faultless! Our Lord found more compassion from Pilate, an Heathen, than he did from them of his own nation. Pilate would have saved him, but they cried out for his blood: Hypocrites within the visible church may be guilty of such monstrous acts of wickedness, as the consciences of heathens, without the church, may boggle at and protest against. Pilate, a pagan, pronounces Christ innocent, whilst the hypocritical Jews, who had heard his doctrine and seen his miracles, do condemn him. 3. Who influenced the main body of the Jews, to desire Pilate to put Jesus to death; it was the chief priests and elders, they persuaded the multitude: Wo be to the common people, when their guide and leaders are corrupt; and wo be unto them much more, if they follow their wicked pernicious counsels: the Jews here followed their guides the chief priests, but it was to their own destruction, as well as their leaders: When the blind lead the blind, both fall into the ditch.

7 The Jews answered him, We have a law, and by our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God. When Pilate therefore heard heard that saying, he was the more afraid; 9 And went again into the judgment hall, and saith unto Jesus, whence art thou? but Jesus gave him no answer.

Note here, 1. How ambitious the chief priests were that Christ should die under a colour of law: We have a law, and by our law he ought to die. The law which they allude to, is the law for putting false prophets and blasphemers to death; of which number they conclude Christ to be, because he made himself the Son of God; whereas he did not make himself so, or only pretend to be so, but really and indeed was so; to wit, the eternal Son of God. Such as are indeed blasphemers, and do arrogate to themselves what is proper to God only, by the law of God they ought to be put to death; but Christ was not guilty of the violation of that law; for he was indeed the Son of God, and did not make himself so. 2. How full of fear the conscience of Pilate was, when the Jews told him that Jesus made himself the Son of God; he was afraid to condemn him, not knowing but that he might be some divine and extraordinary person, and consequently might draw divine vengeance on his own head. Learn hence, That serious thoughts of a Deity will strike terror even into a natural conscience, especially when the sinner is following a course which his own judgment cannot approve; when Pilate heard of Christ's being the Son of God, he was afraid, knowing what he had done to him, was against his own conscience. 3. The question Pilate puts to Christ upon this occasion, Whence art thou? that is What is thy original or parentage? Art thou a divine person or not? Our blessed Saviour being unwilling to obstruct his own sufferings, or to discover any thing that might hinder Pilate from proceeding against him, would give him no answer, having before made a reasonable and sufficient defence. O how ready was Christ to lay down his life for sinners, and how willing to pay that ransom for his people, which the justice of God required.

10 Then saith Pilate unto him, Speakest thou not unto me? knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee, and have power to release thee? 11 Jesus answered, thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above: therefore he that delivered me to thee hath the greater sin.

Note here, 1. How offended Pilate was at Christ's silence and how unreasonably he boasts of his power and authority; Have not I power to crucify thee, and power to release thee? It is the great sin and snare of men in power, to forget from whom they derive their power, and to think that they may employ their power as they please. 2. The piety and meekness of our Saviour's answer, Thou couldest have no power against me, unless it were given thee from above. That is, thou hast no power over me, nor couldest thou inflict any punishment upon me, were it not that my Father had, in his great wisdom, divine counsel and for glorious ends, permitted it so to be. Learn, That Christ's being under the power of any man, how great and eminent soever, did flow from the peculiar dispensation of God, who, in his wife and wonderful counsel, so ordered it; and ordained it, for the redemption and salvation of his people; he was above all human power as God, and no ways obnoxious to Pilate's power, being a perfectly innocent man.

3. How Christ charges his death more upon Judas and the Jews, than upon Pilate and the Gentiles: They that delivered me to thee have the greater sin. Not that Pilate was excused from sin, in delivering Christ to be crucified; he sinned heinously in abusing his power, but Judas sinned more in delivering him up to the chief priests, and the chief priests in delivering him up to Pilate, than Pilate himself, whom they made a tool to serve their malice and revenge; they had better means of knowledge than he, and so sinned more against light than he; and consequently their light was greater, and their condemnation heavier than his. Learn thence, That the greater means of light and knowledge persons sin against, the more aggravated is their guilt, and the more heightened will be their condemnation: He that delivered me unto thee, hath the greater sin.

12 And from thenceforth Pilate sought to release him: but the Jews cried out, saying, If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend: who-soever maketh himself a king, speaketh against Cæsar. 13 When Pilate therefore heard that saying, he brought Jesus forth, and sat down in the judgment-seat, in a place that is called the Pavement, but in the Hebrew, Gabbatha.

Still observe, how unwilling Pilate was to put Christ to death: Conscience bid him spare, popularity bids him kill; how frequently and how fervently did he contend with the Jews, till they make it a state case, and tacitly accuse him for a traitor to the Roman emperor, if he released him; If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend. When Pilate heard that, he delivers up the innocent Jesus to be crucified, Hence learn That the natural consciences of men and the innate notions of good and evil, may carry men on a great way in opposing that which is barefaced iniquity; but, at last, either fear or shame will over rule, if there be not a superior and more noble principle. Though Pilate's conscience acquitted Christ, and his mouth had declared that he had found no fault at all in him; yet fear of Cæsar's displeasure causes him to deliver up to death the holiest and best of men, against his judgment and his conscience: When Pilate heard that, he brought Jesus forth unto them.

14 And it was the preparation of the passover, and about the sixth hour: and he saith unto the Jews, behold your king. 15 But they cried out, away with him, away with him, crucify him. Pilate saith unto them, Shall I crucify your king? The chief priests answered, We have no king but Cæsar. 16 Then delivered he him therefore unto them to be crucified.—

Note here, How careful the Holy Ghost is to record and set down the time when Pilate gave sentence against Christ. In general, it was on the day of the preparation for the passover; that is, the day immediately before it, when they prepared prepared every thing needful for the solemnization; and in particular, it was about the sixth hour of that day. St. Mark calls it the third hour, St. John the sixth; but this is easily reconciled thus; the Jews divided the day into four quarters, which they called hours: the first was called the third hour, which answers to our ninth; the second called the sixth hour, answering our twelfth; the third, called the ninth hour, answering our three in the afternoon the fourth, called the twelfth hour, which was the time of their retirement from labour, and beginning of the first night watch. Now the whole time, from the third hour to the sixth, that is, from nine to twelve, was called the third hour; and the whole intervening time, from the sixth to the ninth, that is from twelve to three, is called the sixth hour, and so of the rest. Now when St. John says, it was about the sixth hour when Christ was condemned by Pilate, and led away to be crucified, and St. Mark says it was the third hour, we are to understand, that St. Mark takes in the whole time of the third hour, from nine to twelve, and St. John saying it was about the sixth hour, implies, that it was near twelve; so that between the hours of nine and twelve, our Lord was sentenced and led away to his cross, about twelve fastened to his cross, upon which he hung till the ninth hour; that is, to about three in the afternoon; during which time, there was such an eclipse of the sun, as did occasion darkness over all the earth. Learn hence, The great love and condescension of Christ in stooping so low, to have his sufferings lengthened out upon our accounts, to expiate our guilt which deserveth eternal sufferings; that he might by his example, warn us to prepare for trials of long continuance, and sanctify a state of continual affliction to us. Behold the son of God harrassed all night before he suffered, hurried from place to place, posted backward and forward, from Pilate to Herod, and from Herod to Pilate, wearied, scourged, buffeted crowned with thorns, at last nailed to his cross, and hanging thereupon from about twelve to three, in exquisite torture of body, and under the sense of his Father's wrath in his soul. O Lord! thy kindness towards us, is matchless and inimitable, never was love like thine!

—And they took Jesus and led him away. 17 And he bearing his cross, went forth into a place called, the place of a skull, which is called in the Hebrew Golgotha: 18 Where they crucified him, and two other men with him, on either side one, and Jesus in the midst.

Note here, 1. That it was a custom among the Romans to cause the person condemned to crucifying, to carry his own cross; accordingly our Saviour bare his own cross part of the way, till fainting under the burden of it, they laid it upon another, not out of mercy, but malice, reserving him for a more public death; they were loath he should go away in a fainting fit. But why could not Christ bear his own cross, who was able to bear the sins of the whole world, when hanging upon the cross? Answer 1. Probably, the Jews malice provided him a cross of extraordinary greatness, proportionable to the crimes they charged him with. 2. He was much debilitated and weakened, with his long watching and sweating the night before, 3. The sharp edges of the cross grating his late whipped and galled shoulders, might occasion the fresh bleeding of his wounds and his weakening thereby. 4. Hereby he gave the world a demonstration of the truth of his humanity, that he was in all things like unto us, with respect to his human nature, and the common infirmities of that nature. Herein like Isaac, Christ cheerfully carried the wood on which he was to be offered up a sacrifice to divine justice. Note 2. The infamous company which our Lord suffered with, two thieves; on either side one, and himself in the midst: It had been a sufficient disparagement to our blessed Redeemer, to be sorted with the best of men; but to be numbered with the scum of mankind, is such an indignity as confounds our thoughts. This was designed by the Jews to dishonour and disgrace our Saviour the more, and to persuade the world that he was the greatest of offenders. But God over-ruled this, for fulfilling an ancient prophecy concerning the Messiah, Isa. liii. ult. And he was numbered with the transgressors.

19 ¶ And Pilate wrote a title, and put in on the cross. And the writing was, JESUS OF NAZARETH THE KING OF THE JEWS. 20 This title then read many of the Jews: for the place where Jesus was crucified was nigh to the city; and it was written in Hebrew, and Greek, and Latin. 21 Then said the chief priests of the Jews to Pilate, Write not, The king of the Jews; but that he said, I am king of the Jews. 22 Pilate answered, What I have written, I have written.

Note, here: 1. The inscription wrote by Pilate over our suffering Saviour; This is Jesus of Nazareth, the king of the Jews. It was the manner of the Romans, when they crucified a Malefactor, to publish the cause of his death in capital letters over their head, that so the equity of their proceedings might more clearly appear to the people. Now it is observable how wonderfully the wisdom of God over-ruled the heart and pen of Pilate to draw this title, which was truly honourable, and fix it to his cross. Learn hence, that the regal dignity of Christ was openly proclaimed by an enemy, and in the time of his greatest reproaches and sufferings. Pilate, without his own knowledge, did our Saviour an eminent piece of service; he did that for Christ which none of his disciples durst do: not designedly, but from the special over-ruling providence of God. No thanks to Pilate for all this, because the highest services performed to Christ undesignedly, shall neither be accepted nor rewarded by God. 2. How the Jews endeavoured to alter this: Write not, the king of the Jews, but that he said, I am king of the Jews. The Jews thought it would be a disgrace to them, that Christ should be reported abroad to have been their king, therefore they desire an alteration of the writing: but Pilate, that wrote in honour of Christ stoutly defends what he had done: To all their importunity he returns this resolute answer: What I have written, I have written. Surely the constancy of Pilate at this time, must be attributed to special divine providence. How wonderful was it, that he who before was inconstant as a reed should now be a pillar of brass! Whence is this, but from the God of spirits moving upon his spirit to write, and to defend what was written? The providence of God hath a prospect beyond the understanding of all creatures.

23 ¶ Then the soldiers, when they had crucified Jesus, took his garments, (and made four parts, to every soldier a part) and also his coat: now the coat was without seam, woven from the top throughout.

24 They said therefore among themselves, Let us not rent it, but cast lots for it, whose it shall be: that the scripture might be fulfilled, which saith, They parted my raiment among them, and for my vesture they did cast lots. These things therefore the soldiers did.

Here we have recorded our Saviour's sufferings from the soldiers; they strip him of his garments, before they fastened him to the cross, and divided those garments which could be parted amongst them, and cast lots for his woven coat, which could not be divided. Little did these vile soldiers think that they were now fulfilling a scripture prophecy: Yet so it was, this action of their's being foretold Psal. xxii. 18. They part my garments among them, and cast lots for my vesture. Not that the prophecy made them do it, but was fulfilled by their doing it. From hence we may gather, that Christ suffered naked upon the cross; as naked say some, as he came into the world. We had made ourselves naked to our shame; and Christ became naked to cover our shame. If, sensible of our own nakedness and shame; we flee unto him by faith, we shall be clothed with robes of righteousness, and garments of everlasting praise.

25 ¶ Then there stood by the cross of Jesus, his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene. 26 When Jesus therefore saw his mother, and the disciple standing by, whom he loved, he saith unto his mother, Woman, behold thy son, 27 Then saith he to the disciple, Behold thy mother. And from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home.

These words contain our Saviour's affectionate recommendation of his distressed mother, to the care of a dear disciple. It was an argument of Christ's wonderful love to her, that when he was nailed to the cross, and ready to die he was more concerned for his mother's sorrows, than for his own sufferings. Now was Simeon's prophecy fulfilled Luke ii. 36. A sword shall pass through thine own soul also. Her soul was pierced for him both as his natural mother, and also as a mystical member of him her head: therefore Christ applies these comfortable words as a salve to her wounds, even whilst his own were bleeding unto death. Woman, behold thy Son. Where note, He calls her woman, and not mother, he doth not say, Mother, behold thy Son; but, Woman, behold him. Not that Christ was ashamed of, or unwilling to own her as his mother; but either, 1. Fearing that calling her by that name should augment her grief and trouble. Or else, 2. To intimate his change of state and condition, that being ready to die, and return to his Father in heaven, he was above all earthly relations, and knew no one after the flesh, no, not his very mother; yet see at the same time, when he was above her and about to leave her, how his care manifested itself for her, when his soul and body were full of anguish to the very brim; yet all this makes him not in the least unkindful of so dear a relation. Thence learn, That Christ's tender care of his mother, even in the time of his greatest distress, is an excellent pattern for all children to imitate and follow to the end of the world. St. John here obeyed Christ's command, and imitated his example; he took her to his own home; that is, he treated her with all that dutiful regard which a tender and indulgent mother challenges from a pious and obedient son. No personal trial or trouble upon ourselves doth exempt us from the performance of our duty towards others, especially towards our near and dear relations: Christ in the extremity of his sufferings, accounted it his duty to take care of, and provide for his dear mother; teaching us by his example, that children ought to evidence that they honour their parents by taking care of them in their decayed and desolate condition. Again, inasmuch as St. John took care of the holy mother after her dear Son's death, That disciple took her to his own home; we learn, That the Lord never removes our comfort, and takes away the means of subsistence from his people, but he raises up another in the room of it. It is very probable that Joseph her husband was before this time dead, and Jesus her Son was now dying; but still God provides; he raises up St. John to take care of her; who takes her to his own home, and looks upon her as one of his family. But how comes St. John above the rest to have this honourable service put upon him, and this high trust reposed in him? Answer, The text tells us, he was the disciple whom Jesus loved; that is, in a more particular manner, treating him with greater freedom and familiarity than the rest; he also evidenced more love unto and more courage and resolution for Christ, than the rest of his disciples, he standing by the cross, when they got afar off, Mark xv. 50. Thence we learn, That such as are beloved of Christ, as do keep close unto him, and express most zeal and resolution for him, shall be peculiarly honoured by him, and be employed in the highest services for him.

28 ¶ After this, Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the scripture might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst. 29 Now there was set a vessel full of vinegar: and they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop, and put it to his mouth.

Note here, 2. The affliction or suffering which our Saviour complained of, and that is, thirst; there are two sorts of thirst, the one natural and proper, the other spiritual and figurative; Christ felt both at this time. His body thirsted by reason of those agonies which it laboured under: His soul thirsted under vehement desires, and fervent longings, to accomplish that great and difficult work he was now about. 2. The design and end of our Lord's complaint: That the scripture might be fulfilled, he saith, I thirst. Our Saviour finding that all was accomplished, which he was to do before his death, but only the fulfilling that one scripture, Psal. lxxix. 21. They gave me vinegar to drink; he for the accomplishment thereof, said, I thirst. Whence note, That such were the agonies and extreme sufferings of our Lord Jesus Christ upon the cross, that they drank up his very spirits, and made him cry, I thirst. 2. That when Christ cried out I thirst, it was to shew, that whatever was foretold by the prophets concerning him, was exactly accomplished, and even to a circumstance fulfilled in him. That the scripture might be fulfilled in him.

30 When Jesus therefore had received the vinegar he said, it is finished: And he bowed his head, and gave up the ghost.

Note here, 1. Our Lord's last words, It is finished. 2. His last act, He bowed his head, and gave up the ghost. As to the former, his last words, It is finished; this might be the probable intendment of it: 1. It is finished; that is, now is my Father's counsel concerning me accomplished, and now is the promise that he made of my becoming a sacrifice for sin fulfilled; both my Father's purpose and my Father's promise are now receiving their final accomplishment. 2. It is finished; that is, the scriptures are now fulfilled; all types that did prefigure me, all prophetic predictions that were made of me, all the Jewish sacrifices that pointed at me, have now received their final accomplishments in me, and are abolished in my death. 3. It is finished; that is, my sufferings are now ended, my race is run, my work is done, I am now putting my last hand to it, my death is before me, I have finished the work, the whole work which I came into the world for, doing as well as dying; all is upon the matter completed, it is just finishing. It will be instantly finished. Again, 4. It is finished; that is, the fury and malice, the rage and revenge of my enemies is now ended, they have done their worst; the chief priests and the soldiers, the judges and witnesses, the executioners and tormentors, have all tired out themselves with the exercise of their own malice; but now their spite and spleen, their envy and enmity is ended, and the Son of God is at rest. 5. It is finished; that is, the glorious work of man's redemption and salvation is perfected and performed, consummated and completed, the price is paid, satisfaction is given, redemption is purchased, and salvation insured to a miserable world. Wo unto us, if Christ had left but one farthing of our debt to the justice of God unpaid, we must have lain in hell to all eternity, as being insolvent; but Christ has by one offering forever perfected them that are sanctified. Learn hence, That Jesus Christ hath perfected, and completely finished the great work of redemption committed to him by God the Father. Note 2. Our Saviour's last act; He bowed his head and gave up the ghost. Whence learn, The spontaneity and voluntariness of Christ's sufferings, how freely he surrendered to death: his soul was not rent from him, but yielded up to God by him; Christ was a volunteer in dying; though his death was a violent death, yet it was a voluntary sacrifice: He bowed his head, and gave up the ghost.

31 The Jews therefore, because it was the preparation, that the bodies should not remain upon the cross on the sabbath-day (for that sabbath-day was an high day) besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away. 32 Then came the soldiers, and brake the legs of the first, and of the other which was crucified with him. 33 But when they came to Jesus, and saw that he was dead already they brake not his legs. 34 But one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith came there out blood and water. 35 And he that saw it bare record, and his record is true: and he knoweth that he saith true that ye might believe. 36 For these things were done, that the scripture should be fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken. 37 And again another scripture saith, They shall look on him, whom they pierced.

These verses contain several remarkable passages, tending to the confirmation of our faith, in the belief certainty and reality of our Saviour's death, in which the Jews, the soldiers, and St. John, do all give their several and sufficient evidences. Observe, 1. The Jews part in clearing up this truth; they desire Pilate (who had power alone to dispose of the dead bodies of condemned persons) that the legs of the crucified persons might be broken to hasten their death that so they might be taken away and buried; because according to the law, Duet. xxi. 22. 23. the land was defiled with those that were hanged, if not timely buried; and they judged, if the bodies of these persons did remain on the cross all that night, and the sabbath-day, which was an high day, (the ordinary sabbath, and the first day of the passover, or feast of unleavened bread meeting together it might pollute both them and their feast. Whence note, The cursed hypocrisy of these Jews; they look upon themselves as strictly bound to observe a outward ceremony, but their consciences never scruple to violate the weighty precepts of the moral law; they strictly observe the ceremonial precept, that the dead bodies should not remain upon the cross, but they scruple not to crucify the Son of God, and to use him with the utmost rigour, desiring his bones may be broken, 2. The soldiers part contributed to clear the truth of Christ's death; they execute what the Jews had desired, and Pilate granted, breaking the legs of the two thieves, but not of Jesus, because he was already dead; but one of the soldiers resolving to make sure work thrusts a spear into his side, and there came out straightway blood and water, proving that he was really dead. All which points out to us, that it is he who came by water and blood, 1 John v. 6. and that from the merit and efficacy of his death, there floweth our blood for the obtaining remission of sin, and water to regenerate and wash us from uncleanness. From the barbarous soldier's piercing of Christ's side after he was dead, we learn, That no cruelty was omitted towards Christ, either dead or alive, which might testify the great desert of our sin, nor was there any needful evidence wanting, which might make clear the truth of his death; the soldier's piercing of our Saviour's side, was at once an exercise of their cruelty, and an evidence of the certainty of Christ's death. 3. St. John's part in this evidence; he avouches, That Christ really died, and expressly affirms, that he saw with his own eyes for the confirmation of our faith; He saw that it bare record, and his record is true. And further shews, That by these actions of the soldiers, that was done, by which several scripture prophecies were fulfilled, and received their accomplishment; particularly, that of Exod. xii. 46. concerning the paschal lamb, which was a type of Christ, That a bone of it should not be broken; and that prediction, Zech. xii. 10. They shall look on him whom they have pierced. Learn hence, that Christ is the truth and substance of that type, the paschal lamb mentioned Exod. xii. and the true paschal sacrifice for us; therefore what was ordained concerning the paschal lamb, is here applied to Christ, as the substance of that type. A bone of him shall not be broken.

38. And after this, Joseph of Armathea, (being a disciple of Jesus, but secretly for fear of the Jews) besought Pilate that he might take away the body of Jesus; and Pilate gave him leave: he came therefore and took the body of Jesus. 39 And there came also Nicodemus (which at the first came to Jesus by night) and brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about an hundred pound weight. 40 Then they took the body of Jesus, and wound it in linen clothes, with spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury. 41 Now in the place where he was crucified there was a garden; and in the garden a sepulchre, wherein was never man yet laid. 42 There laid they Jesus therefore, because of the Jews preparation-day, for the sepulchre was nigh at hand.

This last paragraph of the chapter gives us an account of our Lord's honourable burial; such a funeral as never was, since graves were first digged. Where note, 1. Our Lord's body must be begged before it could be buried, the dead bodies of malefactors being in the power and at the disposal of the judge: Pilate grants it, and accordingly the dead body is taken down, wrapped in fine linen, and prepared for the sepulchre. 2. The persons who bestowed this honourable burial upon Christ, Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus, the one provided fine linen, and the other fine spices, and they jointly wound and embalmed his body after the Jewish manner; both of them worthy, though close disciples; Grace doth not always make a public and open show where it is; but as there is much sweet treasure unseen in the bowels of the earth, so there is much grace in the hearts of some saints, which the world takes little notice of. We read of none of the apostles at Christ's funeral; fear had put them, to flight; but Joseph and Nicodemus appeared boldly: If God strengthen the weak and leave the strong to the prevalency of their own fears, the weak shall be as David, and the strong as now. 3. The grave or sepulchre in which our Lord was buried, it was a sepulchre, in a garden, to expiate Adam's sin committed in a garden; as by the sin of the first Adam we were driven out of paradise, the garden of pleasure, so by the sufferings of a second Adam, who lay buried in a garden, we may hope for entrance into the heavenly paradise. And it was a new sepulchre, wherein never any man was laid, lest his adversaries should say, it was another that was risen, who was buried there before, or that he arose as one of the old prophets did, by touching the bones of some other dead person. 4. The manner of our Lord's funeral; it was hasty, public, and decent; it was hasty, by reason of the straitness of time, the sabbath was approaching, and all business is laid aside to prepare for that. Teaching us, How much it is our duty to dispatch our worldly business early on the eve of the Lord's day, that we may be the better prepared to sanctify that day: Again, Our Lord's funeral was public and open, all persons that would, might be spectators, to cut off occasion from any object, that there was deceit and fraud used in or about our Lord's burial; yet he was also interred decently; his holy body being wrapt in fine linen, and perfumed with spices, according to the Jewish custom. 5. The reasons why our Lord was thus buried, seeing he was to rise again in as short a time as other men lie by the walls: doubtless it was to declare the certainty of his death, and the reality of his resurrection, to fulfil the types and prophecies which went before of him; As Jonas being three days and three nights in the whale's belly: He was also buried to complete his humiliation this being the lowest step to which he could descend in his abased state. Finally, He went into the grave, that he might conquer death in his own territories. Lastly, Of what use our Lord's burial is to us his followers: It shews us the amazing depth of his humiliation, from what and to what his love brought him, even from the bosom of his Father to the bosom of the grave. It may also comfort us against the fears of death: the grave could not long keep Christ, it shall not always keep us: it was a loathsome prison before, it is a perfumed bed now: he whose head is in heaven, need not fear to put his feet into the grave. Awake and sing, thou that dwellest in the dust, for the enmity of the grave is slain by Christ:

C H A P. XX.

This and the following chapter gives us an account of our Saviour's exaltation and victorious triumph over all his enemies, by his powerful resurrection. All the four evangelists do confirm the truth of it, by recording the several steps and degrees of it, by the manifestation of it. In this chapter Christ's resurrection is confirmed, first to Mary Magdalene, next to Peter and John, then to all the disciples, except Thomas.

THE first day of the week cometh Mary Magdalene early, when it was yet dark, unto the sepulchre, and seeth the stone taken away from the sepulchre.

In this verse is recorded how Mary Magdalene came early to the sepulchre, on the first day of the week to enquire about the dead body of our Lord Jesus. Where note,

That though her heart did burn with an ardent zeal and affection to her crucified Lord, yet the commanded duties of the sabbath were not omitted by her; she kept close, and silently spent that holy day in a mixture of grief and hope: Her example is a good pattern of sabbath sanctification, and worthy of our christian imitation. 2. What magnanimity and courage is found in this weak woman: she followed Christ courageously, when his disciples left him cowardly; she accompanied him to his cross, she followed his hearse to the grave, when his disciples durst not appear; and now very early in the morning she goes to visit his sepulchre, fearing neither the darkness of the night, nor the presence of the watchmen. Learn thence, That courage is the special gift of God, and if he gives it to the feeble sex, even to timorous and fearful women, it is not in the power of man to make them afraid.

2 Then she runneth, and cometh to Simon Peter, and to the other disciple whom Jesus loved, and saith unto them, They have taken away the Lord out of the sepulchre; and we know not where they have laid him.

It was a great honour that God put upon this poor woman Mary Magdalene, that she has the first notice of our Saviour's resurrection, and is the first that discovers it to the apostles. But why had not the virgin Mary his disconsolate mother, this privilege conferred on her rather than Mary Magdalene, who had been a grievous sinner? Doubtless this was for the comfort of all true penitents, and administers great consolation to them: As the angels in heaven rejoice, much more doth Christ joy in the recovering of one repenting sinner, than in multitudes of holy and just persons (such was the blessed Virgin) who need no repentance.

3 Peter therefore went forth, and that other disciple, and came to the sepulchre. 4 So they ran both together: and the other disciple did out-run Peter, and came first to the sepulchre. 5 And he stooping down, and looking in, saw the linen clothes lying; yet he went not in. 6 Then cometh Simon Peter following him, and went into the sepulchre, and seeth the linen clothes lie: 7 And the napkin that was about his head, not lying with the linen clothes, but wrapped together in a place by itself. 8 Then went in also that other disciple which came first to the sepulchre, and he saw, and believed. 9 For as yet they knew not the scripture, that he must rise again from the dead.

Here note, 1. How Peter and John, moved with Mary Magdalenes words, They have taken away the Lord, &c. do run to the sepulchre to satisfy themselves of the truth of it. Such as sincerely love Christ, upon the least intimation that he is missing, bestir themselves with great activity and diligence, that they may see him, or hear of him: Peter and John run to the sepulchre to see what was become of their holy Master. 2. That there was such clear evidence about Christ's grave, as made it apparent that he was indeed risen from the dead, and not conveyed away, either by friends or foes: It cannot be supposed that any of his friends (could they have come at it) would have so handled his holy body, as to carry it away naked; and for his foes had they stole away the body, they would never have left the fine linen behind them. 3. That when Christ arose from the grave, he left his grave-clothes behind him; whereas when Lazarus arose, he came forth with his grave-clothes about him; It teaches us, That Christ rose never to die more, but to live and reign forever; therefore he left his grave clothes in the grave, as never to make use of them more. But Lazarus was to die again, death was once more to have dominion over him: he therefore came forth with his grave clothes about him. Lastly, How ignorant the apostles were of the doctrine of Christ's resurrection and of the holy scriptures, which declared he was to rise again from the dead: They knew not the scriptures, that is, they did not heed and regard them, ponder them in their hearts, and feed upon them by faith.

10 Then the disciples went away again unto their own home. 11 ¶ But Mary stood without at the sepulchre, weeping: and as she wept, she stooped down, and looked into the sepulchre, 12 And seeth two angels in white, sitting, the one at the head, and the other at the feet where the body of Jesus had lain:

Here we have a description of the great love of Mary Magdalene, which she expressed towards Christ after his resurrection; she went to the sepulchre early, when it was yet dark; she hastily calls the disciples, Peter and John to the sepulchre; and she stays behind weeping at the sepulchre, when they were gone away to their own home. And as Mary first sought him, and longest sought him, so she first found him. Here note, 1. Mary's carriage and behaviour towards her Saviour; this is discovered by her patient attendance, she stood without at the sepulchre: by her passionate mourning, she stood at the sepulchre weeping: by her unwearied diligence, she stooped down and looked into the sepulchre: Here was great love indeed in this poor woman, a love stronger than death; a love which did out-strip and go beyond the greatest apostles, Learn, 1. That true love to Christ suffers not itself to be stinted or limited, no, not by the greatest examples: the weakest woman that truly loves Christ, may piously strive with the greatest apostle in this point: though he be learned, witer, more useful, and more eminent than any of us, yet it is holy and wise not to suffer ourselves to be exceeded by any in our love to Christ; every christian may strive to exceed any one in grace, and to attain the highest place in the kingdom of heaven. 2. That strong love is valiant and undaunted, it will grapple and encounter with the strongest opposition Mary fears nothing in seeking of her Lord, neither the darkness of the night, nor the terror of the soldiers, nor the malice of the Jews: Love is strong as death, and the flames thereof are vehement. Further, The success of Mary Magdalane's love to Christ, and unwearied attendance on his sepulchre; she found not the dead body of Christ, and it is well she did not; for if death could have held him, it would not have let us go. But though she found not her Lord in the grave, she found two of his servants there two angels: of all things in the world, one would least have expected to find an angel in a grave, spirits in the place of dead bodies, and immortality in the place of corruption. But from hence we learn, That such as sincerely seek the Lord, shall certainly find, if not the very thing which they seek, yet that which is much fitter and better for them; Mary did not find Christ's dead body, but she finds that which is more comfortable for her to find; namely, two angels to testify that he was risen. Where note, The posture of these angels described; the one sitting at the head, the other at the feet: It is matter of comfort to the members of Christ, that angels do not wait upon the head only, but upon the feet also; and it ought to be matter of imitation also. Let us imitate our blessed Saviour, in having not at our head only, but at our feet also; Many have an ambition to have an angel at their head, a great measure of light and knowledge there, but they care not for an angel at their feet, they delight not to walk answerably to their light and knowledge, they have an evangelical understanding and a diabolical conversation: it is sad for a man to have all his religion in his brain and tongue, and nothing in his heart and life.

13 And they say unto her, Woman, why weepest thou? she saith unto them, Because they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him. 14 And when she had thus said, she turned herself back, and saw Jesus standing, and knew not that it was Jesus. 15 Jesus saith unto her, woman, why weepest thou? whom seekest thou? She, supposing him to be the gardener, saith unto him, Sir, if thou have borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away.

Note here, 1. That the best company in the world will not satisfy or content such as are seeking for Jesus Christ, when they find not him whom their souls seek: Mary now enjoyed the presence and company of two angels, but this did not satisfy her in the absence of Christ himself. 2. How passionately did Mary mourn for the loss and want of Christ's bodily presence thereby giving testimony of her great affection towards him; but truly our love to Christ is best shewn, not by our passionate desires for his bodily presence, but by our holy longings after his spiritual presence in his word and ordinances here on earth, and his blessed and immediate presence in heaven. 3. How Christ may be present with, and very near unto his people, and yet not presently be discerned by them; Jesus stood by Mary, but she knew not that it was Jesus: her not expecting a living Christ, was one cause why she did not discern him. 4. How exceedingly Mary's thoughts were taken up with Christ: She saith to the gardener, If thou hast borne him hence: What him? She doth not say whom; but her heart was so taken up with Christ, and her mind so full of him, that she concluded every body would understand whom she meant, though she did not say whom she meant. Hence learn, 1. That the soul of a sincere believer is full of earnest and longing desires after Jesus Christ. 2. That such a soul is yet sometimes at a loss for Christ, and cannot tell where to find him. 3. That whilst the soul is at a loss for Christ, it's desires are often quicker and more stirring after Christ. This was the case of Mary here; with her spouse by night on her bed, and early in the morning, she sought whom her soul loved.

16 Jesus saith unto her, Mary. She turned herself, and saith unto him, Rabboni. which is to say, Master. 17 Jesus saith unto her, Touch me not: for I am not yet ascended to my Father: but go to my brethren, and say unto them, I ascend to my Father and your Father, and to my God and your God.

In the former of these verses, Christ makes himself known to Mary, and calleth her by her name. in the latter he gives her a prohibition and injunction. Note, 1. The prohibition, Touch me not; together with the reason of it, For I am not yet ascended to my Father. It is concluded by interpreters, that Mary Magdalene was now fallen at Christ's feet, and embraced them; that having found him whom her soul loved, she hugs him now, and hangs about him: but Christ forbids any further embracing, and rejects such testimonies of her love; as if he had said, Although I will allow you as much familiarity as shall satisfactorily convince you of the verity of my resurrection, yet you must not expect to converse with me in the bodily manner which you did before my death; for I am ascending to my Father, and must be enjoyed no longer after a corporeal, but spiritual manner. Learn hence, That our love to Jesus Christ is best shewn, not by our human passionate affections to his bodily presence, but by our spiritual communion with him by faith here on earth; in order to an immediate communion with him face to face in heaven.-- Christ now after his resurrection was advanced to a more spiritual condition, therefore refuses at Mary's hand the offices of human conversation, but expects of her the duties and services of spiritual devotion. 2. Christ's injunction: But go to my brethren, and say, I ascend to my Father, and your Father; to my God, and your God. Where note, The endearing title given to the disciples, My brethren: He had before his death called them his servants, his friends, his children; but now after his resurrection, he calls them his brethren: he became our brother by assuming our nature in his incarnation, he continues our brother by resuming that nature at his resurrection. Farther, that Christ calls his disciples brethren, after his exaltation and resurrection: thereby shewing, that the change of his condition had wrought no change in his affection towards his poor disciples; but those that were his brethren before, in the time of his humiliation and abasement, are so still, after his exaltation and advancement; Go to my brethren, and say: humility doth not only Go before honour, but dwells with honour, and doth evermore accompany it. Lastly, the good news or message of joy which Christ sends by Mary to his dear disciples; Say, I ascend to my Father, and your Father; to my God, and your God: as if nature and adoption gave the same interest: Christ calls God, his God, and and his disciples' God; his Father, and their Father; first his, and then their's, and their's because his. Learn hence That God for Christ's sake hath dignified believers with that near and dear relation of his being a Father to them in and through his Son; so that as they ought to carry it towards him like children by obedience, subjection, and resignation, so they may expect he will retain a fatherly affection towards them, and they may expect from him fatherly compassion, provision, protection, correction, and all things needful. Lastly, Remark from Christ's saying, I go to my God, and your God, the false inferences of the Socinians, viz. That because Christ styled God his God, hence, say they, it is evident that Christ is not God; but from those words it only follows, that he was not God according to that nature which ascended. Thus, Psal. xlv. it is said of Christ, God, even thy God, hath anointed thee; and yet he adds of the same person, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever.

18 Mary Magdalene came and told the disciples that she had seen the Lord, and that he had spoken these things unto her. 19 ¶ Then the same day at evening, being the first day of the week, when the doors were shut, where the disciples were assembled for fear of the Jews, came Jesus and stood in the midst, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you. 20 And when he had so said, he shewed unto them his hands and his side. Then were the disciples glad when they saw the Lord.

Our blessed Saviour's first appearing after his resurrection, having been to Mary Magdalene, as the former verses acquainted us, the same day at evening, when the doors were shut for fear of the Jews, Jesus miraculously, and, as to the disciples, insensibly opens the door, and stands in the midst of them and says, Peace be unto you, and shews them his hands and his side. Where note, 1. That it has been no strange thing in the church, that the best members of it have been put to frequent their assemblies with great fear and been forced to meet in the night, with great caution, because of the fury of the persecutors: Here Christ's own disciples were forced to meet together in the night, the doors kept shut for fear of the Jews. 2. Let Christ's disciples meet together never so privately, and with never so much hazard and Jeopardy, they shall have Christ's company with them; neither bolts, nor locks; nor fastened doors, shall hold Christ from them: When the doors were shut, Jesus came and stood in the midst of them. Lastly, The evidence which our Saviour offers to evince and prove the certainty of his resurrection: He shewed his disciples his hands and his side. Christ appealed to and admitted to the judgment of their senses, to assure them that it was his real body. And if we must not be allowed to believe our senses (as the Romish synagogue would persuade us) we shall want the best external evidence we can have to prove the truth of the christian religion; namely, the miracles of our Saviour; for how can we be assured those miracles were true, but by the judgment of our senses? Now, as our senses tell us that Christ's miracles were true, so they assure that the popish doctrine of transubstantiation is false.

21 Then said Jesus to them again, Peace be unto you: as my Father hath sent me, even so I send you. 22 And when he had this said, he breathed on them and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost. 23 Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained.

Note here, 1. The repetition of our Saviours endearing salutation to his disciples, Peace be unto you, Peace, be unto you. This was not more than might be needful, to signify his firm reconciliation to them, notwithstanding their late cowardice in forsaking him, and flying from him, when the storm fell upon him. 2. How Christ doth renew his disciples commission for the work of the ministry, who possibly were much discouraged with the remembrance of their faint-heartedness in the time of his sufferings; he doth therefore anew commissionate them, and sends them forth in these words, As my Father hath sent me: that is, to preach, plant, and propagate the Gospel; so send I you. By the same authority, and for the same ends, in part, for which I was sent by the Father, do I send you; namely, to gather, to govern, and instruct my church. Learn hence, That when Christ left the world, he did not leave the church destitute of gospel ministry, which shall continue to the end of the world. As Christ was sent by the Father, so are his ministers sent by him: and they may expect, having the same authority and commission, the same success and blessing; and the contempt cast upon them and their message, ultimately reflects upon God and Christ whose messengers they are. 3. How Christ that sends them forth, doth furnish them with the gifts of the Spirit. for their office: He breathed on them, and said, Receive ye the Holy Ghost: that is, the gift of the Holy Ghost. They had received the Holy Spirit before as a Spirit of sanctification, here they receive it in its extraordinary gifts to fit them for their office. And Christ's conferring the Holy Ghost, by breathing upon them, shews that the Holy Spirit proceeds as well from the Son, as from the Father. And as by Gods breathing, the first man was made a living soul: So by Christ's breathing on the apostles they were quickened; and extraordinarily enabled for the service they were called to. Learn hence, That when Christ sends forth any about his work, he will furnish them with endowments answerable to their vast employment; and the best furniture they can have, is the Holy Spirit in his gifts and qualifications suitable to their work: He breathed on them, and said, Receive ye the Holy Ghost. 4. How Christ asserts their authority in the discharge of their commission and declares, that when they act ministerially, according to their commission here on earth, is ratified in heaven; Whose soever sins ye remit they are remitted. d. Where note That there is a twofold power of remitting or forgiving sins: the one magisterial and authoritative; this belongs to Christ alone; the other ministerial and declarative; the belongs to Christ's ambassadors, who have a power in his name to bind and loose. It is a pious note of St. Austin upon upon this place, that Christ first conferred the Holy Ghost upon his apostles, and then said, Whose sins ye remit, they are remitted. thereby intimating, that it is not they, but the Holy Ghost in them, that puts away sin; for who can forgive sin, but God only? The power of forgiving sin, that man hath, is only to declare, that if men be truly and really penitent, their sins are forgiven them for the sake of Christ's satisfaction.

24 ¶ But Thomas, one of the twelve, called Didymus, was not with them when Jesus came. 25 The other disciples therefore said unto him, We have seen the Lord. But he said unto them, Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails; and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe.

What the cause of Thomas's absence was, is not declared; it is evident that he was not with the rest of the disciples when Christ appeared to them: and his absence had like to have cost him dear, even the loss of his faith: and he might have had reason for ever to have bewailed his absence from the meeting of the disciples; had not Christ been more merciful. Learn hence, That the letting slip of one holy opportunity may prove exceedingly prejudicial to the soul's advantage: It is wise and safe to lay hold of every opportunity for enjoying communion with God, and fellowship with his saints. Thomas's absence deprived him not only of the good news of Christ's being risen, but also of the sight of him, which the other disciples got by assembling together; and for want thereof Thomas is left under many doubts and fears. Verily, we know not what we lose, when we absent ourselves from the assembly of God's people. Such views of a crucified Jesus may be communicated to others, whilst we are absent, as would have confirmed our faith, and established our joy, had we been present. Farther, What a strange declaration Thomas makes of his obstinate unbelief, Except I see the print of the nails, and put my finger into his side, I will not believe. Where note, How strangely rooted unbelief is in the hearts of holy men, insomuch that they desire the objects of faith should fall under the view of their senses. Thomas carries his faith at his fingers ends: he will believe no more than he can see or feel; whereas faith is the evidence of things not seen. Oh! Thomas, how deplorable had been thy case, if Christ had never given thee that proof which was very unreasonable in thee to expect. But Christ takes compassion on him, and appears to him; and cures his obstinate unbelief, which he might have justly punished, as appears by the following verses.

26 ¶ And after eight days, again his disciples were within, and Thomas with them: then came Jesus, the doors being shut, and stood in the midst, and said, Peace be unto you. 27 Then saith he to Thomas, Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands: and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side: and be not faithless, but believing.

Note here, 1. Our Saviour's appearing again to his disciples, after his resurrection; it was eight days after the first arose, which was the first day of the week. Here note, That Christ's rising the first day of the week, and appearing on the next day of the week after to the disciples, and they observing that day for their solemn assemblies, and St Paul administering on that day the Lord's supper, Acts xx. and commanding on that day collections for the poor, 1 Cor. xvi. and St. John calling it the Lord's day, Rev. i. 10. From these authorities, and the primitive practice, we derive our Christian sabbath: For we do not find in all the scripture, one instance of any one congregation of christians only assembling upon the Jewish sabbath, but on the first day of the week, on which we ground our observation of that day. 2. The wonderful condescension of Christ to the weakness of Thomas's faith; he bids him reach forth his hand, and thrust it into his side. Not that Christ was pleased with, but only pitiful towards Thomas's infirmities; and it ought to be, no encouragement, to any person to follow his example, in seeking or expecting the like signs of their own prescribing for the helping of their faith. 3. How mercifully Christ over-ruled Thomas's unbelief, for the confirmation of our faith. His doubting proved a means for the confirmation of his own and our faith; therefore says Gregory well, Plus mihi profuit dubitatio Thomae quam credulitas Mariae; "Had not Thomas doubted, we had not been so fully assured, that it was the same Christ that was crucified who rose again."

23 And Thomas answered and said unto him, My Lord, and my God.

These words may be considered two ways: 1. As an abrupt speech, importing a vehement admiration of Christ's mercy towards him, and of his own stupidity and dulness to believe. Learn hence, That the convincing condescension of Christ, turns unbelief into a rapture of holy admiration and humble adoration. 2. This expression of Thomas, My Lord, and my God, contains a short but, absolute confession of faith. Thomas lightly collects from this resurrection, that he was Lord, God, blessed forevermore, the true Messiah, the expected Redeemer; and accordingly, with an explicit faith, he now professes his interest in him, saying, My Lord, and my God. Yet note, That this resurrection could not make him God, and render him then the object of divine worship, if he had been only a creature before. And farther observe, That Christ doth not reprove Thomas for owning him as God, which shews that Thomas did not mistake in owning the divinity of Christ.

24 Jesus saith unto him, Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed.

Here we have Christ's reprehension of Thomas for not believing without such sensible evidence as he desired. He believed now that Christ was risen from the dead: but it was upon the testimony of his senses only. Therefore Christ tells him, That his faith would have been more excellent and more eminently rewardable, if he had believed without such demonstrative evidence: faith is the evidence of things not seen. Therefore to give credit to a thing upon the evidence of sense is not properly believing.

Farther

Farther, How Christ pronounces them blessed, who should hereafter believe on him through the preaching of the gospel, though they did not see him as Thomas did, nor handle him as he might. This is a sure rule, that by how much our faith stands in less need of the external evidence of sense, the stronger our faith is; and the more acceptable it is, provided what we believe be revealed in the word of God, Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed.

30 And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book. 31 But these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through his name.

Note here, 1. The true end for which the miracles of Christ were so carefully recorded; namely, that we might believe. By believing that Christ was the Son of God, we have life; and by the evidence of his miracles, we know and believe him to have been the Son of God: The miracles which Christ wrought, were the best external evidence of his mission. 2. That all Christ's miracles, both before his passion, and after his resurrection, were not recorded by the Evangelists. 3. The great point concerning Christ, to be known and believed from the scriptures, is this, That Jesus, the Son of the virgin, is the promised Messiah, the anointed of the Father, he in whom all the types and shadows of the law are accomplished; and that this Jesus is for nature co-essential, for dignity co-equal, and for duration co-eternal with the Father; one in essence equal in power and glory. Thus believing that Jesus is the Son of God, and accompanying that belief with a holy life, if we believe well, and live well, we shall have life through his name.

CHAP. XXXI.

AFTER these things, Jesus shewed himself again to the disciples at the sea of Tiberias; and on this shewed he himself :

The foregoing chapter acquainted us with several appearances of Christ to his disciples after his resurrection: All which were in Jerusalem. This chapter acquaints us with his appearing to his disciples in Galilee, whither he had ordered his disciples to go, promising there to meet them. Jerusalem now becomes a forsaken place, a people abandoned to destruction; Christ will not shew himself openly to them, but Galilee was a place where Christ's ministry had found better acceptance: to Galilee therefore doth he go. Such places wherein Christ is most welcome to preach, shall be most honored with his presence: Jesus shewed himself to his disciples at the sea of Tiberias, called elsewhere the sea of Galilee.

2 There were together Simon Peter, and Thomas called Dibymus, and Nathanael of Cana in Galilee and the sons of Zebedee, and two other of his disciples. 3 Simon Peter saith unto them, I go a fishing. They say unto him, We also go with thee. They went forth, and entered into a ship immediately: and that night they caught nothing.

Note here, That after Christ was crucified, the disciples returned for a time to their trade and employment of fishing; though they were called to be fishers of men, yet churches not being gathered and constituted at present, nor being able to maintain them, they labour with their hands to supply their present necessities. Afterwards when at the feast of Pentecost, they had received those visible gifts of the holy Ghost, which did furnish them for preaching the gospel to all nations, and they went forth to plant and propagate the gospel; we may believe they then gave over the labour of their secular callings, and applied themselves wholly to the work of the ministry. That may be done (ecclesia constituenda) in a church which is constituting, or about to be constituted. Note, farther, How Peter, with the rest, toil all night, and catch nothing; but no sooner was Christ come among them, but they inclose a multitude of fishes. Thereby teaching us, That all human labours and endeavors are in vain, unless Christ by his presence and blessing crown them with success.

4 But when the morning was now come, Jesus stood on the shore: but the disciples knew not that it was Jesus. 5 Then saith Jesus unto them, Children, have you any meat? They answered him, No. 6 And he said unto them, Cast the net on the right side of the ship, and ye shall find. They cast therefore, and now they were not able to draw it for the multitude of fishes.

Observe here, 1. Christ was near, very near to his disciples but they perceived it not: Jesus stood on the shore, and they knew not that it was Jesus. Learn, Christ is not always discerned by us when he is present with us; it is a double mercy to enjoy his company, and to know indeed that is he. 2. Although they had laboured all night in vain, yet at Christ's command they go to work again, and with great success: They were not able to draw the net for the multitude of fishes. When Christ is about to do great things for his people, yet will he have them exert all possible endeavours of their own; and the want of former success must not discourage them from future endeavours. 3. What a proof Christ here gives of his divinity and Godhead: How were all the fish in the sea at his pleasure, and obedient to his command! He knew where they swim, and bring them from one part of the lake to the other: Where the disciples had toiled all night, and caught nothing. Christ Mediator is true God, and as such, as he has a sovereign power and providence over all the creatures, the earth, a thousand hills, and all the fish swimming in the sea, obedient to his power, and observant to his commands.

7 Therefore that disciple whom Jesus loved, saith unto Peter, It is the Lord. Now when Simon Peter heard that it was the Lord, he girt his fishers coat unto him (for he was naked) and did not cast himself into the sea. 8 And the other disciples came in a little little ship (for they were not far from land, but as it were two hundred cubits) dragging the net with fishes. 9 As soon then as they were come to land, they saw a fire of coals there, and fish laid thereon, and bread.

Note here, 1. The great zeal and forwardness of Peter : hearing that it was Christ, he leaps into the sea to get to him. O how inviting, attractive, and alluring is a sight of Christ ! It will make these that know him, break through all difficulties to come unto him. It is not a sea of water, no, nor seas of blood, that can keep a zealous soul at a distance from Christ. When Peter heard that it was the Lord, he girt his coat and cast himself into the sea. 2. What a complication of miracles here were ; as soon as they came to land they discerned another miracle, viz. a fire of coals, and fish thereon, and bread, all created and produced by Christ out of nothing, at this time, as an evidence of his divine power ; for before they could get the fish to shore, they saw fish broiling on the coals, which makes it evident that these were none of the fish which they had caught. Christ, when he pleases, for the benefit and comfort of his people, will work miracle upon miracle, mercy upon mercy, one wonder upon the head of another : for here, after a miracle at sea, they met with another miracle at land ; As soon as they came to land, they saw a fire.

10 Jesus saith unto them, Bring of the fish which ye have now caught. 11 Simon Peter went up and drew the net to the land full of great fishes, an hundred and fifty and three : and for all there were so many, yet was not the net broken.

Note here, 1. What was Christ's end in commanding his disciples to bring forth the fish which they had now taken ; namely, that the sight of their number and bigness, together with the sight of the net remaining unbroken, might confirm them in the belief of his being a real miracle. Christ had fed their bellies before, his business now is to feed their minds with the contemplation of the greatness and reality of the miracle. All Christ's miracles were obvious to sense, and would bear the examination of the senses : not like the lying wonders of the Church of Rome, which are commonly wrought in the dark to cozen the vulgar, and are mere cheats and impostures. 2. That this full draught of fishes, which Peter and the rest of the disciples now had, might probably preface that great and wonderful success which he and they afterwards were to have in fishing for men. Here we have an hundred fifty and three great fishes caught at one draught ; but, Acts ii. we find three thousand souls converted by St. Peter at one sermon. Oh the marvellous success of the gospel at the first preaching and planting of it ! Three thousand then proselyted by one sermon ! Now we have cause to fear that there are three thousand sermons preached, and scarce one soul savingly converted : Lord, who b. th. believed our report ?

12 Jesus saith unto them, Come and dine. And none of the disciples durst ask him, Who art thou knowing that it was the Lord. 13 Jesus then cometh, and taketh bread, and giveth them, and fish likewise. 14 This is now the third time that Jesus shewed himself to his disciples after that he was risen from the dead.

A two fold reason may be assigned why Christ did at this time invite and call his disciples to dine with him : The first and more principal reason was, to evidence to them the reality of his resurrection, and to assure them of the truth of his manhood, that they might not think it was an apparition only. By the miracle in catching the fishes, he proved himself to be God ; by his present eating of the fish, he evidenced himself to be man ; and consequently teaches us, that our exalted High Priest continues our kinsman in heaven : He is still bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh ; he has taken possession of heaven in our nature, sitting there in our glorified humanity, united to the glorious Deity, clothed with that body which hung in us blood and gore upon the cross, but now shining brighter than ten thousand suns. The second and less principal reason why Christ called his disciples to dine with him, was this, to shew his tender care over the bodies of his dear disciples, as being the tabernacles of his own Spirit, the temples of the Holy Ghost : therefore Christ encourages, though not to the pampering, yet to the refreshing of them : Jesus said unto them, Come and dine : And he would not confer with them till they had dined, as the next verse shews.

15 ¶ So when they had dined, Jesus saith to Simon Peter Simon, son of Jonas lovest thou me more than these ? He saith unto him, Yea, Lord ; thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, Feed my lambs. 16 He saith unto him again the second time Simon son of Jonas, lovest thou me ? He saith unto them, Yea, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, Feed my sheep. 17 He saith then to him the third time, Simon son of Jonas, lovest thou me ? Peter was grieved because he said unto him the third time, Lovest thou me ? And he said unto him, Lord, thou knowest all things ; thou knowest that I love thee, Jesus saith unto him, Feed my sheep

Observe here, 1. Christ puts Peter upon a threefold profession of his love unto him, answerable to his threefold confession. True repentance ought, and will be as eminent in the fruit and effects of it, as the saint's fall hath been. A threefold denial of Christ, shall be attended with a threefold possession of love unto him. 2. The solemn question put by our Saviour unto Peter, Lovest thou me ? Lovest thou me more than these ? that is, more than thy occupation and employment, more than thy nets and fishing-gears ; if so, leave them, and wholly employ thyself in feeding my sheep and lambs. Or, more than these ? that is, more than the rest of my disciples : Dost thou love me more than thou lovest these ? or more than they love me ? If so, evidence the sincerity of thy love to me by thy care of mine. Thence note, That ministers who are called to take care of Christ's flock, had need of much love to Jesus Christ, and great compassion for souls; by which they will be animated and fortified to go through with the labours and difficulties, as well as to encounter the dangers and sufferings which do accompany their calling: Simon, lovest thou me? Feed my flock. Farther, That the surest argument and best evidence of a minister's love to Jesus Christ, is his conscientious care to feed; that is to teach, instruct and govern the whole flock of Christ; lambs and sheep, weak and strong; the feeblest in the fold were purchased by the great Shepherd: And if he judgeth them worth his blood, we may judge them worth our sweat. Again, That such as would be faithful in their ministerial charge ought to look upon their people as committed to them by Christ himself, as loved of him, and committed to their care by him, and for which they must be accountable to him: Christ calls them three times over, his lambs and his sheep, and as often charges Peter to feed them. Note next, Peter's threefold answer to Christ's question, Simon, lovest thou me more than these? Lord, thou knowest that I love thee. Where note, 1. The great modesty of Peter in his reply. Lovest thou me more than these? says Christ; Peter replies Lord, thou knowest that I love thee: He doth not say, Lord, I love thee above them all, and before them all; here is no boasting now: Once it was said that Peter vaunted, Though all men forsake thee, yet will not I; but now his fall had taught him humility; he boasts not of his love above others, and makes no comparison with others, but only ranks himself among the true lovers of Christ; Lord, I love thee. 2. The evidence that Peter gives of his sincere love to Christ; he dares to appeal to Christ himself, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee: yea, that art omniscient, the all knowing and heart-searching God, thou that knowest all things, knowest that I love thee. Oh! It is a blessed thing, when we can and dare appeal to God's knowledge: and it is matter of high consolation, to know that God knoweth our sincerity and love unto him, and that he knoweth and approveth us as such: Lord, thou knowest all things, thou knowest, &c. Lastly, From these words, Lord, thou knowest all things, an argument of Christ's divinity. He that knows all things, and particularly the hearts of all men, is God. 1 Kings viii. 29. but so doth Christ, if St. Peter's testimony here be true; saying, Lord, thou knowest all things: that is, say the Socinians, very many things: but this would have destroyed St. Peter's argument at once; for it follows not that Christ knew the sincerity of Peter's heart, unless he knew the secrets of all hearts; and if he knew the secrets of all hearts, he is really God.

18 Verily, verily, I say unto you, When thou wast young, thou girdest thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldst: but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldst not. 19 This spake he, signifying by what death he should glorify God. And when he had spoken this, he saith unto him, Follow me.

In these words our Saviour forewarns Peter of his future sufferings, intimating that he should prove more stout than in his former trial. When he was young and unexperienced, he enjoyed his liberty; but when he was grown older in years, and stronger in grace, he should willingly stretch forth his hands, and quietly suffer himself to be bound to the cross; for Peter (say some) was not nailed, but tied and bound to the cross only, and so, as a martyr, or witness for the truth of Christ, glorified God by his death. Learn hence, 1. The ministers of Jesus Christ, when they undertake the charge of his flock, must prepare for suffering work, and their lot upon it. Therefore is this prediction of Peter's suffering joined with the former injunction, Feed my sheep. 2. That human nature in Christ's ministers as well as in other men, reluctates sufferings, has an antipathy against a violent death: They shall carry thee whither thou wouldst not. 3. From the time of St. Peter's sufferings, when he is old; learn, That the timing of the saints sufferings is in Christ's hands; he can, and when he pleaseth doth, screen them from suffering till old age; when their work is almost done for God, they close their days with sufferings for him: When thou art old thou shalt stretch forth thine hand, and another shall gird thee. Lastly, That the sufferings of the saints in general, and of the ministers of Christ in particular, do redound much to the glory of God, which is a consideration that ought to reconcile them to the cross of Christ, and support them under it.

20 ¶ Then Peter turning about, seeth the disciple whom Jesus loved, following; which also leaned on his breast at supper and said, Lord, which is he that betrayeth thee? 21 Peter seeing him, saith to Jesus, Lord, and what shall this man do! 22 Jesus saith unto him, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? Follow thou me.

Our Saviour having foretold the manner of Peter's death in the foregoing verses; here in these, Peter is inquisitive after, and very solicitous for the knowledge of what kind of death St. John should die. Christ checks him for his curiosity, as meddling with that which did no concern him; yet intimates to him, that John should live till he came to take vengeance on the Jews, and destroy Jerusalem: If I will that he tarry till I come; that is, till I come to execute judgement upon Jerusalem. Here we may note, There are two great vanities in men with reference to knowledge, the one a neglect to know what is our duty to know; the other, a curiosity to know what doth not belong to us to know. Christ tells Peter, it was none of his business to enquire what John should do, but he ought rather to be preparing for what he himself should suffer.

23 Then went that saying abroad among the brethren, that that disciple should not die: yet Jesus said not unto him, He shall not die: but, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?

Observe here, How strangely our Saviour's words were mis taken and misunderstood by his own disciples: they apprehend presently that John should not die, and so it passed current among them. From hence we may note, How much the wisdom of God is, and ought to be admired, in giving us a written word, and bringing us to it, when we see erroneous traditions so common too in the world, and our Saviour's own speeches so much mistaken, and that by wife and holy men themselves in the purest times: Much more may the words of others be misreported, and wrested contrary to their sense and meaning. How great then is the vanity and uncertainty of oral tradition! Men are naturally prone to mistake, to mistake themselves, and to mistake one another. The more to be admired is their over-daring ignorance, who think they cannot err. Such an haughty opinion of a man's self, concludes him to be neither good nor wise.

24 This is the disciple which testifieth of these things, and wrote these things: and we know that his testimony is true.

The great modesty of the holy Evangelist St. John is all along throughout his gospel very observable; he mentioneth himself hitherto under a third person; he calleth himself a disciple, a learner, who excelled the most accomplished doctors of the ages ever since. Here he speaks more plainly and expressly concerning himself, declaring that he was an eye-witness and an ear-witness of what he wrote, for the greater certainty thereof. And this protestation here made by the evangelist of the truth of what he wrote, was highly necessary, lest any should think that Christ's extraordinary love and affection to him (he being the beloved disciple) should move him to exceed (as we are prone to do) in writing the history of their lives who are dear to us, and we to them. Learn hence, That this gospel was written by John the beloved disciple, and the narration is of divine truth, worthy to be embraced and received by us as a perfect rule of faith and life: We know that his testimony is true.

25 And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written. Amen.

John being about to conclude the history of our Saviour's life, asserts, that there were many other miracles and special deeds done by Christ both before and after his passion, which he had not recorded or set down; because, should all that Christ did and said be committed to writing, it would even fill the world, the volumes would be so many. From hence we gather, 1. The wonderful activity, industry and diligence of the Lord Jesus Christ, that he was never idle, but his whole life was spent in doing good; because should all the particular instances have been recorded, and it would amount to an incredible bulk. 2. That it is impossible to get all said, which might be said of Christ, and in his commendation; such is the transcendent excellency of his person, and the weakness of our apprehensions and judgments, and if all were written, which might be written concerning him, the world itself could not contain the books which should be written. Lastly, That although many of Christ's sermons, conferences, miracles, and actions, be not recorded; yet it doth not follow, nor can it be inferred from thence, that any necessary doctrine is omitted, or not sufficiently confirmed: There being so much written as it pleased God we should know, and was necessary for us to know, in order to our improvement in faith and holiness. If then, after all the revelation and discovery which God has made of his Son Christ Jesus, and of the way that leads to eternal salvation by him, persons remain willingly ignorant of him, and of their duty to him, "Where shall they appear, and how shall they escape?"

Rev. i. ver. 5, 6.

Now unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father: To him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

The C L O S E.

THE design of the foregoing notes upon the holy Evangelist, being to recommend the instructive life of our blessed Redeemer to our observation and imitation: Although I have upon all occasions propounded his example to be followed by us in all the steps of an imitable virtue, as the matter every where occurred; yet adjudging it may be profitable to sum up together the several graces and virtues which were so orient in the life of Christ, that having them daily before our eyes, we may be continually correcting and reforming of our lives by that blessed pattern; I shall therefore briefly offer it. Because

Nothing is so proper to form us to holiness, as the example of the Mediator, it being absolutely perfect, and thoroughly accommodated to our present state; there is no example of any mere man, that is to be followed without limitation; but the life of Christ was as the purest gold without the least alloy. His conversation was a living law; and Christianity, which is the best and holiest institution in the world, is nothing else but a conformity to his precepts and pattern. The universal command of the whole gospel is this, To walk as Christ walked. This denotes a sincere intention, design and endeavor to imitate and follow him in all the paths of holiness and obedience.

Particularly let us imitate Jesus.

I. IN his early piety. We find him at twelve years old about his fathers business, sitting in the midst of the doctors, both hearing and asking them questions. See on St. Luke ii. 46, 47. An early piety gives both the person and the service a peculiar pre-eminency: no comfort in life, no happiness in death, like the happiness and comfort of being good betimes.

II. In his obedience to his earthly parents. See on St. Luke

Luke ii. 51. He went down to Nazareth, and was subject to them. He paid homage to the womb that bare him, and to his supposed and reputed father that provided for him: let a person be never so high above others, he is still below his parents: if the highest upon earth think their parents beneath them, and themselves above their parents commands, our Saviour did not so. What shall we think of those monsters of ingratitude, the reproach of human nature, who are ashamed to own their parents because of their poverty or despise them because of their infirmities of their age! Prov. xxiii. 22. Hearken to thy Father that begat thee, and despise not thy mother when she is old.

III. In his unwearied diligence in doing good. Acts x. 38. Who made about doing good. This was his meat and drink by day; his rest and sleep by night. He fed the hungry, clothed the naked, visited the sick, was eyes to the blind, feet to the lame, and administered to such as were in necessities and straits. And he has declared that he will judge us at the great day, according to our imitation of him in doing good to all mankind. See the notes on St. Matt. xxv. the ten last verses.

IV. In his humility and lowliness of mind. Matt. x. 28 Learn of me, for I am meek, and lowly in heart; witness his stooping to the meanest office, even that of washing his disciples feet, St. John xiii. 5. He that came in the form of a servant, performs the office of the meanest servant to his disciples. And all this was to set us an example of mutual condescension to each other; If your Lord and Master have washed your feet, you ought also to wash one another's feet; which precept, though it doth not bind us to the same action, yet it obliges to the same condescension; namely, to think no office of love beneath us which the necessities of our brother call for from us.

V. In the unblameableness and inoffensiveness of his life and actions. He injured none, and justly offended none, but was harmless as well as holy: He wrought a miracle to pay tribute-money, rather than give offence to the government. See on Matt. xvi. 27. Accordingly, let us be harmless and blameless; wise as serpents, and innocent as doves: piety without policy is too simple to be safe; policy without piety is too subtle to be good.

VI. In his eminent self-denial. He emptied himself and became poor. When he was rich as God from all eternity he impoverished himself by becoming man. Oh! What did he not deny when he left the bosom of his Father, with the ineffable delights and pleasures which he there enjoyed from all eternity; and instead thereof, to drink the cup, the bitter cup of his Father's wrath for our sake? Lord, how can we enough abase ourselves for thee, who thus denied thyself for us?

VII. In his contentment in a low and mean condition in this world; yea, in a suffering and afflicted condition. He would not honour the world so far as to have any part of it in his own hand, and was therefore of himself less provided of comfortable accommodations than the birds of the air, or the beasts of the field. See Luke ix. 58. The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head. Let us learn from him to manage an afflicted condition with a contented spirit; let there be no murmurings, complaints, or foolish charging of God heard from us, whatever straits or troubles we may be brought into: But in whatever state we are, let us be therewith content, Phil. iv. 11.

VIII. In his frequent performance of the duty of private prayer and fasting. He sometimes spent a whole night in prayer, Luke vi. 12. He went into a mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer to God. And, Mark i. 35. In the morning rising up a great while before day, he went into a solitary place and prayed. It is certain, that we have much more business with Almighty God in prayer than Christ had; he had no sins to confess, no wants to make known; yet did he delight with frequency and fervency to perform this homage to his heavenly Father. Lord, how doth thy zeal and forwardness condemn our remissness and lukewarmness in praying to our heavenly Father!

IX. In his affectionate performance of the duty of praise and thanksgiving. Our blessed Saviour was a great pattern of thankfulness. Matt. xi. 25. I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, &c. John xi. 40. Father, I thank thee, that thou hast heard me. When he was to eat common bread, he received it with thanksgiving. What a pattern of thankfulness then was Jesus to his followers! There is hardly any one external duty which we do not find the hypocrite performing in scripture, except this of thanksgiving and praise: we find Judas repenting, Ahab humbling himself, Saul sacrificing; but rarely do we find any wicked man blessing and praising God: Need will make us beggars, but grace only thanksgiving.

X. In his compassion towards those who were in distress and misery, Matt. xx. 34. Great was his compassion to the bodies of men: He healed all that came unto him: He healed many undesired; with great condolency, and tender sympathy, he exercised acts of mercy and compassion, which the object of compassion was before him, and did perfectly abhor, and severely condemn all acts of cruelty: How great was his compassion towards the souls of men! What pains did he take, and what hazards did he run, in preaching the gospel to lost sinners, in his fervent prayers for them; but especially in dying for them! Let us imitate Christ herein: As his compassion was universal to all mankind, to the whole man, soul and body; as it was active and operative; as it was exercised with marvellous complacency and delight; as it was a preventing compassion, and unwearied compassion: so let ours be also.

XI. In his holy and fruitful discourse. His lips dropt as the honey-comb, and his tongue was as choice silver. When walking with his disciples to Emmaus, with what heavenly discourse did he entertain them in the way! See Luke xxiv. 13. &c. A good pattern for our imitation, when providentially cast into such company as will bear it. Lord! what a shame and reproach is it to us, that in common conversation we spend so many hours together, in talking over the news of the city and country, and part without speaking one word of Jesus Christ our celestial friend!

XII. In his free conversation: The Son of man came eating and drinking, Matt. xi. 19. That is, was of a free and familiar converse, affable and sociable, not sour or morose, never thurning the society of the worst of men, even of the Pharisees themselves; but complying with their innocent customs, and accompanying them at their feasts. See St Luke v. 29. We do not find that when Christ was invited to any public entertainment, that ever he refused to go; not so much for the pleasure of eating, as for the opportunity of conversing and doing good; Christ conversed with bad men, but as their physician, not as their companion: Let us go and do likewise.

XIII. In his patience under sufferings and reproaches. When he was reviled, he reviled not again; but underwent the burden of his sufferings with admirable patience and meekness of spirit, when his name and honour suffered the vilest indignities, blasphemies, and reproaches, that the malice of Satan, and the malignity of wicked men, could belch out against it; when he was called a blasphemer, a fouleater, a devil, a wine-bibber, a glutton, a friend of publicans and sinners. For an innocent person, and a dignified person, to hear all this, when he could have looked all his enemies into hell, and have frowned them into nothing; verily, to bear all this, without the least discomposure of spirit, is the highest triumph of patience that ever the world was acquainted with. And why all this, but to leave us an example that we should follow his steps? 1 Pet. ii, 21, 22.

XIV. In his readiness to forgive injuries. One of his last words upon the cross, was a prayer for his murderers; Father, forgive them, Luke xxiii. 34. He offered up his blood to God on the behalf of them that shed it. Thus to forgive our enemies, and to beg forgiveness of them, will be an evidence of a Christ-like frame and temper; when the grace of God calms those tumultuous and outrageous passions which at any time we find raging in our breasts, moulding our spirits into sweetness and gentleness freeing us from all malicious desires of revenge, which are so far beneath a christian, that it is the baseness of a man; yea, as jealousy is the rage of a man, so malice is the rage of the devil: it is the spirit of the apostate nature.

XV. In his laying to heart the sins, as well as the sufferings of others. Mark iii. 5. He was grieved for the hardness of their hearts. Such was his zeal for his Father's glory, such was his compassion for the souls of men, such his antipathy against, and hatred of sin, that he was grieved for sin wherever he found it, and mourned over those, who had no hearts to mourn for themselves. Lord! how far are they off from a Christ like spirit and temper, who, instead of mourning for other men's sins, rejoice in iniquity, and take pleasure to see their brother stab at once the christian name and his own soul?

XVI. In his zeal for the public worship of God. John ii. 17. The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up. Now as Christ was, so christians ought to be, intensely zealous for the glory of God, the honour of his house, and the purity of his public worship. The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up. Our zeal for the public worship of God glorifies him most, and he accepts it best. Now we own that God whom we serve in the face of the world; and this creates a veneration and esteem of God in the minds of men.

XVII. In his glorifying of his Father in all he did. John xvii. 4. I have glorified thee on the earth. The whole life of Jesus, whilst here on earth, was a glorifying of his Father; he glorified his Father by the doctrine which he taught, by the miracles which he wrought, by the un-spotted purity of his life, and by his unparalleled sufferings at his death. In like manner should we glorify God in all we do, in all we design, in all we desire; in our natural actions of eating and drinking; in our civil employments, buying and selling; in our lawful recreations, taking care that too much of our time be not consumed therein. Recreation is not to be our business, but to fit us for business; but especially let us seek to glorify God in our religious duties, public, and secret.

XVIII. In his impartiality in reproving sin. He feared the faces and spared the faults of no offenders; the Pharisees were a proud and haughty sort of people, who dishonoured God above most, when they pretended to glorify him above any. Therefore we find Christ denouncing a beard-roll of woes against them in one chapter, Matt. xxiii. Woe unto you scribes, Pharisees, hypocrites. Eight several woes are denounced against them, for so many several sins committed by them. Those to whom God has given his authority to reprove the sins of others, ought to imitate their pattern in his impartiality in reproving sin. His very enemies gave him that character, Matt. xxii. 17. Thou carest not for any man, thou regardest not the person of man; that is, thou sparest none, but tellest all men of their faults.

XIX. In his universal obedience to his Father's will, and cheerful submission to his Father's pleasure. He obeyed the will of his Father universally, voluntarily, sincerely, and with a single eye to his glory, perseveringly, and to the end; and as he was, so must we be faithful to the death, if we expect the crown of life. And in like manner did he submit to the will of his providence; Father, not as I will, but as thou wilt; not my will, but thine be done. O let us keep this example continually before us, and every day obey the will of God's precept universally, and submit to the will of his providence very cheerfully! This is heaven on earth.

XX. In his love and praise of universal holiness, both in heart and life. He was holy in nature, holy in his principles and motives, holy in his aim and ends; he was perfectly holy, precisely holy, uniformly holy, exemplarily holy; he delighted only in holy persons and holy things; it concerns us to imitate herein, if ever we expect to be where he is: Heaven is the habitation of holiness; the company is holy, the employment is holy, the enjoyments holy; no unclean thing can enter into heaven, or could be happy in heaven; heaven is rather a nature than a place. It is not the place of heaven can make us happy, but the disposition and temper of our minds in heaven; without conformity to the nature of God, there can be no communion with him, or delight in him. What a discourteous courtesy would it be to turn a filthy swine into a garden of flowers, to lodge it in a bed of sweet perfumes, to bathe it in a clear and crystal fountain? Alas! its unclean temper and sordid inclinations would rather chuse to lie down in a kennel, and wallow in the mire, its proper element. Thus unfitable would heaven be; that place of greatest happiness would be the greatest uneasiness to an unholy heart. Let us then pray and endeavour that the temper of our minds, and the actions of our lives, may be a lively transcript of the mind and life of the holy Jesus, that we may be like him in purity and holiness, in justice and righteousness, in patience and meekness, in charity and universal goodness; that as he was, we may be in the world, holy, humble, harmless, heavenly minded, glorifying God on earth, that we may be glorified with him and by him in his eternal kingdom.

XXI. Yet before I close this exhortation to an imitation of Jesus, I must subjoin this cautionary direction: Take heed that you do not so imitate Christ as your pattern, as to disown him for your priest. This is the dangerous error of those who affirm, that the great end of Christ's death was to give the world an example of patience, humility, meekness, and the forementioned christian graces, and that his sufferings were exemplary, but not properly satisfactory. We acknowledge that Christ's giving us an example was one end of his coming into the world, and dying for us, but not the great end. A subordinate end, but not the ultimate. God preserve us from the contagion of this growing error; other errors only scratch the face, but this stabs the heart of the christian religion, in that it deprives us of the choicest benefit of Christ's death; namely, the expiation of sin, by a proper satisfaction to the justice of God. But blessed be God, we have not so learned Christ; as we are taught, so we believe; that the holy Jesus, by the sacrifice of his death, has redeemed us from death and hell, and saved us from the wrath to come, by a full and adequate payment to divine justice, and, by the redundancy of his merit, has purchased an eternal inheritance for us; and as we are taught and believe, so we pray.

Almighty God, who hast given thine only Son to be unto us both a sacrifice for sin, as also an example of godly life Give us grace that we may always most thankfully receive this his ineffimable benefit, and also daily endeavour ourselves to follow the blessed steps of his most holy life; through the same Jesus Christ our Lord.

Almighty and everlasting God, who of thy tender love towards mankind, has sent thy Son, our Saviour Jesus Christ, to take upon him our flesh, and to suffer death upon the cross, that all mankind should follow the example of his great humility; Mercifully grant that we may both follow the example of his patience, and also be made partakers of his resurrection, through the same Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

END OF THE FOUR EVANGELISTS.

THE A C T S OF THE A P O S T L E S.

The most illustrious life of the holy JESUS being recorded at large in the foregoing GOSPEL, by the several Evangelists, whose names they bear; this next book of the Acts undertaketh these three things:

- I. It recommends to our observation and imitation the lives and actions of the holy apostles, particularly St. Peter and St. Paul; and acquaints us with their fervent zeal, and unwearied diligence in planting and propagating Christianity, not only in Judea and Samaria, but also in Syria, Asia, and Macedonia; yea, even in Rome itself: Where, by the way note, That there is not one word in all this history, of St. Peter's primacy, or of his superiority over the rest of the apostles, or of any bishopric that he had at Rome; the least intimation of which, would have made a louder noise than Pafce oves, or Tu es Petrus.
- II. We have here an ecclesiastical history of the first and purest churches, informing us how the Christian church in its infancy was planted and watered, gathered and propagated, both among Jews and Gentiles; how she observed and obeyed CHRIST's commands to his apostles, both in matters of faith, worship, communion and government, that therein the primitive church might be an exemplary pattern to succeeding churches throughout all ages.

III. This history gives all the ministers of the gospel, to the end of the world, a great and noble pattern of ministerial diligence, faithfulness, and prudence; acquainting us what the apostles did, the pains which they took, the hazards which they run, in preaching the glad tidings of salvation to a lost world: How they instructed the ignorant, reduced the wandering: how they bare with the weakness of some, and patiently contended with the obstinacy and perverseness of others. Likewise as stewards of God's family, they gave to the whole household their portion of meat in due season.

This first chapter relates, 1. The time and manner of our Lord's ascension. 2. The hundred and twenty disciples joint devotion. 3. Their election of Matthias by lot, to succeed in the apostleship, in the room of the apostate Judas.

CHAP. I.

THE former treatise have I made O Theophilus, of all that Jesus began both to do and teach,

Note here, 1. The penman of this sacred history, St. Luke, the same that wrote the gospel, which he calls his former treatise, dedicated, both that and this, to the same Theophilus: The former treatise have I made, O Theophilus.

1. The time when St. Luke wrote this holy history, and the place where, namely, when he was the companion of St. Paul; and, as some think, during the time of his imprisonment at Rome: If so, we may profitably remark, the favour which God gave the apostle and companion in the sight of the keeper of the prison, that they were not denied pen and paper. When persecutors send the saints to prison, God can provide a keeper for their turn. But how do the apostle and his companion spend their time in prison, Very advantageously; the former in writing epistles to the churches for their confirmation; the latter in recording the acts and monuments of the holy apostles for our imitation. There is no such way to be even with the devil and his instruments, for all their malice and spite against us, as by doing all the good we can, wherever we come. Satan had better have let these two holy men alone, than have call them into prison; for by their pens they battered the walls of his kingdom, and made them shake about his ears. 3. The integrity and impartiality of this historian St. Luke: he wrote of all things that Jesus both did and taught in his Gospel, and what the apostles did and taught in the Acts; not that this is to be understood strictly and absolutely, but comparatively only; not as if St. Luke recorded every action that Jesus did, or every expression our Saviour said; for St. John says, they were so many, that they could not be written, chap. xxi. 25: But by all things, we are to understand very many things: the most necessary and useful things; every thing that the Holy Ghost thought fit to dictate to him, and enjoin him to publish for the church's use and service. Learn thence, That St. Luke was a very faithful and impartial historian, withholding nothing which was necessary for the church to know, and leaving no room for unwritten or uncertain traditions: I have wrote all that Jesus began.

2 Until the day in which he was taken up, after that he through the Holy Ghost had given commandments unto the apostles, whom he had chosen;

Note here, The special concern and care which Christ had for his church on earth, before he ascended into heaven. The very first night that he appeared to his disciples, after his resurrection, he breathed on them, and distributed the Holy Ghost among them, St. John xx. 22. both to inform their judgments of what they did not know, and to direct their practise, what he would have them to do: He through the Holy Ghost, gave commandments unto the apostles; that is he distributed the Holy Ghost amongst them, to be their constant instructor and director, what they should do, in order to the execution of their office and employment: Learn thence, That as the apostles had, so the ministers of Christ, in their measure, shall have, the gracious and special influences of the holy Spirit to direct and instruct, to quicken and support them in the faithful discharge of their ministerial office to the end of the world; that gracious promise, Lo, I am with you always, St. Matt. xxviii. 20. We that live seventeen hundred years after the first making of it, may by faith draw out the comfort of it, as well as the apostles, to whom it was originally made.

3 To whom he also shewed himself alive after his passion by many infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God:

Note, 1. The time which our Lord spent here upon earth, between his resurrection and ascension; it was forty days: Christ would not presently ascend into heaven, as soon as he was risen, but thought fit to stay some time with his disciples, to confirm their faith in the belief of his resurrection, and to satisfy them that it was he himself, their Lord and Master, that died for them, that was indeed risen, and now appeared unto them: He was seen of them forty days. 2. What our Saviour did in that forty days upon earth: He shewed himself alive unto his disciples, appearing sometimes to them, and giving them many infallible proofs of the verity of his resurrection, by eating, drinking, talking, and conversing with them, by shewing his wounds to them, and submitting himself to be touched and handled by them. Not that Christ's conversation with his disciples, in this his exalted state after his resurrection, was so frequent and familiar, as it was before his death, when he was in a state of humiliation; and accordingly we never read, I think, that Christ ever lodged or continued all night with his disciples, after he was risen from the grave. But he conversed with them only upon occasion, as he pleased himself, and when he pleased. 3. What our Saviour said as well as what he did, in his intervening time betwixt his resurrection and ascension, being forty days: He spake to his disciples of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God: That is, 1. Of the things pertaining to his church militant, or the kingdom of grace here on earth, how he would have his church planted and propagated by the apostles doctrine, guided and governed by their discipline: Or 2. By the kingdom of God, may be understood the church triumphant, or the kingdom of glory in heaven; what perfect bliss and happiness he was now going to prepare for them in the presence of his Father. Where note That Christ's kingdom is purely spiritual; that Christ's spiritual kingdom is his church; and the preaching of the gospel is the great instrumental mean for the erecting of the kingdom of grace, and enlarging of the kingdom of glory.

4 And being assembled together with them, commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which, saith he, ye have heard of me. 5 For John truly baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence.

Note here, 1. How frequently Christ renewed his promises to his disciples, of sending down the Holy Ghost to confer upon them the gifts of tongues and miracles, in order to the fitting and furnishing of them for their work of preaching and publishing the gospel to all nations: Ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost, not many days hence; That is, the gifts and graces of the Holy Ghost shall be largely poured forth upon you, (as water upon the person baptized) which was fulfilled on the day of Pentecost. When Christ calls his ministers to extraordinary service, he affords them extraordinary assistance, furnishing them with endowments answerable to their great employments. 2. The place where Christ commands the apostles to wait for the descent of the Holy Ghost upon them; namely, at Jerusalem: He commanded them not to depart from Jerusalem, but wait there for the promise. Of all places the apostles would least have chosen Jerusalem to tarry in, had not Christ commanded them to wait there. For Jerusalem was now a justly abhorred and detested place, reeking afresh with the blood of the holy and innocent Jesus; yet Jerusalem is the place chosen by Christ for the pouring forth the holy Spirit upon his apostles: Because, 1. There had been his greatest humiliation. There Christ had suffered the greatest ignominy, therefore there will he shew forth his power and glory. 2. Because at Jerusalem there was the greatest company of spectators to behold this noble work, and to be wrought upon by it. Such as would not be convinced by our Saviour's death and resurrection, might probably be convinced by this miraculous effusion of the holy spirit descending upon the apostles in fiery cloven tongues. Lord what an instance was this of thy love to thine enemies! How desirous wert thou of the conversion and salvation of thy very murderers! In and at Jerusalem, where our Lord was crucified, the Holy Ghost first descended: And when Christ appointed where the gospel-combination should begin, Jerusalem is the first place in nomination by him. St. Luke xxiv. 47. Had he said unto them, that repentance and remission of sin, &c.

6 When they therefore were come together, they asked of him, saying, Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel? 7 And he said unto them, It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power.

Note here, the disciples' question and our Saviour's answer: 1. The question proposed by the disciples, Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel? That is, Wilt thou repair the ruinous condition of the Jewish state, and restore it to that great dignity and splendour which we have always expected should be done by the Messiah? Where note, That notwithstanding Christ had so often rebuked the Jews in general, and his disciples in particular, for their conceit of a temporal kingdom) who were so full of ambitious expectations to receive great honours and preferments here on earth) yet it evidently appears that this notion still ran in their minds, and that their Master being now risen from the dead, this was the time both for his and their dignity and advancement. Learn hence, That it is no wonder that unbelievers stumbled at the poverty and meanness of Christ's outward condition when he was here on earth, seeing it was so hard for the disciples themselves to be convinced, and believe that his kingdom was not of this world. I know not any thing wherein the bishop of Rome may so properly call himself apostolical, as in his following this error of the apostles. Were they always dreaming of a temporal kingdom? So is he always doating upon it, and his eyes dazzled with the splendour and glory of it. The disciples, not only all the time whilst Christ was with them, but even now, when upon the point of departing from them, when he was just ascending, yea, in part ascended, having one foot upon the earth, and the other in the cloud which took him up to heaven, yet still they asked him, Wilt thou now restore the kingdom? that is, settle upon us thy followers secular power, and temporal dominion here on earth? But mark, 2. Our Lord's answer, ver. 7. It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put only in his own power. Our Saviour's answer doth not in the least imply that any such kingdom should ever be granted as they dreamt of; but he checks their curiosity inquiring into the times and seasons, and nature of God's secrets, which in no way concerned them to pry into: It is not for you to know the times or the seasons. Here note, 1. Something implied, namely, That there are certain times and seasons, the knowledge of which only belongs to God, which yet man's curiosity has an itching desire to search and pry into. There is nothing more natural to man, than a desire to know both what shall be hereafter, and when that hereafter shall be. We are very careless in seeking out the season of that which we ourselves should do; but over careful and curious in seeking out the season of what God will do. Note, Here is something expressed, namely, that God has times and seasons for executing his own purposes, which it is neither proper or profitable, nor possible for us to know. Not proper, because no part of our business. Not profitable, because no part of our interest. Not possible, because out of our reach. It is not possible for us to know it as men, by a natural sagacity; nor as christians by a supernatural illumination; no, nor as ministers and apostles, without divine inspiration and extraordinary revelation, which we have no warrant to expect and should have no curiosity to desire. Learn hence, That it much better becometh us with an awful silence to adore, than with a bold curiosity to pry into God's hidden and unrevealed secrets. Yet though it be not for us to know God's times and seasons, it is our duty to expect them, and be prepared for them. We know not when our Lord will come to us by death and judgment, whether in the evening, or at midnight, or at cock-crow, or in the morning. But it is our duty to believe and expect it, to wait and prepare for it, and be always ready to receive him. Finally, Though it is not for us to know the times and seasons which God hath put in his own power, yet it is for us to know the times and seasons which God has put in our power; namely, the present time to improve it, and the past time to bewail our misimprovement of it. To improve the time of affliction, for consideration and humiliation and at the time of prosperity, mercy, and deliverance, for gratulation and thankfulness; and to improve both in farther measures, and increase of holiness and sanctification both of heart and life.

8 But ye shall receive power after that the holy Ghost is come upon you: And ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth.

Note here, how Christ, instead of gratifying his disciples curiosity, acquaints them with their own duty; he tells them, that although they had received his Spirit before, in some measure, yet very shortly the Spirit should be poured forth upon them in a plentiful manner, to confer the gift of tongues, prophecies, and miracles upon them, for rendering them to preach the gospel throughout all nations, and also to testify and bear witness unto the truth of what Christ did and said in Judea and Samaria, both to Jews and Gentiles, even to the uttermost parts of the earth. Here note, What is the special work of the ministers of the gospel; namely, to bear witness unto Christ: Ye shall be witnesses unto me. This they do three ways, Christum predicando; secundum Christum vivendo; propter Christum patiendo: "By the purity of their doctrine, by the piety of their lives, and by their patience under suffering, both for Christ and from Christ." 2. What it was that enabled the apostles thus to bear witness unto Christ, namely, the pouring forth of the Holy Spirit upon them: The Holy Ghost shall come upon you, and ye shall be witnesses unto me. Thence learn, That some measure of ministerial gifts and sanctifying graces from the Holy Spirit, is absolutely necessary to enable the ministers of the gospel to bear their testimony unto Christ with faithfulness and success.

9 And when he had spoken these things, while they beheld, he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of the sight.

Here an account is given of our Saviour's triumphant ascension into heaven, with several remarkable particulars thereunto belonging. Note, 1. Who and what it was that ascended; even the same that descended. Christ Jesus, in his divine nature as God, and in his human nature as man his person consisting of soul and body, he unascended in both. 2. The place he ascended from; from this world in general, and from Mount Olivet in particular, that very place where he began his last sorrowful tragedy. Where his heart began to be sad, here it is now made glad. Learn thence, that God can make the very places of our trouble and torment, (as sick beds, prisons, strange countries) to become places of comfort and triumphant joy unto us, when he pleases. 3. The place whither he ascended, into heaven; that is the third heaven, the throne of God, the seat of the blessed. Hence he is said to ascend far above all heavens; that is, above the aerial and starry heavens which we see, into the highest heavens; unto the place where he was before, as himself expresses it, John vii. 62. Thence learn, That the Lord Jesus Christ is returned back again to that sweet and glorious bosom of delight and love from which he came at his first incarnation; What and if he shall see the Son of man ascending up where he was before? 4. The time when our Lord ascended, forty days after his resurrection. The care and love of Christ to his church was manifested by this his stay with them. Unspeakable glory was prepared for him, and did now await him; but he would not go to possess it, till he had settled all things for the good of his church. And when he had settled his family in order, and given charge to his disciples concerning the discipline of his house he would stay no longer, lest he should seem to affect a terrene life. Learn hence, That Christ desired to be no longer here, than he had work to do for God and souls. A good pattern for our imitation, to desire life upon the source of usefulness: To be willing to be gone when our work is done. 5. How and after what manner Christ ascended up into heaven. (1.) He ascended, as well as was raised from the grave, by his own power, ver. 10. Whilst they looked stedfastly, he went up; that is, by his own divine power. True the angels did attend him, but they did not assist him. Elias went to heaven in a chariot of fire, but he was fetched up, he could not carry himself up; but Christ needed no chariot, no carriage, of angels for his conveyance; being the author of life and motion. (2.) He ascended magnificently, with great triumph into his kingdom in heaven; God went up with a shout, the Lord with the sound of a trumpet. A cloud is prepared as a royal chariot, to carry up this King of glory to his royal pavilion; A cloud received him out of their sight. And oh! what jubiliations of the blessed angels were heard in heaven! The triumphs and universal acclamations are not ended to this day, nor never shall end. 3. He ascended munificently, shedding forth innumerable and inestimable gifts upon his church at his ascension: When he ascended up on high, he gave gifts to men, prophets, apostles, evangelists, pastors, and teachers. And oh! how many thousands now in heaven, and upon earth also, are blessing Christ at this day, for these his ascension gifts; 6. The witnesses of our Lord's ascension. Elias had but one witness of his rapture into heaven; St. Paul not one, but Christ will neither neither have all eye-witnesses of his ascension, nor yet too few; he did not carry all Jerusalem forth to see his glorious departure, but the select company of his disciples only: The number of witnesses was about an hundred and twenty. Those who had been partners with him in his humiliation are now made witnesses of his glorious ascension. If we will converse with Christ in his lowly estate here on earth we shall be made happy with the sight of his transcendent glory ere long above. 7. The cause and reasons why he thus ascended; namely, because, he had not ascended, he could not have been inaugurated and installed in the glory he now enjoys above. Had he not ascended, he could not have interceded, as now he doth, for us here below. Had he not ascended into heaven, we could never have entered heaven; He entered as our forerunner, as our head and representative, and we ascend after him, in the virtue of his ascension before us. In a word, had he not ascended before us, the Holy Spirit had not been enjoyed by us as sanctifier, and as a comforter, at least not in that measure in which he has been since enjoyed by his church: If Christ had not gone, the Comforter had not come. He begins where Christ ended, Take we good heed then, how we treat the Holy Spirit whom Christ sent down from heaven at his ascension thither: that we do not grieve him by our unkindness, nor vex him by our disobedience, nor quench him by our sinful neglects of duty: for in grieving the Spirit, we grieve our Comforter, and in grieving our Comforter we grieve ourselves. But let us entertain him kindly on the account of his nature; for he is God, Acts v. On the account of his office, and the benefits we receive by him; for he is Vinculum Unionis, the bond of union betwixt Christ and our souls, without which we can never have either interest in Christ, or communion with him.

10 And while they looked stedfastly towards heaven, as he went up, behold two men stood by them in white apparel; 11 Which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.

Note here, How the spectators of our Lord's ascension were justly transported into an ecstasy of wonder and admiration. Christ ascended gradually and leisurely, that he might at once confirm the faith, and delight the eyes and minds of his beholders. Whilst they thus stood admiring, two angels, in the shape of men appear in white (a colour which they oft appeared in, to shew, both that they retained their native purity, and also to represent the joyfulness of their errand which they went upon) and call to the apostles who were some of them men of Galilee, to take notice, that this Jesus whom they now beheld ascending up into heaven, should come again to judge the world, and so come again in like manner, that is, visible in a cloud, by his own power, with the like majesty, and with the same soul and body. But not one word of the time when; that, not knowing the hour, we may be upon the watch every hour ideo latet unus dies ut observentur omnes.

12 Then returned they unto Jerusalem from the mount called Olivet, which is from Jerusalem a sabbath days journey. 13 And when they were come in, they went into an upper room, where abode both Peter, and James, and John, and Andrew, Philip, and Thomas, Bartholomew, and Matthew James the son of Alphaeus, and Simon Zelotes, and Judas the brother of James. 14 These all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication, with the women, and Mary the mother of Jesus, and with his brethren.

The apostles having seen our Saviour thus gloriously ascended into heaven from mount Olivet, they return to Jerusalem, which is called a sabbath day's journey, that is, about two miles. Eight furlongs make a mile, and Bethany, in which was the mount of Olivet, was from Jerusalem about fifteen furlongs, John xi. 18. This was the common walk which the Jews used on the sabbath-day but rather for meditation than recreation's sake. The apostles thus returned, assemble together at Jerusalem, where they lay the foundation of the first gospel-church. And here note, 2. How the names of all the eleven apostles are repeated and distinctly set down, to shew, that although they had fallen from their profession, and forsaken Christ, yet they had recovered themselves by repentance, and were risen again; and upon their recovery were continued by Christ in their former office and dignity. O the mighty power of a sincere repentance to reinstate us in the favour and friendship of an offended God. 2. How the sight of Christ's ascension had established and confirmed the apostles faith; they now adore and worship him, and assemble together to perform their joint devotions to him. Before Christ's resurrection and ascension, we scarce read of any act of adoration that the disciples paid unto him. True they looked upon him as a person sent from God, a great prophet, and the Son of David: But his Deity being evinced; and now made evident to them by his resurrection from the grave, and ascension into heaven, they now worshipped him as the Son of God. See Luke xxiv. 52. 3. The place where this christian congregation did assemble; In an upper room; that is, says Dr. Hammond, in one of the chambers belonging to the temple; in the large upper room, say others, where Christ had lately eaten the passover with his disciples; it was no doubt the most convenient place they could find for that solemnity; an upper room being remote from noise and company, and spacious enough to receive this primo-primitive church, consisting of an hundred and twenty persons. It teaches us, That all advantages with respect to time and place, and other circumstances, for the better performance of holy duties, ought to be made use of and improved by us. 4. The persons what were the first constituting members of this new constituted church; together with the apostles mention is made of women in general, and of the Virgin Mary in particular; where we may remark, That this is the first and last time that the scripture makes mention of her after Christ's death. None of the Evangelists record one word of our Lord's appearing once to her, during his forty days stay and continuance upon earth after his resurrection.— Doubtless the Spirit of God in the holy scriptures, by speaking so sparing of her life, and nothing at all of her death, took care that all those fabulous reports of her assumption, which have since arisen, should find no footsteps in the word of God. God dealt with her, as with Moses, of whose sepulchre no man knoweth unto this day, lest it should be abused to idolatry. The learned Dr. Lightfoot is of opinion that she continued under the care of the beloved disciple, unto whom Christ committed her for some time, and at last was taken away by martyrdom, according to Simeon's prophecy, Luke ii. 35. A sword shall pierce through thine own soul also. Which prophecy, he thinks, pointed at the manner of her death: but notwithstanding the silence of the scriptures, the church of Rome confidently affirms, that the Virgin lived sixty three years and that all the apostles were at her funeral, except St. Thomas. who desiring afterward to see her holy corpse, the sepulchre being opened the third day, the body was gone, being assumed and taken up into heaven.

15 ¶ And in those days Peter stood up in the midst of the disciples, and said, (the number of the names together were about an hundred and twenty) 16 Men and brethren, This scripture must needs have been fulfilled, which the holy Ghost by the mouth of David spake before concerning Judas, which was guide to them that took Jesus. 17 For he was numbered with us, and had obtained part of this ministry. 18 Now this man purchased a field with the reward of iniquity; and falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out. 19 And it was known unto all the dwellers at Jerusalem; insomuch as that field is called in their proper tongue Aceldama, that is to say, the field of blood. 20 For it is written in the book of Psalms, Let his habitation be desolate, and let no man dwell therein: and, His bishopric let another take.

During the ten days stay and continuance of the apostles at Jerusalem, before the feast of Pentecost, a motion was made amongst them for filling up the vacancy in the sacred college of the apostles, which was occasioned by the death of the traitor Judas; and here we have observable, 1. The person that made this motion, St. Peter: In those days Peter stood up, and said. Whence the church of Rome would infer his supremacy, but very groundlessly. For St. Peter's being the chief speaker, and sometimes the sole speaker, is not to be attributed to his superiority; but, 1. To his seniority, he being probably elder than the rest. 2. To his apostolical office; he was appointed to be the first and chief minister of the circumcision; to preach among the Jews; and therefore no wonder that Peter is first mentioned, when any thing relating to the Jewish affairs is recited. 3. His forwardness to speak and act for Christ and his interest, may be imputed to his repentance, it being but necessary that he, who had so scandalously fallen, should, by his future zeal, convince the world both of his repentance and recovery. And accordingly he speaks, acts, and labours more abundantly than all the apostles; not that the rest were idle or insignificant; for they were equal with him, having an equal authority, an equal gift of miracles, an equal number of tongues, an equal power to preach the gospel, and equal wisdom in preaching of it: For the reasons above mentioned, St. Peter spake and did so much having dishonoured Christ before by his cowardly denial of him, he now resolves to signalize himself by shewing extraordinary measures of zeal and activity for him. 2. The honourable office and station which Judas once had; He was numbered with the apostles, and obtained part of that ministry with them. Judas though (secretly) a thief, a traitor, yea, a devil, yet had he, by Christ's own choice, a part or office in the apostolic order. Oh Lord! how possible, and yet how sad is it to preach to others, and to become cast away ourselves! to prophesy in thy name, and yet to perish in thy wrath! to cast devils out of others, and yet be cast to the devils ourselves! to have our ministry blessed to others comfort and salvation, and at the same time to minister to his own condemnation! Quis talia fando temperet a lachrymis? 3. Judas's sin described; He was to guide them that took Jesus, ver. 16. A guide to the chief priests in their counsels, as to the manner of apprehending Christ; and a guide to the soldiers, as to the time and place of his apprehension. Note thence, that there cannot be a greater sin than for a person to be a guide and leader of others into sin. Wo to magistrates! wo to ministers! wo to parents that are found guilty of this sin. 4. Judas's punishment declared: 1. He was hanged or strangled; some think by his own hand; others by the devil's. No doubt that Satan, who had so great a hand in his sin, had more than a finger in his punishment. Of all mortals, no wretch ever deserved so direful a fate as this traitor Judas; And doubtless it was the dreadfullest that the devil could inflict. It is added, that he burst asunder, and his bowels gushed out. The rope, or that to which it was fastened, breaking, he fell down headlong, and burst asunder, and his bowels gushed out. A just and suitable punishment for his want of bowels to his kind and innocent Master. 3. He went to his own place; that is, he went and was sent to hell and damnation, the proper place for the son of perdition; called his own place, because of his own chusing, of his own deserving, of his own procuring; it was what he had purchased to himself by the wages of iniquity, and justly deserved for his final impenitency.

21 Wherefore of these men which have accompanied with us, all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, 22 Beginning from the baptism of John unto that same day that he was taken up from us, must one be ordained to be a witness with us, of his resurrection. 23 And they appointed two, Joseph called Barsabas, who was surnamed Justus, and Matthias. 24 And they prayed and said, Thou, Lord, which knowest the hearts of all men, shew whether of these two thou hast chosen, 25 That he may take part of this ministry and apostleship, from which Judas by transgression fell, that he might go to his own place. 26 And they gave forth their lots: and the lot fell upon Matthias; and he was numbered with the eleven apostles.

Judas having in the forementioned manner made void his office, and being gone to his own place, St. Peter moves the company, that another person may be chosen to fill up the place. Where note, 1. The electors or persons choosing; namely, the hundred and twenty; these were the eleven apostles, the seventy disciples, and about thirty-eight more, all of Christ's own kindred, country, or converse; not that these were all the believers that were found in Jerusalem, for he appeared to five hundred brethren at once; but these followed him continually, were of his family and society, and of his immediate train and retinue and appointed by him for the ministry: These therefore make the choice; and of one among themselves was the choice made. 2. The qualification of the person which St. Peter directs the company to observe in the choice they make of this new apostle: One that had accompanied with them all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among them: That is, one that had followed Christ from his baptism to his ascension, to the intent that he might be an authentic witness, both of the doctrine and miracles but particularly of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus: For the article of the resurrection includes many other articles of faith in it; for if he arose from the grave, he was buried; if he was buried, he died; if he died, he was born. Therefore the person whom they chuse, was to be one that had accompanied with them. 3. That the apostles did not presume to ordain an apostle by imposition of hands; but the other apostles being chosen of God immediately, it was necessary that he who was to act in the same office, should be chosen after the same manner. Accordingly they cast lots, and leave the determination to God, who devolving it upon Matthias: he was there numbered with the eleven apostles. Lots were used among the Jews for dividing inheritances, for composing differences, for determining elections; and how casual soever it seemed, God was the undoubted determiner of it. Therefore to cast lots upon trivial occasions, and solemnly to appeal to God's determination in ludicrous matters, is profanely to take the name of God in vain.

C H A P. II.

The second chapter gives us an account of the miraculous effusion of the Holy Ghost upon the apostles at the feast of Pentecost. This was matter of wonder and amazement to some; but of scorn and mocking derision unto others. Hereupon St. Peter stands up, and in a most eminent sermon defends the apostles, and convicts the Jews of crucifying the Lord of life, and then exhorts them to believe on him whom they had ignominiously put to death: and the Holy Spirit crowned his endeavours with a desirable success.

AND when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place. 2 And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. 3 And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. 4 And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance.

In this extraordinary and miraculous descent of the Holy Ghost upon the apostles; observe, 1. The time when, when the day of Pentecost was fully come; that is, fifty days after Christ's resurrection. The day of Pentecost is probably believed to have fallen then upon the Lord's day; it is certain, from acts i. that the Spirit descended when the apostles were unanimously assembled for his worship, and continued with one accord in prayer and supplication. There is no way to obtain the Holy Spirit from heaven, both as a sanctifier and as a comforter, like fervent prayer assiduity and perseverance in our devotion, especially in the public assemblies of the saints. 2. The place where, at Jerusalem, the more general place where our Lord had undergone his ignominy and reproach, there he manifests forth his glory and dignity: First by his triumphant ascension, and afterwards by his miraculous mission of the Holy Spirit. The more particular place was the upper room where they were assembled and constantly prayed. This upper chamber was most raised towards heaven, most remote from noise and company, and worldly distractions, The Spirit of God descends upon and rests with such as have raised affections above the world, and are nearest unto heaven; not upon such as are buried alive in worldly business: Earth will extinguish fire as well as water, and some say sooner; not only sensual lust, but an excess of earthly business and worldly drudgery, will quench the Holy Spirit, and cause him to depart and go away grieved from us. 3. The persons on whom the Holy Ghost thus descended, namely, the apostles: not that they were without the Holy Spirit until now: they had him before in his sanctifying graces; here they receive him in his extraordinary gifts, to fit them for extraordinary purposes. When God extraordinarily calls any of his servants to more than ordinary service, they may expect more than ordinary assistance. The Holy Spirit now descended upon the apostles in his miraculous gifts, and if we be not wanting to ourselves, he will descend upon us in visible favours, every day, making our souls and bodies a temple, and fit habitation for himself to dwell in, by his sanctifying impressions, by his powerful assistances, by his quickening influences; pouring in both the oil of grace, and also the oil of joy and gladness, into our hearts. 4. The manner how the Holy Ghost at this time descended on the apostles: 1. Suddenly, like the wind; A mighty rushing wind from heaven: Insinuating, that it was not the apostles' prayer that brought, but Christ's promise and power, that sent the Holy Ghost thus miraculously down upon them. This rushing wind also did represent the mighty efficacy of the Holy Spirit now descending. 2. In the appearance of fiery cloven cloven tongues, cloven, to signify the variety of languages which the apostles should be enabled to speak, and to qualify them to preach the gospel unto all nations: and fiery, to represent that fervent heat and zeal they should be endued with themselves; that divine light they should impart to others; as also that purity and holiness which they and all succeeding ministers of the gospel ought to appear beautified and adorned with: Finally, As fire dissipateth and disperseth, multiplieth and increaseth, even so the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, the more they are diffused and employed, the more they will be increased; by imparting to our people, we shall gather to ourselves. Thus was our Lord's promise fulfilled to his apostles, in sending down the Holy Ghost upon them, but not upon them only; the private christian, no doubt, as well as the public apostle, did receive the Holy Spirit according to his measure: To enlighten, as a Spirit of knowledge; to enliven, as a spirit of life; to warm and heat, as a spirit of zeal; to mollify and soften, as a spirit of holy fear; to quicken and strengthen, as a spirit of wisdom and counsel; to unite and knit their hearts together, as a spirit of love. And blessed be God for the promise of the same Holy Spirit to abide with all believers, though not in his miraculous gifts; yet in his sanctifying operations and saving graces, to the end of the world.

5 And there were dwelling at Jerusalem Jews, devout men, out of every nation under heaven. 6 Now when this was noised abroad, the multitude came together, and were confounded, because that every man heard them speak in his own language. 7 And they were all amazed, and marvelled, saying one to another, Behold, are not all these which speak Galileans? 8 And how hear we every man in our own tongue wherein we were born? 9 Parthians and Medes, and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, and in Judea, and Cappadocia, in Pontus, and Asia, 10 Phrygia, and Pamphylia, in Egypt, and in the parts of Libya about Cyrene, and strangers of Rome, Jews and Proselytes, 11 Cretes, and Arabians: we do hear them speak in our tongues the wonderful works of God. 12 And they were all ashamed, and were in doubt, saying one to another, What meaneth this? 13 Others mocking said, These men are full of new wine.

The fame of the foregoing miraculous operation of the Holy Spirit being instantly spread abroad in Jerusalem, and there being present at that time great multitudes of Jews, who had come from all parts of Judea, to the feast of Pentecost, and also many other Jews and Proselytes born in other nations: Mesopotamia, Cappadocia, Phrygia, and Pamphylia, who were now come to worship the true God at Jerusalem; when they heard the apostles speak in their own language, which they never understood before, the wonderful works of God, in the death, resurrection, and ascension of our Lord Jesus Christ; some of them wondered to hear illiterate men speaking all languages;

others derided the miracle, and imputed it to drunkenness: Here note, 1. The wisdom and providence of Almighty God, in ordering the first publication of the gospel, that the fame thereof, and of that convincing miracle which gave authority thereunto, might be carried into all nations by so many eye and ear witnesses, as were worshipping at Jerusalem at this time: For there were now sojourning at Jerusalem, men of every nation under heaven; that is, of every nation, where any Jews were scattered at this time throughout the world, there were some particular persons come up now to Jerusalem to worship God. 2. The commendatory character given of those persons, who from their several countries came up to the house of God in Jerusalem, to worship him there: They are styled devout men: And they received from God the reward of their piety and devotion. Had they staid at home, as many of their brethren no doubt did, they had not been witnesses of so wonderful a miracle for the confirmation of their faith as now they were. Yet note, 3. The different influence and effect which this miracle of the holy Spirits descent in fiery cloven tongues, had upon the minds of the people in Jerusalem. Some were struck into an ecstasy of admiration and awful wonder; others (the scribes and Pharisees probably) scornfully deride, and impute the miracle to drunkenness, saying, These men are full of new wine. A senseless slander; for though excess of wine may give a man more tongue, yet not more tongues. O! how have the holy operations of the blessed Spirit from the beginning been slandered and blasphemed; accounted the effects of drunkenness then, of enthusiasm or melancholy now.

14 ¶ But Peter standing up with the eleven, lift up his voice and said unto them, Ye men of Judea, and all ye that dwell at Jerusalem, be this known unto you, and hearken to my words: 15 For these are not drunken, as ye suppose, seeing it is but the third hour of the day. 16 But this is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel, 17 And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh: and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams: 18 And on my servants, and on my hand maidens I will pour in those days of my Spirit; and they shall prophesy: 19 And I will shew wonders in heaven above, and signs on the earth beneath; blood and fire, and vapour of smoke: 20 The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come: 21 And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved.

Observe here, The holy courage of St. Peter, in defending the innocency of the apostles, and confuting the calumny of drunkenness, which was now cast upon himself and them: These are not drunken, as ye suppose, seeing it is but the third hour of the day. Where note, 1. How he argues argues negatively from the time of the day; it was but the third hour of the day, that is, nine o'clock in the morning, which was the hour for the morning sacrifice and prayer, and the worshippers of God (at the great feast especially) were never wont to eat or drink before those holy services were performed. In those times they went to their public devotions fasting; they served God before they served their bellies. The first fruits of the day were offered in the temple then; in the tavern now: ten morning and evening visits, are made by some to the latter, for one to the former. Note farther, How he argues positively: he assures them, that the apostles were full of the Holy Ghost, and not full of wine, filled with the Spirit of God; and that what was now done, was the completion of a prophecy uttered by Joel: That in the last days, that is, the days of the Messiah, there should be a most plentiful effusion of the holy Spirit, upon all flesh; that is, upon Jews and Gentiles, and upon all sorts of persons without distinction, old and young, sons and daughters, bond and free. Learn thence, That the Spirit of God is a free Spirit, not confined to any party, to any order and degrees of men, but plentifully and abundantly poured forth under the gospel dispensation upon all believers. It is one of the great cheats which the Pope has imposed upon the world, to persuade men that the Spirit of God is tied to the pommel of his chair: That he, and his cardinals have monopolized the Holy Ghost. But, blessed be God, he has promised to pour out his Spirit upon all flesh, even upon servants and handmaids, to shew, that he doth not despise persons of the lowest rank and condition in this world, but, that the promise of the Spirit is made unto them also. Lastly, What is here foretold that should come to pass after this great effusion of the holy Spirit, namely, Wonders in the heaven; and signs in the earth, the sun turned into darkness, and the moon into blood. Which expressions signify the great miseries and troubles, the calamities and desolations which should befall the Jews before the destruction of Jerusalem; for their crucifying the Lord of life and glory: Unto which is subjoined the only way to escape and avoid them; namely, calling upon the Lord in fervent prayer and supplication: Whoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved. Intimating, that prayer makes us shot-free, and is a sure defence in all storms; that no evil shall fatally touch our persons, or come near our dwellings, whilst we take hold of God by faith, and approach unto him by prayer. Lord! how happy is it when strong afflictions from thee, raise strong affections in us towards thee.

22 Ye men of Israel, hear these words; Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs, which God did by him in the midst of you, as ye yourselves also know; 23 Him; being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain: 24 Whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death: because it was not possible that he should be holden of it.

St. Peter having wiped off the unjust aspersion of drunkenness cast upon himself and his brethren in the foregoing verses; in these he makes it his business to convince the Jews that they were the murderers of the best man that ever lived in the world, even Jesus of Nazareth the true and promised Messiah. In order to this, he treats in this sermon, 1. Of the person and life of Christ. 2. Of the sufferings and death of Christ. 3. Of the resurrection of him from the grave. 1. As touching his person, the apostle shews, That he was evidently sent from God, and approved of by him, by those many miracles, wonders, and signs which were wrought by him. Hence note, That the many and great miracles wrought by Christ, evidently prove that he was sent of God, and came from him, and was approved by him. Our Saviour's miracles, for the nature of them, were beneficial to mankind; for the number of them, they were many; for the manner of their operation, they were public and open, in the sight and view of all people; not in corners, like the Popish miracles, (wrought before their own creatures only) but before his enemies; and for the quality of them, they were of the greatest magnitude, cleansing the lepers, raising the dead, giving sight to them that were born blind: in a word spoken, by a touch given: So that our blessed Saviour had all that attestation that miracles can give, that he was commissioned by God, and came from God. The second part of St. Peter's sermon treats of the sufferings and death of Christ: By wicked hands ye have crucified and slain him who was delivered by the determinate counsel of God. Where note, 1. The name and kind of death which Christ died: This is described more generally, it was a violent death, Ye have slain him; more particularly, it was an ignominious, cursed, and dishonourable death, Ye have crucified him. Learn thence, That the Lord Jesus Christ was not only put to death, but to the worst of deaths, even the death of the cross. Now the death of the cross was a violent death, a painful death, a shameful death, a lingering death, a succourless death, and an accursed death. 2. The causes of Christ's death here expressed. The principal cause, permitting and ordering was the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God. The instrumental cause effecting, was, the wicked hands of the Jews; Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain. Learn hence, That there was not any one particular action or single circumstance relating to the death of Christ, but what came under the holy counsel and wise determination of God. Yet this foreknowledge and counsel of God, as it did not necessitate and force them to it, so neither doth it excuse them in it. God's foreknowledge and determinate counsel did no more compel or force their wicked hands to do what they did, than the mariner's hoisting up his sails to take the wind to serve his design, can be said to compel the wind to blow. God's end in acting was one, their end in acting was another: His most pure and holy; their's most malicious and daringly wicked. In respect of God, Christ's death was justice and mercy; in respect of man, it was murder and cruelty; in respect to himself, it was obedience and humility. The third part of the apostles sermon respects the resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ from from the grave. Ver. 24. Whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death; because it was not possible that he should be holden of it. Christ, though laid, was not lost in the grave; but revived and rose again, and rose by the power of his Godhead. True, God is here said to raise him, and the Spirit elsewhere; but we are not to understand it so, as if they had raised it by their power, without his own power; for he declares it expressly, John ii. In three days I will raise up the temple of my body: And if he had not raised himself by his own power, how could he be said, Rom. i. 4. To be declared to be the Son of God by the resurrection from the dead? What more had appeared in Christ's resurrection than in any other, if that were all? for others were raised by the power of God as well as he. Now, because the Jews, to whom St. Peter preaches, were filled with prejudice against Christ, the apostle thought fit to tell them that God had raised him from the dead; yet, by consequence, it sufficiently appears in the following discourse, that Christ raised himself from the dead. Learn hence, that the Lord Jesus Christ, by the omnipotent power of the Godhead, the father's, the Spirit's, and his own Godhead, revived, and rose again from the dead, to the terror and consternation of his enemies, and the unspeakable consolation of all believers. As by the eternal Spirit, or the power of his own Godhead, he offered up himself to God when he died; so when he was put to death in the flesh, he was quickened by the Spirit; that is, by the power of his divine nature. The same Spirit enabled him to do both. Observe also, The reason annexed, why God raised up Jesus Christ: because it was impossible that death should hold him: But how impossible? 1. It was naturally impossible, upon the account of that divine power which was inherent in his person as God. 2. It was legally impossible, because divine justice being fully satisfied by his sufferings, required, that he should be raised to life: as when a debt is paid, the prisoner is discharged, and the prison door opened.

25 For David speaketh concerning him, I foresaw the Lord always before my face, for he is on my right hand, that I should not be moved. 26 Therefore did my heart rejoice, and my tongue was glad; moreover also, my flesh shall rest in hope: 27 Because thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine holy One to see corruption. 28 Thou hast made known to me the ways of life: Thou shalt make me full of joy with thine countenance. 29 Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day. 30 Therefore being a prophet and knowing that God had sworn with an oath unto him, that of the fruit of his loins according to the flesh he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne. 31 He seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, and that his soul was not left in hell, neither his flesh did see corruption. 32 This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses.

33 Therefore being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shewed forth this, which ye now see and hear. 34 For David is not ascended into the heavens: but he saith himself, the Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, 35 Until I make thy foes thy footstool.

St. Peter here proceeds in this memorable sermon, which he preached at the feast of Pentecost, to convince the Jews, that Jesus, whom they had crucified, was undoubtedly the promised Messiah, because he was raised from the grave according to the prophetic prediction, Psal. xvi. Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine holy One to see corruption. And accordingly, St. Peter doth strongly prove that these words, in their literal sense, could not be spoken of David, because he was left in the grave, and saw corruption; but must be applied unto Christ, who though he was laid, yet was not lost in his grave, but saw no corruption, being raised by God the third day. Hence note, That though death bound the hands and feet of Jesus Christ, and laid him in his grave, yet, Sampson-like, he snapt and broke those bands asunder, it being impossible that he should be holden of them, or confined by them. It was impossible for Christ to continue death's prisoner in the grave longer than three days: 1. Because he was Lord of life and death, he was the resurrection and the life, life to quicken himself, and the resurrection to raise us; he was the resurrection effectively, the life essentially and formally. Now it was impossible for death to hold him that was life itself under its power, any longer than he who is life pleased; and for this reason he is said to swallow up death in victory, 1 Cor. xv. 54. Note, 2. Because of his undertaking for us; for if Christ had been held by corporal death; we must have continued forever under the power of spiritual death; therefore the holy One was not suffered to see corruption, the least corruption, according to the prophetic prediction, Psal. xvi. Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; that is, my dead body in the grave; (for David was left in that hell, from which Christ was raised; but the hell that David was in, was not beyond the grave (nor suffer thine holy one to see corruption; that is, I shall neither see, nor feel, nor lie under the power of corruption; but shall suddenly rise again, and then my Father will show me the path of life; and make me full of joy with his countenance; that is, after my resurrection, I shall live for ever in glory, in the presence of my Father, where I shall have fulness of joy, and rivers of pleasure forevermore. The last part of St. Peter's sermon treats of Christ's ascension: Ver. 33. Therefore being by the right hand of God exalted &c. intimating, that though the Lord Jesus Christ had finished his work upon earth; he was placed in the seat of the highest honour and authority, at the right hand of God in heaven: To convince the Jews of the certainty thereof, St. Peter, applies that promise, Psal. cx. unto Christ, Sit thou on my right hand until I make thy foes thy footstool. Shewing that these words are not at all applicable unto David; for David is not ascended into heaven in his own person, but his body remained in the sepulchre then amongst them; but Christ was ascended, and at the right hand of God exalted, and pursuant to his promise, and had now sent down the Holy Ghost in fiery cloven tongues, and divers languages upon them. Where note, The great and wonderful change in the state and condition of Christ, since his ascension into heaven. A little while since they called him the carpenters son, this fellow, this deceiver; now he has obtained a more excellent name than angels. Then he had not a place to lay his head on; now he is exalted to be heir of all things. Here he sweats, there he sits; here he groaned; there he triumphs, never to groan, weep, or bleed more. His human nature is now advanced to the highest honours, even to be the object of adoration both to angels and men. This was the doctrinal part of St. Peter's sermon: It treated of the person, life, miracles, death, resurrection and ascension of the Lord Jesus, in a very close and convincing manner. His warm application of the whole now follows, ver. 36.

36 Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus whom ye have crucified both Lord and Christ.

That is, God the Father hath ordained and appointed this Jesus whom ye have crucified, to be the head and Saviour of his church, he being the true and promised Messiah. Learn hence, That the Lord Jesus Christ was constituted and appointed by his Father, to be the supreme Governor and only Saviour of his Church. God had made Jesus both Lord and Christ, both a Prince and a Saviour. Note farther, How very close and home the apostle is in applying what he had said to his auditors; he doth not rest in generals; but says plainly, Ye are men. This is the same Jesus whom ye have crucified, whom ye with wicked hands have slain; Had not the appellation been so close, it is probable the success of the sermon had not been so considerable. Thence learn, That the success and efficacy of the word preached depends upon a particular and warm application of it to every man's conscience; generals will not affect. See an instance of it in what follows.

37 ¶ Now when they heard this they were pricked in their heart, and said unto Peter and to the rest of the apostles, Men and brethren, what shall we do?

Here the success of St. Peter's sermon is recorded: The auditors were not only affected, but their hearts were touched with a kindly remorse; they mourn for sin, and enquire what they should do to be saved: Some in our days would have been offended at such inquiry, and told them, it was not doing, but believing only, that God expected; that Christ had done all for them, and that they had nothing to do, but to believe strongly that all was done to their hands; but St. Peter reproves them not for their iniquity, but puts them upon doing; namely, the exercise and practice of repentance in the next verse. Here note,
1. That conversion where it is in truth, begets and occasions a very great and sensible change. 2. That the preaching of the word is the instrumental means for the effecting and accomplishing of this change. 3. That the best preaching is that which pricks men's hearts, wounds and convinces their consciences, and makes them thoroughly sensible both of their sin and danger, and of the great necessity of a change. 4. That when men are once convinced of their bad state, and dangerous condition, their first inquiry will be, yea, should, and ought to be, What they should do to be saved? They said, Men and brethren, what shall we do? The apostle liked that inquiry very well; and answers it in the next verse.

38 Then said Peter unto them, Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. 39 For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call. 40 And with many other words did he testify and exhort, saying, Save yourselves from this untoward generation.

Note 1. St. Peter exhorts them to repentance. But did they not repent already? were they not now pricked at their hearts? and will the apostle add grief to grief, and pain to smart? Know, that the apostle advises them to join to their legal sorrow, exangelical repentance, such as is attended and accompanied with owning Christ to be the true Messiah, with believing in him, with desire and hope of pardon from him. Where by the way, observe, That St. Peter prescribes a dose of the same physic for them, which he had very lately taken himself with good success, when upon his hearty sorrow he obtained pardon for denying his Lord and Master. Matt. xxvi. 75. He went out and wept bitterly. No sermons are so sovereign and successful as those which proceed from the minister's personal and comfortable experience. St. Peter presses upon his auditors the doctrine of repentance which he himself had practised. 2. Upon their repentance, their owning of and believing in Christ he directs them to be baptized in his name, and then they should be capable of the gifts of the Holy Ghost; even of those miraculous gifts which they now saw and admired in the apostles. Learn hence, That baptism is a solemn ordinance and sacred institution of Jesus Christ, which is not to be administered to any out of the christian church, till they profess repentance and faith in Christ, and sincere obedience to him: Repent, and be baptized every one of you. 3. The argument which the apostle uses with them, by way of encouragement, to persuade them to repent and be baptized; for says he, The promise unto you, and your children; To you Jews of the seed of Abraham, and to your seed; and to as many of the Gentiles, and their seed, as shall be called by the preaching of the gospel to profess faith in Christ, and subjection to him. Where, by the promise, is meant the gracious covenant of God, whereby he offers pardon and peace to such as will accept them. Now this acceptance is two fold: 1. Cordial; which intitles a person to all the benefits of the covenant, temporal, spiritual and eternal. And, 2. Professional only; which intitles a person and his seed to church privileges only. Hence learn, That when God takes believing parents into covenant with himself, he takes also their children or seed into covenant with himself likewise. And if so, then the feal of the covenant, which is baptism, ought to be applied to them. It is evident, that under the Old Testament, children were in covenant with God, as well as their parents. And do we any where find that ever they were cast out under the gospel? the apostle doth not say, The promise was unto you and your seed; but still is; for otherwise children would be in a worse condition under the gospel of Christ, than they were under the law of Moses; but surely the privileges of the gospel are not straiter and narrower than those of the law. Lastly, How St. Peter closes all with an exhortation to his auditors, to save themselves from that untorward generation; that is, from the scribes and Pharisees, that four sort of men, who desperately and maliciously opposed Christ and his gospel, and, by their authority and example, kept people from embracing the only way of salvation revealed by Jesus Christ.

41 ¶ Then they that gladly received his word were baptized: and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls.

Note here, 1. The wonderful success of St. Peter's sermon: About three thousand were converted to the profession of the christian religion in one day, by hearing a single sermon: How many thousands of sermons have been since preached, without the conversion of a single person! Oh! what a high holiday was this memorable day in heaven! This All Saints day was a festival of great solemnity there, where there is joy over one sinner that repenteth. But here did occur several advantages, to render Peter's sermon more effectual: 1. The sufferings of our Saviour were so near in a place, and so late in time that his wounds were still fresh bleeding on the guilty memories of the people now assembled. 2. The present miracle of tongues, bestowed on Peter, and his unlearned companions, did wonderfully make way for the word delivered. And, 3. His auditors were devout men, ver. 5. ignorant enough, but yet brought with them minds fairly disposed for information and conviction. 4. The Holy Spirit wrought now extraordinarily, by and with the word, and caused this miraculous improvement. How did our Saviour fulfil this promise to his disciples. John xiv. 12. Greater works than these shall ye do, when I go to my Father. Now was Peter the disciple above his Master in success: Christ all his life time was angling for a few fishes, whilst Peter comes with his drag-net, and catches three thousand at one cast. 2. These three thousand were baptized the same day in which they were converted, and probably in the same place, which was at Jerusalem; either in the temple, or in some house, where the sermon was preached. We need not inquire, whether the apostles did it by dipping or sprinkling, both being lawful; but this may be said, it is hard to guess how such a quantity of water could be brought to the place, as might serve for the decent dipping of three thousand persons in so short a time. And, upon supposition that the water was not brought to them, but they went down to that; baptizing so many by dipping, would have required a week rather than a day to dispatch it in.

42 And they continued stedfastly in the apostles

Which words give us an account of the behaviour of the first christians, particularly in their religious assemblies and of the way of worship, used in the church of Jerusalem, the true mother-church in the time of the apostles. Where note, 1. The doctrine which they adhered to, the doctrine of the apostles; that is, the doctrine delivered by Christ, and taught by the apostles, and contained in the holy scriptures. This was the rule which the first christians governed themselves by, both as to faith and manners. It was infinite wisdom in God to inspire holy men for committing this doctrine to writing, and not to leave it to the hazardous and uncertain way of tradition. 2. The steady adherence of the first christians to this doctrine of the apostle; They continued stedfastly in it; that is, they were constant hearers of it, and attendants upon it; they received it not upon trust, but due examination. Learn hence, that religion being the great interest and common concern of mankind, he that espouses it aright, must first understand and examine the fundamental grounds and principles of it, and then chuse accordingly; otherwise our adherence to the best religion in the world, will rather be the result of chance than of judgment and choice. 3. They continued stedfast in fellowship: This may signify and import three things: (1.) Their communion with the apostles, their keeping close to their own teachers, in opposition to schism, which is causeless, and therefore a culpable separation; they were obedient to their spiritual governors and instructors. (2.) Their society among themselves, and communion one with another; as the communion of saints in heaven is a considerable part of the happiness of heaven, so the fellowship of saints on earth is a sort of heaven upon earth: the comfort of our lives depends much upon society, but more upon the suitableness of society. The primitive saints were all of one mind, and therefore fit to make one body. For though man loves company, yet it is the company of those he loves. (3.) Mutual assistance which they gave and received, a communication of free distribution to the necessities of each other: they did by love serve one another, and parted with their possessions for the support of each other: this liberality and supplying one another's wants, did plainly shew, that they esteemed themselves as fellow-members of the same body, and that they were perfectly united in heart and affection. Note, 4. Another religious office, in which they continued constant, was breaking of bread; that is, receiving the sacrament. So great and fervent was the devotion of the first christians, that none of their religious assemblies passed, in which they did not make this solemn commemoration of our Saviour, and shew forth his death: looking upon their other religious service lame and defective without this. Our Saviour's blood was still warm, and those first christians kept it so, by their devout and frequent remembrances of it: and it was their constancy in breaking bread, which quickened and put life into all their religious actions: This fitted them both for doing and dying. Their frequent drinking of the blood of Christ fired them with zeal for shedding their blood for Christ. Lord! what reason reason can men now give for neglecting so holy and useful an institution? Are we above these helps to a good life which they used? Have we not as much need to arm ourselves against sin and temptation as they had? but the plain truths, Men are not willing to be so holy now, as they were then. This ordinance, their consciences tell them, would engage them to a greater strictness of life than they are willing to undergo. They must leave their sins, which they are loath to part with; they must forgive their enemies, whom they had rather be revenged of; they must enter into new engagements, whereas they had rather be at liberty: So that those things which make men loath to come to the sacrament, are indeed, if duly considered, the greatest arguments to draw them thither; and according to the example of these primitive christians, to be constant in breaking of bread. Note, 5. The last thing which they continued steadfast and constant in, was prayer; that is, in the public and solemn addresses made to God in the religious assemblies whereby they poured out their souls to God, both in prayer and supplication, and in praise and thank-givings. The public prayers and intercessions of the church of Christ, are greatly to be esteemed by all christians; they glorify God most, he esteems and accepts them best; this keeps up a sense of God and religion in the world, and nothing delights God more than the joint prayers and praises of his people. Psal. lxxxvii. 1. The Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all performances in the dwellings of Jacob.

43 And fear came upon every soul: and many wonders and signs were done by the apostles. 44 And all that believed were together, and had all things common, 45 And sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men, as every man had need.

Note here, 1. What awful respect God obliged the people of Jerusalem to pay unto the apostles: Fear came upon every soul, at the sight of those wonders and signs which were wrought by the apostles. It is God that keeps up the authority and reverence of his ministers in the minds of their people: Did not he hold these stars in his own right hand, how soon would men trample them under their feet! 2. An extraordinary instance of a noble charity among these primitive christians: They had all things common; that is, they chose rather to part with their estates, than that any of their brethren should want, the rich very readily sold their possessions and goods to help and relieve the poor. Yet observe, 1. That this community was not of all their goods, but of that part only which every one did voluntarily consecrate and devote to the relief of the church's necessities. It was not in a strict sense a community of goods that was here practised; but, by all things, we are to understand such things as every one freely laid aside for the maintenance of the poor. 2. That this practice was only used in Jerusalem, in the beginning of christianity, without being a precedent for after times and places. Res que erat temporaria necessitatis & liberi arbitrii non debet in exemplum trahi, multo minus ut necessaria obrudi. Christ's gospel doth not destroy the moral law; the eight commandment is still in force, which it could not be, if there were no property. The lesson for your instruction, to be gathered from this instance, is this, That they who have ability ought to abound always in ordinary and sometimes extraordinary works of charity: We must always relieve the saints wants, as we are able, and sometimes, upon an extraordinary occasion, above what we are well able.

46 And they, continuing daily with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread from house to house, did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart; 47 Praising God and having favour with all the people. And the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved.

This chapter concludes with giving us an account how these primitive christians spent their time together in the service of God, and in great simplicity and sincerity amongst themselves. They continued daily in the temple; that is, at the usual time of prayer they joined with the Jews in their prayers in the temple: We must not think that they preached sermons, and administered sacraments in the temple; that would not be endured, as appeareth chap. iv. 1. But having performed their public devotions daily in the temple at the accustomed times of prayer there, they used to resort to a private and particular place to celebrate the Lord's supper, and afterwards took their ordinary and necessary repast with gladness and singleness of heart. And thus these holy christians conversing together with great simplicity and sincerity, they went on cheerfully in their christian course, praising God for what he had done for them and by them; and their holy and harmless conversation procured them favour with the generality of the people, who had not their hearts possessed with the prejudice against christianity as the Pharisees had. And thus, by the purity of the apostles' doctrine, and the exemplary piety and unblameableness of their lives, the Lord daily added more and more converts to his infant christian church. Learn hence, That the work of a thorough and saving conversion upon the hearts, and in the lives of men, is God's work. It was not the mighty rushing wind, nor the miracle of the fiery cloven tongues, nor St. Peter's sermon, nor any of these, nor all of these, that did or could alone produce this great effect without God, and the internal operation of his holy Spirit. Therefore it is expressly said, That the Lord added to the church, not St. Peter, not all the apostles. Yet note, 2. That though God and his holy spirit be the author and efficient cause, yet the preaching of the gospel, and an exemplary conversation agreeable thereunto, were the subordinate helps and instrumental means conducing thereunto. They continuing daily in the temple, and breaking bread from house to house, did eat their bread with gladness, &c.

C H A P. III.

The constituting of the first gospel-church we had recorded in the former chapters. The first persecution raised against that church, is here related in this and the next chapter, together with the occasion of it; which which was St. Peter's healing of the lame beggar. No sooner was the primitive church planted, though miraculously, but a persecution is stirred up against it most maliciously to root it up, and lay it waste: Wherever God has his church, the devil will be sure to set up his chapel; not a chapel of ease for the saints, but a chapel of service for himself; hoping at once to strengthen the walls of his own kingdom, and to raze the foundation of Christ's church, which yet the gates of hell shall never, fully nor finally, prevail against.

NOW Peter and John went up together into the temple at the hour of prayer, being the ninth hour.

Note here, 1. The remarkable diligence and industry of St. Peter and the other apostles in preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ. At the third hour of the day, on the feast of Pentecost, that is, at nine o'clock in the morning, St. Peter preached a sermon, chap. ii. 14. which by the blessing of the holy Spirit accompanying it, converted three thousand souls. Here at three o'clock in the afternoon on the same day (as the learned Dr. Lightfoot notes) he preached a second sermon, which converts five thousand more. This affords at once a good precedent, and a good encouragement to the apostles' successors, the ministers of Christ, to the end of the world, for the preaching twice upon the Lord's day: If, in the room of three and five thousand souls we be instrumental for the conversion of one single soul, it is infinitely worth the indefatigable pains and diligence of our whole lives. 2. The place which the apostle preaches in is the temple; thither the apostles went, not to offer sacrifice, but to inform the Jews that the law of sacrifices was now abolished by the death of Christ; not to communicate with them in their antiquated worship, but that they might have a larger field to sow the seed of the gospel in. 3. The circumstance of time, at the hour of prayer. In all ages since God had a church in the world, there have been stated times and places for solemn public worship; by which means a sense of God and religion has been preserved and kept up in the world, which otherwise would be in danger of being lost. The worship of God in the closet will not do this, because it is unseen; but stated, solemn, public worship, glorifies God most, and he accepts it best, Psal. lxxxii. 2. The Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob. The apostles went up together into the temple at the hour of prayer. Sine stationibus non staret mundus.

2 And a certain man lame from his mother's womb was carried, whom they laid daily at the gate of the temple which is called Beautiful, to ask alms of them that entered into the temple; 3 Who seeing Peter and John about to go into the temple, asked an alms. 4 And Peter fastening his eyes upon him, with John, said, Look on us. 5 And he gave heed unto them, expecting to receive something of them.

Observe here, 1. The condition of this person. 1. He was poor, even to beggary; but poverty is no sign of God's disfavour, nor doth exclude any from partaking of the best of blessings. He was born a cripple, not lamed by casualty or accident, but lame from his mother's womb. 3. He had continued a cripple forty years, chap. iv. 22. The man was above forty years old, on whom this miracle of healing was shewed. Consequently the cure was the harder and the person cured more credible witness against them that cavilled at his cure. 2. The wonderful mercy and goodness of God towards this poor cripple; his miseries and calamities, his lameness and poverty, are over-ruled by God for good to him, even for the best good; namely, for bringing him to the knowledge of Jesus Christ, and salvation by him. O how good is God at making up all our losses, and exceeding not only our deserts, but our expectations also! This poor man only begged an alms, God gives him his limbs; yea, gives him his Son and salvation by him. Thus we receive of God daily more than we can either ask or think. 3. The apostles advice to the lame man, and his ready compliance with that advice. Look on us, says St. Peter; he doth not say, believe on us, but look on us, and believe on Christ. This the apostle spake to quicken his attention and excite his hope. As if Peter had said, "You look upon many others, as able to relieve your necessities; now look on us, and see what we can do for you." Accordingly he fastened his eyes upon the apostles, and beheld them as expectant of relief. Here note 1. The great mercy of God that was mingled with this poor man's affliction: though he was lame, he was not blind. He could and did steadfastly behold the apostles with a fixed eye both of body and mind. 2. That what the cripple could do, he must and did do, towards his own healing; he could not move a foot, but he could fix his eye. We are spiritual cripples, leading under a moral impotency; being without strength, Rom. v. 1. But God expects the exercise of our faculties, help, and healing. As the cripple looked up to the apostles, so may we look up to the ministers of God; hear them and apply to them, place ourselves under the word, dispensed by them; for he that made us without ourselves, will never save us without ourselves, but we must work out our own salvation, Phil. ii. 12.

6 Then Peter said, Silver and gold have I none: but such as I have give I thee: In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk. 7 And he took him by the right hand and lifted him up: and immediately his feet and ankle-bones received strength. 8 And he leaping up, stood, and walked, and entered with them into the temple, walking, and leaping, and praising God.

Note here, 1. The poverty of this great apostle St. Peter and his holy contempt of the world; silver and gold he had none; his pretended successor the pope upon his election says the same; but with as little sincerity as he says, Nolo episcopari: The apostles poverty was real, not fictitious. The holiest, the wisest, and best men, are seldom the wealthiest.

wealthiest. Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have I give: As if he had said, "I have no money to give thee but that which is better than money: I have received power from Christ to cure and heal diseases, and having received it freely, I will give it freely: Therefore, in the name of Jesus; that is, by the power of Jesus, whom in contempt you call Jesus of Nazareth, be healed, rise up and walk." 2. The nature of the miracle here wrought; it was, (1.) Public and open, not done in a corner, but before all the people at a public time, (Pentecost) and at a public place (the gates of the temple). The miracles, that is, the lying wonders wrought in the church of Rome, will not bear the light. Miracles by them are most pretended to, where people are most ignorant, and a dark shop is fittest for their false wares. 2. Instantaneous and sudden; immediately his feet and ancle bones received strength. This evidently shewed it to be God's work, he was perfectly cured, and instantly cured, though he was lame from his birth, and had continued lame above forty years. All things are easy, yea, equally easy, to an almighty power: If God speaks but the word, the lame shall leap as an hart! Isa. xxxv. 6, Note 3. The humility and faith of this great apostle discovered in the manner of the cure; his humility, in not disdain to touch and take hold of, and lift up his poor cripple from the ground; his faith in being fully persuaded of Christ's presence, relying on his power, and depending upon his promise, Mark xvi. 18. They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover. The apostles had not a power at their pleasure to work miracles; but when God pleased to work them, he made it known to them by inspiration, and put them upon it. 4. How the poor cripple piously ascribes the praise of this miracle to God only; He leaped and praised God, not the apostles. No instrument must rob God of his glory; we may pay and gratify the messenger, but must return our prime and principal thanks to our benefactor. No doubt the cripple returned thanks to the apostle, but his prayers unto God only. To conceal God's mercies is ingratitude; to attribute them to second causes is sacrilege.

9. And the people saw him walking and praising God. 10 And they knew that it was he which sat for alms at the beautiful gate of the temple: and they were filled with wonder and amazement at that which had happened unto him. 11. And as the lame man which was healed held Peter and John, all the people ran together unto them in the Porch that is called Solomon's greatly wondering. 12 ¶ And when Peter saw it, he answered unto the people Ye men of Israel, why marvel ye at this? or why look ye so earnestly on us, as though by our own power or holiness we had made this man to walk?

Note here, 1. As soon as ever the poor cripple received strength, all the people beheld him praising and blessing God. Learn thence, that the very first appearances of the power and mercy of God towards ourselves or any of ours, should put us upon the works of praise and rejoicing. We truly say, "Better late than never;" but it is best to be early in every good work, especially in the noblest and most angelical work; namely, that of thanksgiving, and praise. My voice shalt thou hear, says David, betimes in the morning; my praying voice, my praising voice. 2. The influence and effect that this miracle had upon the minds of the multitude; it occasioned wonder, but did not produce faith. They wondered, but not believed. Miracles will confirm faith, but not alone beget it. The Spirit's extraordinary works may produce astonishment; but it is the work of the Spirit that must produce faith. 3. How the apostle abaseth himself and his fellow disciple, that he might exalt Christ; he will not suffer the least part of the praise and glory of this miracle to stick to their own fingers, but gives it all to Christ; Think not that we by our own power and holiness have made this man to walk. The Jews had a conceit, that extraordinary holiness would enable a man to work miracles: The apostle denies it: For though there be a great difference betwixt miraculous faith and justifying faith, yet true justifying faith has a miracle in it, though not so obvious to sense, requiring the same power to work it in us, which raised up Christ from the dead, Eph. i. 11, Learn hence, That Christ's power, not his apostles' holiness, was the cause of all the miracles that were wrought by them. Why look ye so earnestly upon us, as though by our holiness we had made this man to walk? Through faith in his name, is this man made strong, ver. 16.

13 The God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, the God of our fathers, hath glorified his Son Jesus; whom ye delivered up, and denied him in the presence of Pilate, when he was determined to let him go. 14 But ye denied the Holy One, and the Just and desired a murderer to be granted unto you: 15 And killed the prince of Life, whom God hath raised from the dead; whereof we are witnesses. 16 And his name through faith in his name hath made this man strong, whom ye see and know: yea, the faith which is by him hath given him this perfect soundness in the presence of you all.

Note here, 1. How St. Peter lays hold upon this opportunity when the people are gathered together to gaze upon the lame beggar, to preach a second awakening sermon to the Jews; in which he rebukes them smartly for their cursed contempt of Christ, and the horrible indignities offered to him (1.) They denied him, although he was an holy and just One. (2.) They delivered him up to Pilate when he was inclined to let him go. 3. They preferred Barrabbas, the worst of men, and a murderer, before Jesus the best of men, and a Saviour. 4. They murdered the Messiah, called the Prince of Life, because he came to bring life into the world. Where note, That though probably none of the Jews then and there present, did actually nail Christ unto his cross, yet they having given their consent unto it, they are charged with killing the Lord of Life. A plenary and full consent to the sins of others, make us deeply guilty of other sins: Ver. 15. Ye delivered up and denied the Holy One; Ye have crucified the Lord of Life. 2. How St. Peter ascribes the whole of this miracle to the power power of faith; ver. 16. Through faith in his name, and the faith which is by him, hath given this man perfect soundness in the presence of you all. Faith is twice named in this one verse, because of the apostles faith in working the miracle, and the cripples faith in receiving of it, says Dr. Lightfoot: But questionless, it was chiefly the apostles faith: for the lame man shewed no faith in Christ before he was healed: he expected an alms, but little thought of receiving the use of his limbs; but the apostle firmly relying on the power and promise of Christ for healing, did believe that Christ could and would help and heal him. Learn hence, That as it is the property and prerogative of God to do the great things, it is the duty and property of faith to expect great things from God; great expectations from God honour the greatness of God: We dishonour God as much, or more, when we believe little, as when we do little. A great God and a small faith suit not well together: accordingly St. Peter here, knowing the all-sufficiency of Christ's power, exerts strength of faith, and through faith in the name of Christ, makes this man whole.

17 And now, brethren, I wot that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers. 18 But those things which God before had shewed by the mouth of all his prophets that Christ should suffer, he hath so fulfilled.

Observe here, 1. How careful the apostle was, not to drive those murderers of Christ, (and consequently the worst of men) to despair, but to draw them to repentance; in order to which, 1. He mitigates their sin, imputing it rather to ignorance and blind zeal, than to malice. (2.) He is so charitable as to impute it to the ignorance of the Pharisees their rulers also. (3.) He calls them brethren, though guilty of so great a mistake in their judgment, and fault in their practice. Now brethren, I wot that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers. Learn thence, That God used the ignorance of some, and malice of others, for his own glorious ends, in accomplishing the foreordained and foretold death of our Redeemer. 2. St. Peter acquaints them, to keep them from despair, that God hath decreed the sufferings of Christ for man, and by his prophets foretold them, who, as they spake by one Spirit, did all speak the same things, as if they had all spoken out of one mouth. So that what the Jews did, he tells them, was, though unknown to them, a fulfilling of ancient prophecies and promises for man's redemption. Those things which God had before shewed by the mouth of all his prophets that Christ should suffer, he hath now fulfilled. The death and sufferings of Christ, with all the circumstances relating thereunto, were all ordained by God, and foretold by the prophets; which though it doth not excuse his murderers from the guilt of a dreadful sin; yet may be improved as an argument to keep them from despair. What God before had shewed, he hath now fulfilled.

19 ¶ Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord.

The apostle, like a wise physician, having discovered to the Jews the danger of their disease in the foregoing verses, now directs them to the only effectual remedy, viz. Repentance: Repent, and be converted: that is, repent of your rejecting Jesus Christ, and be converted to true christianity. To repent, doth denote a change of the mind and judgment; and to be converted, a change in the life and conversation. The exhortation doth denote our duty, and supposes our ability also, by the assistance of that grace, which will never be wanting to sincere endeavours. They were subjects recipient of that vis grata verticordie as St. Austin calls it, "The heart changing power of the grace of God," which could and did enable them to convert and turn to God. Note farther, How this duty of repentance is urged from the effect and fruit, and profitable consequence of it. 1. Your sins shall be blotted out, a metaphor taken from the creditors which have the books of accounts in which all debts and reckonings are set down. 2. The times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord: by which some understand more generally the times of the gospel, others more particularly understand it of the time of Jerusalem's destruction; as if St. Peter had said, "Know, O my brethren, that the time of Christ's coming to Jerusalem to execute vengeance on his murderers, is now at hand! Repent therefore speedily of what you have done, that those dreadful days to his enemies, may be days of refreshment to you." But the days of refreshment are thought by most to signify the day of judgment, which will be a day of refreshing to all penitent sinners; because they shall there enjoy a complete and full absolution from all their sins. Note here, 1. That almighty God has his book of remembrance, in which he writes down all the sins which every person commits, in order to their accusation and charge. 2. That it is the great wisdom, interest and duty of every person, to take care that he gets his sins now blotted out of God's debt book, as he ever hopes that the reckoning day may be a day of refreshing to him. 3. That without repentance, conversion, and turning unto God, there will be no forgiveness, comfort, or refreshment from him. Repent, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come. 4. That a complete absolution and full discharge from all sin is not yet enjoyed till the day of judgment. We are in this life continually subject to new sins; and consequently are daily contracting new guilt, whereby arise new fears; so that a soul has not a full rest till the final absolution be pronounced at that solemn day.

20 And he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you: 21 Whom the heaven must receive until the time of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.

Here St. Peter enforces his exhortation to repentance with a strong motive; namely, the certainty of Christ's coming to judge the world. God shall send Jesus, this Jesus whom we preach to you, visibly, to justify and glorify all penitent and pardoned sinners, whom yet the heaven must contain till the restitution of all things; that is, to the end of the world, when the whole creation which now groaneth groaneth will be delivered, and man particularly restored to God, to himself, and to a blessed immortality. Learn hence, That Christ, being ascended into heaven in our human nature, shall abide and continue there until the restitution of all things, and his corporal presence here on earth is not to be expected, until he has put all his enemies under his feet. Now if his body be, and must continue in heaven, surely then it is not in the sacrament, as the Papists dream; who ascribe to Christ's human nature the property of a Godhead; namely, to be in ten thousand places at one and the same time, contrary to the nature of an human body. If the heavens must contain Christ, Christ must be contained in heaven, and then his presence in the sacrament doth not draw him from heaven; his bodily presence is in heaven, his spiritual presence with his people in the sacrament.

22. For Moses truly said unto the fathers, A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you.

23. And it shall come to pass, that every soul which will not hear that prophet, shall be destroyed from among the people.

These words are recorded, Deut. xviii. 15. and hereby St. Peter pertinently applied unto Christ, to convince the unbelieving Jews, that he is the true and only Messiah, the great Prophet and Teacher of his church, whose doctrine it was highly dangerous to condemn, though out of the mouth of such contemptible persons as he and St. John appeared to be unto them. Where note, 1. Christ according to his prophetic office is largely described, and that three ways, 1. By his title, a prophet; one that by his office is to declare the whole will of God to man. 2. By his type, a prophet like unto Moses; one that went between God and the people as Moses did; carrying God's mind to them, and returning their mind to God. As Moses confirmed his doctrine by miracles, so did Christ. As Moses brought Israel out of literal Egypt, so Christ brings us out of spiritual Egypt, whereof the Egyptian bondage was a figure. 3. By his flock and original, from which according to the flesh he sprang: I will raise him up from among thy brethren. Christ honoured the nation of the Jews, and the tribe of Judah with his nativity. Thus this great prophet is described. Note 2. A strict injunction to hear and obey this great prophet; hear him only, hear him universally. The word (him) is to be understood exclusively, him and none but him; that is, in the same manner that we hear him; for his own authority's sake: his ministers for his sake, as speaking from him, and in his name: And we must hear him universally, in all things; every command is to be obeyed, none to be disputed, be the duty commanded never so difficult, and the sin forbidden never so tempting. 3. A severe commination. The soul that will not hear shall he cut off; that is, God will severely revenge himself upon the stubborn and disobedient. Learn hence, 1. That the Lord Jesus Christ is constituted and appointed by God to be the great Prophet and Teacher of his church: He reveals the will of God perfectly, powerfully, persuasively, plainly, and infallibly. 2. That it is the duty of all to hear and obey the voice of this great Prophet, and this under the penalty of eternal destruction: Every soul that will not hear that prophet, shall be destroyed from the people.

25. Yea, and all the prophets from Samuel, and those that follow after, as many as have spoken, have likewise foretold of these days.

That is, "All the prophets from Moses to Samuel, and particularly Isaiah the evangelical prophet, did foretell the coming and kingdom of the Messiah, the special mercies to them that believe on him, and the destruction of those that reject him." Where note, That Samuel is mentioned as the first prophet between them, because he was the first prophet after Moses that wrote his prophecy, and first erected the schools of the prophets. Learn hence, That Christ was the sum of the law, as well as the substance of the gospel, all the legal sacrifices pointed at him all the prophets prophesied of him, and received the completion in him. He was Abel's sacrifice, Isaac's ram, Isaiah's Emmanuel, Daniel's Holy one, Zachary's Branch, and Malachi's Angel.

25. Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, and in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed.

Still note, How sweetly St. Peter invites and encourages these murderers of Christ to repentance; the world of men must neither be driven to despair, nor be too hastily despaired of. He tells them, they were of the posterity of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with whom God first entered into covenant, and also children of the prophets; that is, the people to whom God primarily and chiefly sent the prophets. So great were the prerogatives of the Jews, that they are called the children of the prophets, children of the promise, children of the covenant, children of the kingdom. But the higher a people are exalted by spiritual privileges, the lower they fall if they miscarry.

26. Unto you first, God having raised up his Son Jesus; sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities.

Here note, 1. That the offer of Jesus Christ, and eternal salvation by him, was first made to the people of the Jews, because they were the children of the covenant; that is, the only people in visible communion with God throughout the whole world. 2. The benefit offered; God's Son is raised up; that is, either, 1. Authorized, consecrated, and appointed to be a Saviour; or, 2. Raised from the grave. You crucified him with wicked hands; but behold the divine clemency: He is first offered to you his crucifix; God has sent his Son, in the preaching of the gospel first to you; and this not to take vengeance on you, but to bless you: He being the great High Priest, blesses you authoritatively and effectually; and the blessing he dispenses is not a temporal blessing as you expected a pompous Messiah, Messiah, a secular kingdom, but spiritual, in turning souls from sin to God: He offers to bless you by turning every one of you from your iniquities. Learn hence, 1. That it is Christ's proper work to turn sinners from their iniquities. Oh! that we could all subserve Christ in that great work! He is the principal agent; let us be subordinate instruments, by practising holiness ourselves, and promoting holiness in others. 2. That to be turned by Christ from our iniquities, is the greatest blessing we can receive from him; because it is a spiritual blessing, a fundamental blessing, a comprehensive blessing, an endearing blessing, an universal blessing.

C H A P. IV.

The foregoing chapter gave us an account of a miraculous cure wrought by the apostles upon a cripple that was lame from his birth. This chapter acquaints us how exceedingly the governors both in church and state were offended and enraged thereat, to such a degree, that they imprison the apostles, and raise a persecution against the church; which yet God over rules for his own glory, and his churches increase. This infant gospel church in the time of the apostles, being like unto the infant Jewish church in Egypt in the days of Moses, the more the church was molested, the more she multiplied; the more they were oppressed, the more they increased.

AND as they spake unto the people, the priests and the captain of the temple, and the Sadducees came upon them, 2. Being grieved that they taught the people, and preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead. 3. And they laid hands on them and put them in hold until the next day, for it was now even-tide. 4. Howbeit many of them which heard the word believed; and the number of the men was about five thousand.

Note here, 1. How the apostles preaching to, and instructing the people, stirs up the devil's rage, and brings upon themselves a severe persecution: Well might Luther say, Quid est evangelium predicare, nisi in nos furorem diaboli derivare? "At the preaching of the gospel the gates of Satan's prison fly open, and the walls of his kingdom are shaken; he finds himself in danger of losing his power." No wonder then that he raises all the powers of hell, and stirs up all his instruments on earth to stop the mouths of the preachers of the gospel. 2. The persons by whom, and the cause for which, this persecution was now stirred up against the apostles! namely, the Jewish priests, the Gentile Captain, and the sottish Sadducees: As they spake the captain of the temple, the priests and Sadducees came upon them. These were distinct persons, and they were differently distastful; the captain, who was placed with the band of soldiers near the temple to guard it, was offended for fear of a tumult from such a vast appearance of people as came to see the recovered cripple. The priests were offended, because the apostles, being private men, went about publicly to teach and instruct the people, not considering the extraordinary call the apostles had. The Sadducees were displeas'd, because they preached the resurrection from the dead, (a doctrine which they denied) and because they preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead: that is, through the power and efficacy of Jesus: Asserting Christ to be both the efficient and also the exemplary cause of the resurrection; and the inferring from Christ's resurrection, that all his followers should rise with him, and like unto him. 3. How far God suffered these persecutors and this persecution to proceed: They laid hands upon them and put them in hold. How easily might this band of soldiers have taken away the lives, as well as imprisoned the bodies of the apostle! But God restrained them, and led on the apostles to their suffering gradually; they were yet but young pupils in Christ's school; therefore they shall not have trials beyond their strength. God will not call his servants to a martyr's fire, till he has first endued them with a martyr's faith; for this reason God suffered not the storm of persecution to break forth with over-much violence upon this new planted church at first. 4. What was the event of that violence which was now offered to the apostles; God over ruled it for his church's advantage, and a wonderful increase, by a new addition of five thousand more souls added to it. O wonderful draught of fish at the second casting out of the gospel net! These fishermen, Peter and John, now became, by the help of the Holy Spirit, fishers of men, according to their Master's prediction, Matt. iv. 19. Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men. Many which heard the word believed, and the number of them was about five thousand, ver. 4. This infant church flourished the more by the frownings of men upon her. Plures efficitur, quoties metimur, ab illis, Tertull. "Like a green meadow, which the oftener it is mowed, springs the faster, and becomes the thicker."

5 ¶ And it came to pass on the morrow, that their rulers and elders and scribes, 6. And Annas the high priest, and Caiaphas, and John, and Alexander, and as many as were of the kindred of the high priest, were gathered together at Jerusalem. 7 And when they had set them in the midst, they asked, by what power or by what name have ye done this? 8 Then Peter filled with the Holy Ghost, said unto them, Ye rulers of the people, and elders of Israel, 9 If we this day be examined of the good deed done to the impotent man, by what means he is made whole; 10 Be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even by him doth this man stand here before you whole. 11 This is the stone which was set at nought of you builders, which is become the head of the corner.

Here observe, 1. What a combined force did unite and join together of rulers, scribes, elders, high priests, high priest's kindred, and who not? They all, though of different interests, interests, yet hold together as one, to extinguish and put out the light of the gospel, as soon as it began to shine forth. Need we wonder that the devil struggled so hard at the dawning of the reformation to blow out the light of the gospel; when we consider what opposition he discovered against the first plantation and propagation of the gospel? As Herod would have strangled Christ in his cradle, so would the high priests have strangled Christianity in its infancy. They all gathered together at Jerusalem. Sad! that a message of such glad tidings as the gospel should meet with so bad entertainment. 2. How the apostles are here arraigned and questioned, By what name and authority? that is, by what power or virtue they had done this? Some think, they suspected the apostles to have wrought by the black art, being assisted by the devil. But did not this miracle give a sufficient convincing light, to demonstrate that it was heaven born, and shewed evidently that it was wrought by a supernatural and divine power? Cursed men! who accounting it a credit for themselves to do evil, make it a crime for the apostles to do good: Was there any reason for their asking, by what power, when the thing itself proclaimed it to be done by the power of God? 3. The bold and resolute answer of Peter, to the foregoing malicious and ridiculous question. Where note, 1. His holy courage. 2. The cause of it, He was filled with the Holy Ghost. In the 5th and 6th verses, we find a full bench, not of justices, but of professed enemies, enough to have dashed ten prisoners at the bar out of countenance. But behold the ingenuous and holy boldness of a good christian in a good cause. St. Peter, who formerly, when full of himself, was baffled by a damsel, and frightened into a denial of Christ by a silly wench; now being filled with the Holy Ghost, silences and confounds his most potent and malicious accusers. Lord! how woefully weak are we when we rely on our own strength, but how able to do all things, when Christ strengthens us! In te stas et non stas, says St. Austin. "Thou art sure to come down when thou standest on thine own legs; but shall be mightily upheld and carried on, when supported and conducted by God's hand." 4. A singular instance of the apostle's boldness; namely, in preaching Jesus Christ to them that had imprisoned them. Be it known unto you, that this Jesus, whom ye crucified, is the stone which was set at nought of you builders, and is become the head of the corner; neither is there salvation in any other, &c. Where note, 1. The title given to the rulers of the Jewish church, Builders: So they were by office, and here are called so, to remind them of their duty; namely, to increase, strengthen, and beautify the building, the church of God; not to demolish, weaken, or deface it. 2. The contempt which these builders cast upon Christ the chief corner stone; they refused him, and set him at nought, according to the prophecy, Psalm cxviii. 22, which was a prophecy of the rejection of the Messiah, though the Jews would not so understand it; for they dreamt of such a pompous Messiah coming according to the hearts' desire, that it should be incredible that any of the Jews should ever reject or despise him. 3. The title given to Christ, the corner stone; so called, because he supports and sustains the whole building; and as the corner stone is equally necessary for both sides of the building, which are united to it, and borne up by it, in like manner both Jew and Gentile are united by Christ, and saved by him.

12 Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved.

Note here, 1. A positive assertion, that there is no salvation but by Christ; or, that besides, or without him, there is no possibility of salvation, either of Jew or Gentile; both those under the Old Testament had, and we under the New Testament have, one and the same common Saviour. 2. The ground and reason of this confident assertion, That there is no salvation but by Christ; namely, because there is no other name given under heaven by which we must be saved: That is, no other person designed or appointed by God, to be the author of redemption to, and procurer of salvation for, a lost and miserable world, but only Christ. Take we good heed then, that we do not reject or set him at nought; for in rejecting of Christ, we reject the wisdom of God, the authority of God, the love of God, yea, the salvation of God.

13 ¶ Now when they saw the boldness of Peter and John, and perceived that they were unlearned and ignorant men, they marvelled; and they took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus.

14 And beholding the man which was healed standing with them, they could say nothing against it. 15 But when they had commanded them to go aside out of the council, they conferred among themselves, 16 Saying, What shall we do to these men? for that indeed a notable miracle hath been done by them is manifest to all them that dwell in Jerusalem, and we cannot deny it. 17 But that it spread no further among the people, let us straitly threaten them, that they speak henceforth to no man in this name. 18 And they called them, and commanded them not to speak at all, nor teach in the name of Jesus.

Note here, 1. How convincing the boldness of the apostle was, together with the undeniable evidence of the miracle wrought by them: When the council observed both, they marvelled, the apostles being unlearned men, yet now able to speak all languages, and the cripple, born lame, now able to leap and walk. These men were convinced, but not converted; silenced, but not satisfied; they marvelled, but not believed, they were full of admiration, but far from faith. The evidence of the fact, with the courage of the apostles, stopped their mouths at present, but did not cure their hard hearts. 2. At what a nonplus the council was, to know what to do with the apostles; they confess the miracle, but consult open ways and means how to conceal it; and at last conclude upon threatening them. That for the time to come they speak no more in the name of Jesus: That is, not to preach in his name, nor work miracles: a power and authority derived pretendedly from him: the apostles soon let them understand!

not the threatenings of the council, nor looked upon them as any excuse for the forbearing of their duty, as appeareth by the next words.

19 But Peter and John answered and said unto them, Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye.

20 For we cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard.

Note here, The prudence and integrity of the apostles, in referring it back to the judgment of their very adversaries, whether it was reasonable to obey their command, when they charged them to preach no more in the name of the Lord Jesus: As if the apostle had said, "We have received a command from God to preach, Go tell all nations, Matt. xxviii. 19. and we have received a command from you not to preach: Now we leave it with you, whether it be fittest and most reasonable to obey God or you." It is a strong way of conviction, to refer a matter to their judgment and conscience, against whom we make opposition. Learn, That when the commands of God's vicegerents run counter to the commands of God himself, God is to be obeyed, and not man.

21 So when they had further threatened them, they let them go, because of the people: for all men glorified God for that which was done.

22 For the man was above forty years old on whom this miracle of healing was shewed. 23 And being let go, they went to their own company, and reported all that the chief priests and elders had said unto them.

24 And when they heard that, they lifted up their voice to God with one accord, and said, Lord, thou art God which hast made heaven and earth and the sea, and all that in them is; 25 Who by the mouth of thy servant David hast said, Why did the heathen rage, and the people imagine vain things? 26 The kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers were gathered together against the Lord, and against his Christ.

27 For of a truth against thy holy child Jesus whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the people of Israel were gathered together, 28 For to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done. 29 And now, Lord, behold their threatenings: and grant unto thy servants that with all boldness they may speak thy word, 30 By stretching forth thine hand to heal; and that signs and wonders may be done by the name of thy holy child Jesus.

Here observe, 1. That notwithstanding this rational plea, which the apostles used, the council added further threatenings to dissuade them, because of the people, who looked upon them with admiration, and glorified God for working it by the apostle's hands. Where note, That it was not the sense of sin, nor any apprehensions of God's displeasure, that influenced the council to set the apostles at liberty; but either the fear or favour of the people. Thus God made the people a restraint to the rulers' rage. 2. That the apostles thus dismissed, went immediately to their own company (that is, to the hundred and twenty mentioned, chap. i. 15.) and acquainted them both with their danger and deliverance, the better to prepare them for sufferings, and encourage them to hope for the like support under them. 3. What use the church makes thereof; they hearing how their enemies lay in wait to persecute and destroy them, apply themselves to God by fervent prayer. Thence learn, That it is the church's duty, when enemies combine together to do mischief, to give themselves much unto prayer. Thus did the church here, and the like, chap. xii. 4. The prayer itself, which they jointly put up at the throne of grace, with one heart and spirit. And here note, 1. They began their prayer with invocation, and a reverend compellation, suitable to their present sufferings; adoring God's omnipotency in creating and governing of the world. Lord! thou art God, who hast made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all that is therein. Whence learn, That the power and wisdom of God in creating and governing the world, doth afford singular support and comfort under the present or future sufferings. He that made all things by his power, will over-rule all things by his providence for his own glory, and his church's good. Note, 2. The apostles used scripture-language and expressions in their prayer: they allude to Psal. ii. and acknowledge that all that enraged malice of men and devils against the Messiah, which was foretold long ago by the prophet David, was now come to pass; For both the Jewish council and the Roman governors had combined together against Christ, and in opposing him, had opposed the Father that sent him. Of a truth against thy holy child Jesus are they gathered together, to do what thy hand and thy counsel had determined before to be done. Where we see, 1. That all the sufferings of Christ were fore-ordained and determined by God the Father; God from all eternity decreed that Christ should die a sacrifice for sin. 2. That this decree of God did not necessitate the Jews to sin; but they acted freely and voluntarily, according to the wicked determinations of their own wills. God foresaw and permitted it, but no ways influenced or compelled them to it. He over-ruled those evil instruments to fulfil his holy purposes, while they intended only to fulfil their own wicked counsels. Lastly, They close their prayer with a fervent petition, that God would strengthen them, and glorify his Son. (1.) That God would strengthen them against their fears; steel them with courage, and fortify them with impregnable resolution: Grant that with all boldness we may speak thy word: Boldness to preach the gospel, when unjustly forbidden, is a special gift of God, and a great effect of God's grace unto his servants. (2.) They request that God would magnify, not them, but his Son by them, in giving them power to work miraculous cures in the name of Jesus, for confirming of the gospel. Grant that signs and wonders may be done by the name of thy holy Child Jesus. Where note, That the gift of miracles, though promised by Christ,

Christ,

Christ is yet prayed for by the apostles. God will have the performance of his promises to be the answer of our prayers.

31 ¶ And when they had prayed, the place was shaken where they were assembled together; and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and they spake the word of God with boldness. 32 And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul: neither said any of them, that ought of the things which he possessed was his own: but they had all things common. 33 And with great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus: and great grace was upon them all. 34 Neither was there any among them that lacked: for as many as were possessors of lands or houses, sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, 35 And laid them down at the apostles feet: and distribution was made unto every man according as he had need. 36 And Joses, who by the apostles was surnamed Barnabas (which is, being interpreted, The son of consolation) a Levite, and of the country of Cyprus, 37 Having land, sold it, and brought the money, and laid it at the apostles feet.

Note here, 1. The special and speedy answer which the Lord gave to the apostles' prayer: As a testimony thereof, the place where they prayed is miraculously shaken, and many eminent graces and special gifts of the Holy Spirit were poured out upon the apostles, particularly, a greater measure of boldness to preach the gospel; and, as some think, the wonderful gift of conferring the Holy Ghost was now conferred upon the twelve; so Dr. Lightfoot. The holy Spirit which caused them thus to pray, gave them that holy boldness which they prayed for; with signal shaking of the place which they prayed in. O! how ready is God to hear and answer the prayers and pleadings of his righteous servants, especially when suffering for righteousness sake? 2. The great unity, and happy unanimity which was found amongst the ministers and members of this infant church, this purest and most primitive christian church: They were of one heart and of one soul: That is, they were one in doctrine and opinion, and they were one in heart and affection: A singular pattern for succeeding christians to the end of the world, so to carry it one towards another, as members of the same body, and influenced by the same head. 3. As their unanimity, so their liberality, in contributing to the necessities of each other. They called nothing their own, when their brethren's wants required it; the rich readily sold their possessions and goods, to help and relieve the poor. Notwithstanding, this example cannot be a copy for after times, to follow as a command, or to imitate as a perfection: Seeing that such was the state of the church at that time, as was never since, nor like to be; it was but newly born: It was all in one city; all in a possibility to be soon scattered by persecution. Res que erat temporariae nec stabilitis & liberi arbitrii, non debet in exemplum trahi; multo minus ut necessaria ultradi. The lesson to be gathered from this instance for our instruction; is this,

That those who are of ability, ought to abound always in ordinary, and sometimes in extraordinary acts of charity. We must always relieve the saints wants as we are able, and sometimes upon an extraordinary occasion, above what we are well able. 4. How the apostles with great authority and assurance gave testimony to the resurrection of Christ, and their doctrine found great favour and acceptance with the people, see ver. 33. The resurrection of Christ from the dead, was the great point now in controversy, therefore with evident miracles and wonderful gifts of the holy Spirit, did the apostles perform their testimony of his resurrection. So that as Christ was declared to the apostles to be the Son of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead; in like manner, the apostles by miracles and wonderful gifts did bear witness to the certainty of our Saviour's resurrection, and their doctrine found acceptance with the people. Learn hence, 1. That our Lord Jesus Christ by the almighty power of his Godhead revived and rose again from the dead, to the confutation of his enemies, and the consolation of all believers. 2. That the doctrine of Christ's resurrection being not only attested by the preaching, but confirmed by the miracles of the apostles, found deservedly belief in the world, and is a point of infallible certainty amongst all these whom wilful obstinacy has not blinded.

C H A P. V.

BUT a certain man named Ananias, with Sapphira his wife, sold a possession, 2 And kept part of the price, his wife also being privy to it and brought a certain part, and laid it at the apostles feet. 3 But Peter said, Ananias, why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost, and to keep back part of the price of the land? 4 Whiles it remained, was it not thine own? and after it was sold, was it not in thine own power? why hast thou conceived this thing in thine heart? thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God.

The last verses of the foregoing chapter acquainted us with the practice of the primitive christians at the first plantation of the gospel, in selling their possessions for charitable uses, and laying down the money at the apostles feet, for the relief of their fellow brethren and members in Christ. Now this chapter informs us, that according to their example, one Ananias, and Sapphira his wife, consecrated a possession unto God, and sold the same for that purpose, but fraudulently kept back part of the price, and thus, as St. Chrysostom notes, was found stealing his own goods: He had the formality to sell his lands as others did, but had not the sincerity to part with his money as others had. Note here, The true nature of Ananias's sin it was sacrilege; that is, a purloining or stealing of that which is consecrated unto God, not by actual performance but by vow or inward purpose of heart: covetousness and vain-glory, lying and hypocrisy, did all attend and accompany this sin; but the sin itself was sacrilege. Learn hence, 1. That what is consecrated to God, must not be alienated or applied to other uses. 2. That such an alienation is sacrilege, facrilege, and a sin against God, being a breach of vow or promise made unto him; a lying unto God, as the text calls it. 3. That it is an heinous sin, which God will severely punish. Note 2. How this secret sin, lying in the intention of the heart, was known unto God, and by divine revelation made known to St. Peter. Learn thence, That not only our outward actions are taken notice of by God, but even the purposes and intents of our hearts are all manifest and open to him, and thoroughly understood by him. 3. How St. Peter justly aggravates their sin from the divinity of the person, (the Holy Ghost) against whom it was committed, Why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie unto the Holy Ghost? Thou hast not lied unto man, but unto God. But why is Ananias said to lie unto the Holy Ghost, rather than to God the Father, or Jesus Christ the Son? Answer, Either, (1.) Because it is the proper work of the Spirit to search the heart, and to know the thoughts and purposes thereof: Or, (2.) Because the wealth brought in to the apostles and laid at their feet, was an effect of the holy Spirit's inclining the hearts of believers so to do. Learn hence, The divinity of the Holy Ghost, that he is truly and really God; he whom the scripture calls the great and true God, therefore the Holy Ghost is God. Either the great Holy Ghost is man, and God's messenger, or God himself; but the antithesis or opposite shews, that he is not man, for, says the apostle, Thou hast not lied unto man: And if the Holy Ghost had been only God's messenger, it had been as great a sin to lie to Peter, (he being God's extraordinary messenger) as to lie to the Holy Ghost; therefore the apostle, in the fourth verse, doth explain what he meant, by lying to the Holy Ghost, in the third verse; namely, lying unto God: Thou hast not lied unto man, a creature like thyself, but unto God, to the Holy Ghost who is God:

5 And Ananias hearing these words, fell down, and gave up the ghost: And great fear came on all them that heard these things. 6 And the young men arose, wound him up, and carried him out and buried him. 7 And it was about the space of three hours after, when his wife, not knowing what was done, came in. 8 And Peter answered unto her, Tell me whether ye sold the land for so much? And she said, Yea, for so much. 9 Then Peter said unto her, How is it that ye have agreed together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord? behold the feet of them which have buried thy husband are at the door, and shall carry thee out. 10 Then fell she down straightway at his feet, and yielded up the ghost: and the young men came in and found her dead, and carrying her forth, buried her by her husband. 11 And great fear came upon all the church, and upon as many as heard these things.

Observe here, 1. The justice of the punishment inflicted upon Ananias for his sin; he is struck dead upon the spot for his sacrilege, covetousness, hypocrisy and lying: Doubtless it was a very heinous sin which God so severely punished, and it was the last sin of this kind under the

New Testament. This was the first consecration of goods that was ever made unto Christ our Lord, after he was exalted at the right hand of God in heaven; and this was the first sacrilege: The first sin of this kind, and therefore the first persons that were found guilty of it met with this severity, in terrorem, to make all others afraid of it. The first transgressors in any kind have been made public examples. Thus the angels before the Jewish church; Nadab and Abihu at the beginning of the Jewish church; and here Ananias and Sapphira, at the beginning of the Christian church. 2. How Sapphira, the wife's subjection to her husband, doth not excuse her from partaking of his sin, nor exempt her from the severity of the punishment, God's authority in commanding or forbidding, must first be observed and obeyed, otherwise we put the creature in God's place, debase him and set up an idol, which the jealousy and holiness of God will never endure. 3. How the same sin meets the same punishment: Husband and wife had here agreed both what to do and what to say, and they that sinned together, suffered together. God is no respecter of persons, male or female, Jew or Gentile, prince or subject, husband or wife; the soul that sinneth, it shall surely die; Then fell she down straightway at his feet, and yielded up the ghost, ver. 10. Note, 4. That this miraculous way of punishing offenders with immediate death by the apostles, was not common: This is the only instance in the New Testament of so severe a punishment inflicted by the mouth of the apostles for any sin whatsoever; and it seems accommodated and suited to that particular time, in which the magistrates were so far from defending the church, that they furthered the persecution, and endeavoured the extirpation of it. Lastly, The effect which this miracle had upon the whole church; it awfully affected them with fear and trembling; Great fear came upon all the church, and upon as many as heard these things. God's extraordinary providences, either judgments or mercies, towards ourselves or towards others, ought to affect us with holy fear, and that fear which works righteousness. Isa. xxvi. 9. When his judgments are abroad in the earth, the inhabitants of the world learn righteousness; that is, they ought to do so, and, if ever they will do it, they will do it then: Judgments work fear, and fear works righteousness.

12 ¶ And by the hands of the apostles were many signs and wonders wrought among the people: And they were all with one accord in Solomon's porch. 13 And of the rest durst no man join himself to them; but the people magnified them. 14 And believers were the more added to the Lord, multitudes both of men and women: 15 Insomuch that they brought forth the sick into the streets, and laid them on beds and couches, that at the least the shadow of Peter passing by might overshadow some of them. 16 There came also a multitude out of the cities round about unto Jerusalem, bringing sick folks, and them which were vexed with unclean spirits: and they were healed every one.

Three things are here observable: 1. How that act of severity upon Ananias and Sapphira for their hypocrisy, is instantly succeeded with acts of clemency and mercy upon others: The former acts of severity in the apostles were necessary to prevent the intrusion of hypocrites into the christian church: These subsequent acts of mercy were as necessary for the propagating of the gospel, and to invite people to the love of christianity. Accordingly the apostles, after the death of Ananias, are endued with power from on high to work signs and wonders, to heal diseases, to cast out devils; insomuch, that the people brought forth their sick into the streets, and laid them upon beds and couches, hoping, that the shadow of Peter, as he passed by, might reach and recover some of them. The church of Rome makes a noise with this text, and produces it to prove St. Peter's supremacy over the rest of the apostles, because his very shadow cured the diseased: But very groundlessly; for, 1. By the same argument they prove St. Peter to be superior to Christ himself; this being more than what Christ himself wrought, according to what he foretold, St. John xiv. 12. Greater works than these shall ye do, &c. 2. The papills might observe, were they not wilfully blind, that the napkins and handkerchiefs, which were carried from St. Paul's body, cured diseases also, and dispossessed devils, Acts xix. 12. Observe, 3. Besides all this, it is not here expressly said, that any sick were actually healed by St. Peter's shadow, but that the diseased were brought in hopes that his shadow would produce such effects; and if it did so, Almighty God thereby put honor upon the gospel, and upon all the apostles, without any particular respect, or special regard to the person of St. Peter. 4. The place where the apostles assembled to preach the gospel and work miracles for the confirmation of the same, They were all with one accord in Solomon's porch. Where note, (1.) Their unity and unanimity: There were no persons among them guilty of schismatical separation in forsaking the public assembly; but with one mouth, as well as with one mind and heart, they glorified God. (2.) Their pruden- tial boldness and holy courage appeared in preaching to the people in Solomon's porch; for the sanhedrim, or great council sat in, or very near that place, even that council, which in the former chapter imprisoned them, and in this beat them. (Ver. 40.) Learn thence, That nothing better becomes the ministers and messengers of Jesus Christ, than an holy and humble, a wise and meek, a zealous and convincing boldness, in asserting the truths of the gospel, and in reproving sin, and denouncing judgments against impenitent sinners. Consider we how bold and zealous our Lord and Master was in his ministry. Luke xx. 21. We know that thou teachest the way of God truly, and acceptest not the person of any. And the apostles learnt the same of their Master, Acts iv. 13. When the high priests saw the boldness of Peter and John, they took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus. Observe, 5. How God over-ruled the judgment inflicted upon Ananias and Sapphira, and caused it to work for special good. Thus, such of the apostles' hearers, who were unsound and insincere, durst not join themselves to them, having seen a great instance of severity upon concealed hypocrisy! They were afraid to come amongst them any more, or to make a shew of such piety and zeal as Ananias did, for fear of the same, or such like punishment as he had. But however the people extolled and magnified, admired and applauded them, and multitudes were daily added to the church. This seems to be the sense of ver. 13. And of the rest durst no man join himself to them, but the people magnified them, and believers were added to the Lord, multitudes both of men and women. Nothing doth more afflict and afflict unsound and drossly hypocrites, than the sight of God's judgments inflicted upon others in this world, and the fear of the righteous judgment of God upon themselves in the world to come.

17 ¶ Then the high priest rose up, and all they that were with him. (which is the sect of the Sadducees.) and were filled with indignation, 18 And laid their hands on the apostles, and put them in the common prison. 19 But the angel of the Lord by night opened the prison doors, and brought them forth, and said, 20 Go, stand and speak in the temple to the people all the words of this life.

Note, here, 1. How the persecutions of the holy apostles did gradually advance and encrease. In the former chapters the apostles were only secured, kept in hold for a night, and dismissed with a threatening next day; but now, being filled a second time with the holy spirit, they are better enabled to grapple with sufferings, and to glorify God under them; and accordingly here they are committed to the common prison, amongst malefactors, and afterwards beaten and exposed to public shame, ver. 40. O the tenderness of God towards his tender servants! While these apostles were striplings, their faith feeble, and their grace weak, God stayeth the rough wind, keeps off the storm of persecution from them. God will ever suit the stroke to his people's strength, proportion their burden to their back, and never suffer them to be tempted above what they are able. Note, 2. The apostles being prisoners for Christ and his gospel, they have an angel for their keeper and deliverer, who opens the prison door, and overpowers and puts out the devil. God could otherwise have delivered them, but he makes use of the ministry of angels for the confirming of their faith, and to let them see by experience that he had given angels charge over them. Since the establishment of the gospel, God will have us live more by faith, and to walk less by sense, and therefore we must not now (ordinarily) see those ministering and beneficent spirits: but although their visible apparitions be ceased, yet their invisible operations for the heirs of salvation shall never cease. Heb. i ult. Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation? 3. The apostles being thus brought out of prison by an angel, are commanded to preach, and they have their text given them by the angel that opened both the prison and the pulpit door for them: The angel said unto them, Go, and speak unto the people all the words of this life, ver. 20. That is, of this life for which you were imprisoned, this life which the Sadducees, who imprisoned you, deny; namely, the resurrection of the body, and eternal life. Learn, That not the things of this life, but the things of eternity and the the life to come, the unseen things of another world, are the things which all the ministers of Christ ought to preach, and press their people to the pursuit of; Go, and speak unto the people all the words of this life: That is, the gospel, which is the word of life, and directs them how to attain eternal life and salvation by Jesus Christ.

21 And when they heard that, they entered into the temple early in the morning, and taught. But the high priest came, and they that were with him, and called the council together, and all the senate of the children of Israel, and sent to the prison to have them brought. 22 But when the officers came, and found them not in the prison, they returned, and told, 23 Saying, The prison truly found we shut with all safety, and the keepers standing without, before the doors: but when we had opened, we found no man within. 24 Now when the high priest and the captain of the temple and the chief priests heard these things, they doubted of them whereunto this would grow. 25 Then came one and told them, saying, Behold, the men whom ye put in prison are standing in the temple, and teaching the people. 26 Then went the captain with the officers, and brought them without violence. For they feared the people, lest they should have been stoned. 27 And when they had brought them, they set them before the council: and the high priests asked them, 28 Saying, Did not we straightly command you, that you should not teach in his name? and behold, you have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine, and intend to bring this man's blood upon us.

Note here, 1. No sooner were the apostles out of prison, but they enter into the temple and preach with a redoubled zeal and diligence: no doubt, Satan had better have let these holy men alone, than have cast them into prison; for the cold blasts of persecution and imprisonment beating upon their outward man, by a spiritual antiperistasis, augmented the heat of grace within. There is no such way to be even with the devil and his instruments, for all their spite and malice against us, as by doing all the good we can to the souls of men. 2. How the deliverance which God wrought for the apostles, in bringing them miraculously out of prison by the conduct of an angel, did confound the council which laid them in: They were nonplussed and horribly perplexed at it; They doubted whereunto this would grow. They stood amused and amazed, and knew not what measures to take; but were at their wits end. Sin oft-times brings men into straits, but straits do not always bring men off from their sins. Thus here, notwithstanding their present perplexity of spirit, they spur on, and bring them again before the council, ver. 26. Then went the captain with the officers of the temple, and brought them without violence. 3. The crimes which the holy apostles were unjustly accused of; namely, obstinacy and sedition. They are charged with obstinacy in persisting to preach the gospel, when they had strictly (but very wickedly) forbidden them: And they are accused of sedition, as if they endeavoured to stir up the people to avenge the blood of Christ upon the rulers, as being unjustly shed by them. The greatest innocency cannot protect the holiest persons from slander and false accusation. The best of men have sometimes been charged with the blackest crimes. No wonder then the sanhedrim, or great council, which charged Christ himself with imposture and blasphemy, did accuse the apostles of sedition and contumacy; The disciple is not above his master. 4. The contumelious reflection which they had made upon our Lord Jesus Christ himself; You intend, says the council, to bring this man's blood upon us: As if the holy Jesus had not been worthy of the naming by them. Christ told his disciples, Luke vi. 22. that the world should cast out their name as evil: Behold! his own is used no better: He is homo nullius nominis. This man, this fellow, this deceiver, were the opprobrious titles, which the learned Rabbies thought fit to impose upon the best man that ever the world had. Lord! how can we be abased enough for thee, who wast degraded and abased for us?

29 Then Peter and the other apostles answered and said, We ought to obey God rather than men. 30 The God of our fathers raised up Jesus, whom ye slew and hanged on a tree. 31 Him hath God exalted with his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins. 32 And we are his witnesses of these things, and so is also the Holy Ghost, whom God hath given to them that obey him. 33 When they heard that, they were cut to the heart, and took counsel to slay them.

To the foregoing charge of obstinacy brought in against the apostles, St. Peter answers in the name, and as the mouth of the rest; owning that he had not obeyed them in their injunction, because they had commanded that which was contrary to the command of God. Where note, How the apostles assert the prerogative of Christ as their apology for disobedience to human commands; We ought to obey God rather than men. The second part of the charge was sedition; as if the apostles endeavoured to stir up the people to revenge the blood of Christ upon the chief priests and rulers. Thence observe, That it is no new thing to tax the ministers of Christ for preaching sedition, when rulers design to stop their mouths, and not suffer them to preach at all. But to remove this part of the charge, the apostle tells them, that this Jesus whom they ignominiously slew on earth, is now an exalted Prince in heaven, able to give repentance and remission of sins to the worst of his murderers, if they unfeignedly desire it: Him hath God exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance, &c. Whence learn, 1. That Jesus will be a Saviour to none to whom he is not a Prince. We must submit ourselves to his ruling power, as well as commit ourselves to his saving mercy. For it is in vain to expect salvation by him, if we do do not yield subjection to him. 2. That repentance and remission of sins are the special fruits and advantages of Christ's exaltation; Him hath God exalted to give repentance and remission of sins. 3. That it is the sole prerogative of our Lord Jesus Christ, to give repentance and remission of sins. Where note, The encouragement which the apostle's ministry gave to the murderers of Christ to hope for pardon; he preaches the duty of repentance, and the privilege of remission of sins, but assurth them, for their comfort, that Christ stands ready to dispense both. But observe the sad effects which this sermon had upon these hearers; it was for substance the same which St. Peter preached, chap. ii. when so many thousands were pricked at the heart with sorrow and compunction; whereas these men were cut to the heart with anger and indignation. Whence learn, That the most sound and sacred doctrine, is an intolerable torment to an unsound and unholy heart: That the word of God dispensed by the same minister, and in the same manner, has not always the same success. The substance of both these sermons was the same, (Jesus and the resurrection) and the preacher (St. Peter) was the same, but the success was not the same; to let the apostle know, that the excellency of the power was of God, and not of himself, as St. Paul speaks, 2 Cor. iv. 7.

34 Then stood there up one in the council; a Pharisee, named Gamaliel, a doctor of the law, had in reputation among all people, and commanded to put the apostles forth a little space; 35 And said unto them, Ye men of Israel, take heed to yourselves, what ye intend to do as touching these men. 36 For before these days rose up Theudas, boasting himself to be somebody, to whom a number of men about four hundred, joined themselves: who was slain, and all, and as many as obeyed him, were scattered and brought to nought. 37 After this man rose up Judas of Galilee in the days of the taxing, and drew away much people after him: he also perished, and all, even as many as obeyed him, were dispersed. 38 And now I say unto you, Refrain from these men, and let them alone: for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought: 39 But if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply ye be found even to fight against God. 40 And to him they agreed. And when they had called the apostles, and beaten them, they commanded that they should not speak in the name of Jesus, and let them go. 41 And they departed from the presence of the council rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name. 42 And daily in the temple and in every house, they ceased not to teach and preach Jesus Christ.

Note here, 1. A general council erring, and that fundamentally, in matters of faith. They determined peremptorily; That the doctrine and practice of the apostles was not from God; and accordingly resolved to repress them, and that by death. Thence learn, That no determination of a council against a doctrine or practice, is any demonstrative or sufficient proof, that such a doctrine or practice is not from God. 2. How God raised up a particular person in the council, Gamaliel, to interpose on the apostles' behalf, as Nicodemus before had done on Christ's behalf; and uses him as an instrument to preserve them from the rage and fury of their persecutors. Without question, Gamaliel's spirit was actuated and influenced by the Spirit of God to give such counsel as is here given. 3. The counsel and advice given in the several parts of it. (1.) He advises them to take heed what they did to these men, ver. 35. implying that men had need take heed how they engage themselves in suppressing or destroying any sort of men whatsoever, until they have clear and expressive warrant from heaven for the execution. (2.) He assures them, That if this work be of men, it will certainly come to nought; which he proves by a double instance, namely, Theudas, and Judas of Galilee, who both pretended to be sent of God as Saviours of their country, and gathered many followers, but miscarried in their enterprize; intimating, That every invention, contrivance, or device of man, especially in things pertaining to God and religion, will intime be blasted and blown up by God and come to nothing. (3.) He adds, That if this work be of God, it can never be overthrown, but the attempt will be deemed a fighting against God: Signifying to us, That for any person to attempt the suppression of any doctrine or practice that is from God, is to fight against God himself. (4.) He intimates to them the great peril and danger of fighting against God in the word even lest ye be found even fighting against God. Thence learn, That fighting against God is a most dangerous enterprize for any person at any time to be found engaged or concerned in. Note 4. The success or issue of Gamaliel's counsel; his advice being so wise and rational, it prevailed with the rulers to desist from their former intention of putting the apostles to death; but they came not off without blows, though without bloodshed; they are scourged as their Master was before them, which was both a painful and reproachful punishment: Yet were they so far from being discouraged, that they were the more resolved. They rejoiced, that they were so graced as to be disgraced for Christ, and accounted it their highest honour to be dishonoured for him; esteeming it a very great favour and happiness bear to reproach for Christ, according to that of the apostle St. Peter, 1 Epist. iv. 14. If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye; for the Spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you. This sent them from the presence of the council rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name. Lastly, How wisely and well the apostles improve their restored liberty; they redouble their pains and diligence in preaching the gospel, and are unwearied in the way of their duty, and in the work of their God, verse 42. Daily in the temple, and in every house they ceased not to teach and to preach Jesus Christ; that is, they laid hold on every opportunity, in season and out of season, publicly and privately to publish the gospel to those that had not received it, and farther to instruct those that had already received the faith of Christ. Thus the more outrageous were their adversaries, the more courageous were were the holy apostles. They religiously profess the name of Christ, and resolutely abide by their profession, though they were derided, imprisoned, persecuted, and beaten for the same. Lord, help thy ministers at this day to suffer reproach for thy gospel; but never let any of them either reproach it, or be a reproach unto it. Amen.

CHAP. VI.

In the foregoing chapters, an account is given of the two first persecutions that befel the christian church after Christ's ascension; the former in imprisoning, the latter in the beating of the apostles. This and the next chapter acquaints us with a third blow given to this infant church, blacker and bloodier than both the former, in the death of the holy Martyr St. Stephen; and the occasion of it was thus:

AND in those days when the number of the disciples was multiplied, there arose a murmuring of the Grecians against the Hebrews, because their widows were neglected in the daily ministrations. 2 Then the twelve called the multitude of the disciples unto them, and said, It is not reason that we should leave the word of God, and serve tables. 3 Wherefore, brethren, look ye out among you seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom, whom we may appoint over this business. 4 But we will give ourselves continually to prayer and to the ministry of the word.

Here observe, 1. How the number of christians increased upon the foregoing persecution: as the Jewish church in Egypt, the more it was oppressed, the more it multiplied; so the christian church here got ground by opposition. ver. 1. In these days the number of the disciples was multiplied. 2. How the number of believers increasing, there arose (as it too often happens among a multitude) a murmuring among them: The Grecians, that is, such Jews as were dispersed abroad among the Greeks, complaining that their widows were neglected, and received less than the widows of the Hebrews in the daily distributions of the church's money, for charitable uses. Thence learn, That neglect of the poor, particularly of the goodly poor, is a sin in all but especially in the churches of Christ. Observe, 2. How the apostles desiring to have the poor well provided for, and not having leisure themselves personally to take care of them, advise the church to chuse seven persons out of the hundred and twenty mentioned chapter the first, to be stewards and dispensers of the church's stock, to distribute the same with equity and indifference to all proper objects of charity without exception. Thence learn, That a general concern for the poor, and a tender regard to their necessities and wants, is a duty that well becomes the ministers and ambassadors of God: God's poor are his treasure, his jewels, the signet upon his arm; they are always in his eye, and upon his heart: how well then doth it become the ministers of God to take care of them who are so dear to him? Observe, 4. How the apostles resolve to perform their duty to God and their people, with such zeal and application, as became persons of their holy character and profession. We will give ourselves continually unto prayer, and to the ministry of the word. Where note, 1. That such as are called by God to the work of the ministry, ought to give themselves wholly to it; We will give ourselves continually thereunto. 2. That a minister's giving himself unto prayer, is as great, if not a greater duty than giving himself to the preaching of the word; We will give ourselves continually unto prayer, and to the ministry of the word: To the one as the end, to the other as the mean; it is God that sets the word on work, but it is prayer that sets God on work: That minister that is not fervent in prayer cannot expect to be successful in preaching. Pray for us, says the apostle to the Thessalonians, that the word may run and be glorified; he that begged prayer of others, did not neglect it himself, but prayed without ceasing.

5 And the saying pleased the whole multitude. And they chose Stephen, a man full of faith and of the Holy Ghost, and Philip, and Prochorus, and Nicanor, and Timon, and Parmenas, and Nicholas a proselyte of Antioch: 6 Whom they set before the apostles: and when they had prayed, they laid their hands on them. 7 And the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith.

Observe here, That to remove the forementioned murmuring at the inequality of the poor's relief, seven deacons were chosen to assist the apostles, and to dispose of that treasure (which had been laid down at the apostles' feet) with more indifference to all fit objects of charity without exception. Here note, 1. The qualification of the persons chosen; men full of the Holy Ghost: That is, persons that were extraordinarily assisted by the Spirit to perform the duties required of them; for the office of a deacon was besides the taking care of the poor, to preach the gospel, and to baptize, as it appears Phillip did; had it been only to take care of the poor, they needed not to be so inquisitive to find out men full of the Holy Ghost for that service. Here note, That the scripture mentions a threefold fulness of the Holy Ghost, according to a threefold capacity of the receivers. There is plenitudo sufficientia, the fulness of a vessel; this every believer hath; there is plenitudo abundantia, the fulness of a stream; this the apostles had, when extraordinarily inspired, and filled with the Spirit at the first plantation of the gospel; and there is plenitudo superabundantia, the fulness of a fountain; and this Christ had, Col. i. 10. It pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell. 2. The manner how these deacons enter into their office; it is by prayer and imposition of hands, ver. 6. They prayed and laid hands on them. This rite of laying on of hands was used anciently upon a threefold occasion in the Jewish church: namely, in their sacrifices, Exod. xxix. 15. In their blessings, Gen. xlviii. 14. And in their designation unto a charge or office, office, Numb. xxvii. 18. Thus Moses laid his hands on Joshua; and from hence it was derived and brought into the gospel-church, when ministers were ordained by the apostles in the primitive times, they laid their hands upon them. 1 Tim. v. 22. Note, 3. The mighty success of the gospel, notwithstanding all the violent opposition that was made against it; The word of God, that is, the doctrine of the gospel, increased, the number of believers multiplied: yea, some of the priests themselves, though formerly bitter enemies to Christ, now embraced the faith, and were joined to the church; great is truth, especially the spirit of truth, and will prevail. Naked truth is too hard for armed error. Truth has the strength of God in it, and therefore human power can never prevail against divine truth. So mightily grew the word of God and prevailed.

8 And Stephen full of faith and power did great wonders and miracles among the people. 9 ¶ Then there arose certain of the synagogue which is called the synagogue of the Libertines, and Cyrenians, and Alexandrians, and of them of Cilicia, and of Asia, disputing with Stephen. 10 And they were not able to resist the wisdom and the Spirit by which he spake. 11 Then they suborned men which said, We have heard him speak blasphemous words against Moses and against God. 12 And they stirred up the people and the elders and the scribes, and came upon him, and caught him, and brought him to the council. 13 And set false witnesses, which said This man ceaseth not to speak blasphemous words against this holy place and the law. 14 For we have heard him say, That this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place, and shall change the customs which Moses delivered us. 15 And all that sat in the council, looked stedfastly on him, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel.

*Note here, The great character given of St. Stephen; a man full of the grace of God, full of faith, full of power to work miracles, mighty in word and deed; able to do all things, and to suffer all things through Christ that strengthened him. 2. The violent opposition which this good man met with in the way of his duty. He is, (1.) Encountered by disputation with the heads of five colleges in Jerusalem, namely, Libertines, Cyrenians, Alexandrians, Cilicians and Asiatics. Behold here, an admirable act kept, wherein St. Stephen was the respondent, against whom opponents appeared from all parts of the known world; but all too few to resist the wisdom and Spirit by which he spake. He asserted the truth so convincingly, that all his opposites had no power to oppose him. See here how faithful Christ was in fulfilling of his promise, Luke xxi. 15. I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which all your adversaries shall not be able to gainsay nor oppose. (2.) His adversaries being baffled in their disputes, they burn with revenge; they hire men to accuse him falsely, that they might take away his life. The best arguments of a baffled adversary are ever found to be craft and cruelty; it has been an old artifice* of the devil, to swear innocent men out of their lives: And therefore it is next to a miracle, that no greater number of innocent persons have been murdered in the world by perjury and false accusation; when so many thousands hate them, who make no conscience of false oaths. 3. The charge and accusation brought against Stephen, that he spake dishonourably of the Jewish religion, that he was continually foretelling destruction to the temple, and threatening the change of all Mosaic rites. It is very probable, that he told them the shadows and ceremonies were to vanish, now the substance was come; and that the Mosaic rites were to give place, that a more excellent and spiritual worship might succeed. For as God was worshipped aright four hundred years before either tabernacle or temple were built, or the Jewish rites instituted: So he might again be truly worshipped after they were abolished. Lastly, How Almighty God, by a miracle, bears witness to the innocency of his holy servant St. Stephen; and to convince his accusers, that he had done no wrong to Moses, God makes his face to shine now as Moses's face had shined of old, and gave him an angelical countenance, in which appeared an extraordinary lustre and radiancy; not that an angel has a face, or shines visibly; but it intimates that amazing brightness of beauty which was instamped upon the face of Stephen. He now began to border upon heaven, and had received some beams of glory approaching: It pleaseth God sometimes to give his children and servants some prelibations and foretastes of heaven before they step into heaven, especially holy martyrs and confessors, who love not their lives unto death: God bears an honourable respect to them that bear witness to his name and truth; and as they shall shine forth in the kingdom of their Father so will God sometimes put a lustre upon their faces here: All in the council saw St. Stephen's face, as it had been the face of an angel.

C H A P. VII.

THEN said the high priest, Are these things so? 2 And he said, Men, and brethren, and fathers, hearken; The God of glory appeared unto our Father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran, 3 And said unto him, Get thee out of thy country and from thy kindred, and come into the land which I shall shew thee. 4 Then came he out of the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in Charran: and from thence, when his father was dead, he removed him into this land wherein ye now dwell. 5 And he gave him none inheritance in it, no not so much as to set his foot on; yet he promised that he would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, when as yet he had no child.

This chapter contains St. Stephen's apology, or defensive plea which he makes for himself: The Jews had in the foregoing chapter accused him for blaspheming their law, and profaning their temple, imagining that Almighty God was so pleased with the temple-service and Mosaic rites, that no other way of worship could be acceptable to him. Therefore by an historical deduction, he shews them that God was worshipped a right before either tabernacle or temple was built, or any of the Mosaic rites instituted or ordained, and consequently that the true worship of God was necessarily and inseparably annexed to any of these things. For the proof of this, he begins at Abraham, and shews them, that he living of old at Ur of the Chaldeans, in the midst of idolaters, God was pleased of his free mercy to call him, to enlighten, and draw him to own and worship the true God, and commanded him to leave his native country, and go into a land which he should shew him: He promised to make of him a great nation, and that in him all the families of the earth should be blessed. Now the design and drift of Stephen in this relation, is to prove, that Abraham, from his first call in Chaldea, when he was seventy years old, to the time of his being ninety years old, had served God faithfully all that time, without either circumcision or ceremony, without tabernacle or temple; and consequently, that the true worship of God might be now performed acceptably after these ceremonies were abolished as well as it was performed before they were instituted. Learn hence, 1. That religious worship is manifestly due to God by the law and light of nature. 2. That the manner how that worship should be acceptably performed, was not known by the law of nature, but discovered by divine revelation. Adam in innocence knew God was to be worshipped; yet he did not know by what outward acts he was to testify that homage, till God the Sovereign Governor and Supreme Lawgiver did give direction. 3. That the worship due from the creature to God the Creator, is a spiritual worship, and ought to be spiritually performed. 4. The Judaical worship, though appointed by God himself, was fleshly and carnal, and never pleased God for its own sake. 5. The evangelical worship being spiritual, and most suitable to the nature of God, is therefore most acceptable and best pleasing to him. The ceremonial worship was therefore good, because God commanded it; but the evangelical worship is therefore commanded, because good. The legal worship is called flsh in scripture, and a carnal ordinance, in opposition to the gospel, which is called spirit, and administration of the spirit, because attended with a more spiritual efficacy on the hearts and lives of men.

6 And God spake on this wise, that his seed should sojourn in a strange land; and that they should bring them into bondage, and intreat them evil four hundred years, 7 And the nation to whom they shall be in bondage will I judge, said God. And after that shall they come forth, and serve me in this place. 8 And he gave him the covenant of circumcision. And so Abraham begat Isaac, and circumcised him the eighth day; and Isaac begat Jacob: and Jacob begat the twelve patriarchs.

Note here, The great trial which God put Abraham's faith unto: The Lord promised to give him the land of Canaan for a possession; but he gave him not a foot's breadth: He promised to give it unto his seed, when as yet he had no child; and when God gave him seed, yet they were to sojourn in a strange land, Egypt; and continue there in bondage four hundred years. Learn hence, That there is no grace which God delights more to exercise and try, than the faith of his people; as faith puts honour upon God, so Josh God put honour upon faith; and faith never honours God more, nor is more highly honoured by him, than when it is put upon the greatest exercise and trial: 1 Pet. i. 7. That the trial of your faith being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, might be found, &c. Here the apostle compares faith unto, and prefers it before gold, even the most precious gold purified in the fire. Is gold precious and rare? So is faith. Is gold pure and resplendent? So is faith. Is gold lasting and durable? So is faith. Is gold purified and improved by trying in the fire? So is faith by exercise; as the instance of Abraham here fully proves. 2. How God takes Abraham and his seed into covenant with him; and gives him circumcision, the seal of the covenant. Thence learn, That in the covenant which God made with Abraham, he gave himself to be a God to Abraham and to his seed, and received Abraham and his seed to be a people unto himself. 2. That circumcision was both the sign and the seal of the covenant which God made with Abraham, and his seed, the people of the Jews: It is here called the covenant of circumcision, because circumcision was both the sign and the seal of that covenant made with Abraham. (1.) Circumcision was a sign, and that in several respects: It was a commemorative sign of God's covenant with Abraham; it was a representative sign of Abraham's faith and obedience towards God, A demonstrative sign of original sin, and the depravity of human nature. A discriminating and distinguishing sign of the true church, and people of God, from all the rest of the world. An initiating sign, by which all strangers were admitted into the Jewish church. And lastly, It was a prefigurative sign of baptism, which succeeded in the room of circumcision in the Christian church. (2.) Circumcision was not only a sign, but a seal also; Rom. iv. 11. He received the sign of circumcision, the seal of the righteous by faith. It was a seal on God's part, to confirm all the promises made to Abraham and his seed: And it was a seal on his and their part, to bind him to renounce the service of all other Gods, and to oblige them to the observation of the whole Jewish law.

9 And the patriarchs, moved with envy, sold Joseph into Egypt: but God was with him, 10 And delivered him out of all his afflictions, and gave him favour and wisdom in the sight of Pharaoh king of Egypt; and he made him governor over Egypt and all his house. 11 Now there came a dearth over all the land of Egypt and Canaan, and great affliction; and our fathers found no sustenance. 12 But when Jacob heard that there was corn in Egypt, he sent out our Father's first. 13 And at the second time Joseph was made known to his brethren: and Joseph's kindred was made known unto Pharaoh. 14 Then

24. Then sent Joseph, and called his father Jacob to him and all his kindred; three score and fifteen souls. 15 So Jacob went down into Egypt, and died, he and our fathers. 16 And were carried over into Sychem, and laid into the sepulchre that Abraham bought for a sum of money of the sons of Emmor the father of Sychem. 17 But when the time of the promise drew nigh which God had sworn to Abraham, the people grew and multiplied in Egypt. 18 Till another king arose, which knew not Joseph. 19 The same dealt subtilly with our kindred, and evil entreated our fathers, so that they cast out their young children, to the end they might not live.

From the history of Abraham, Stephen proceeds to that of Joseph; and shews, as he did before, that Joseph, as well as Abraham, worshipped God acceptably without either tabernacle or temple, and without such customs as Moses delivered; and consequently, that the worship of God is not confined to an outward temple, or a Mosaical ministrations; and that therefore it was not blasphemy in him to say, that God might be so worshipped. This is St. Stephen's argument from the instance of Joseph. As to the particular story of Joseph, observe, 1. The great and sore afflictions which beset that holy and good man; he was envied and hated of his brethren, they conspired against him, and sought to take away his life; he is thrown into a pit and afterwards sold for a bond slave to the Midianites; they sell him into Egypt, where he was imprisoned so long till the iron entered into his soul; that is, so loaded with irons, that his flesh was eaten with them. Learn thence, That afflictions, many and great afflictions, long and sore afflictions, have been, and may be, the lot and portion of the holiest and best of men, and all these occasioned by their own brethren. Joseph's brethren moved with envy, sold Joseph into Egypt. 2. The singular support and comfort which Joseph experienced in, and under, his great afflictions; God was with him God was with Joseph in Potiphar's house, and gave him favour in the eyes of his master, who reposed an entire confidence in him. God was with Joseph in prison, and caused his imprisonment to make way for his enlargement. God was with Joseph in Pharaoh's court, and gave him a prudent and provident spirit, making him a father unto Pharaoh, and to all his people; giving him also a compassionate and merciful spirit to his brethren; pardoning their cruelties, and forgiving the injuries done unto him. Hence we learn, That all the envy, malice, and mischievous designs of men, shall never be able to hinder or disappoint the purpose and pleasure of God: The patriarchs moved with envy, sold Joseph into Egypt: But God was with him. 3. The religious desire which Jacob and Joseph, and the rest of the holy patriarchs had to be buried together in the land of Canaan, ver. 15. 16. Jacob died, and our fathers, and were carried over into Sychem, and laid in a sepulchre. No doubt, this was done by way of declaration of their own faith, and in order to the confirmation of the faith of others, that their posterity should enjoy and possess that land; so that this act of theirs was a profession of their faith in the promises which God had made to them of their possessing and enjoying the land of Canaan. There is a natural desire in persons to be buried by their ancestors; but here it was a religious desire they died in the faith of their ancestors, and laid down their heads together, upon the same pillow of dust, in hope of a blessed and glorious resurrection.

20 In which time Moses was born, and was exceeding fair, and nourished up in his father's house three months. 21 And when he was cast out, Pharaoh's daughter took him up, and nourished him for her own son. 22 And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words and in deeds. 23 And when he was full forty years old, it came into his heart to visit his brethren the children of Israel. 24 And seeing one of them suffer wrong, he defended him, and avenged him that was oppressed, and smote the Egyptian: 25 For he supposed his brethren would have understood how that God by his hand would deliver them but they understood not. 26 And the next day he shewed himself unto them as they strove, and would have set them at one again, saying, Sirs, ye are brethren: why do ye wrong one to another? 27 But he that did his neighbour wrong thrust him away, saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge over us? 28 Wilt thou kill me, as thou didst the Egyptian yesterday? 29 Then fled Moses at this saying, and was a stranger in the land of Midian, where he begat two sons.

From the history of Abraham and Joseph St. Stephen descends to that of Moses; where we have observable, 1. The birth and education of Moses, he was born, and had three months in his father's house: and then being cast out was taken in by Pharaoh's daughter, and had a noble education given to him; being instructed in all kinds of good literature, to fit him for such great services as a prince's court might probably have brought him to: Moses was learned. Hence note, That the greater men are, the greater should their care be for the learned and religious education of their children; because nothing is more incongruous and unsuitable than greatness of estate and meanness of understanding. It is a shame to great men to breed up their children sensually, to gaming, sporting, and excess, as if an inheritance did serve for no other purpose but to make the heir of it useless, and good for nothing. Again, The latitude and extent of Moses's learning. He was learned in all the learning of the Egyptians. Where remark, 1. The different end which God had in his providence, from what Pharaoh's daughter had in her particular care. She intended, by this education, the good of Egypt; but God intended the good of Israel: She designed the service of Pharaoh; but God designed Moses to be a deliverer from Pharaoh. Thus the wise and holy providence of God useth the diligence of men to effect and bring things about which they never thought of. 2. We may remark, How that Moses the great prophet, whom God spake to, mouth to mouth, is here commended for his learning, yea, for Egyptian learning. Thence we may gather, That human learning is a noble and beneficial gift of God, and a very great ornament and honour unto the greatest and most excellent men; for it is in itself an ornament and perfection to the mind; it renders men the more useful and serviceable to their generation, and a greater blessing to society, but especially to the holy church of God. Human learning is indeed far inferior to holiness; but in holy men, learning is a rare ornament and accession to holiness.— Sanctified wit beautifies religion, sanctified reason defends it, sanctified power protects it, sanctified elocution persuades others to the love of it; so that to decry the use of human learning must proceed either from ignorance or from malice, and a desire to have religion betrayed. Let us see that we get our learning seasoned with holiness, that we use it with humility, moderation, and sobriety, as an handmaid unto Christ; not vain-gloriously unto ostentation, not proudly with contempt of others, not heretically in defence of error; never suffering human learning, but divine revelation, to determine articles of faith; then, if with Moses we be learned in all the learning of the philosophers, the more glory we shall bring to God, and the more useful and beneficial to mankind. 2. As the education of Moses in Pharaoh's court, so the time of his continuing there; namely, till he was forty years old: After which God put it in his heart to visit his brethren, the children of Israel, and offer himself to be a deliverer to them; and he supposed that they would have understood the purpose of God to save them by his hand, but they understood it not. But what reason was there for the Israelites to suppose, that Moses was the person designed by God for their deliverer? Answer, Very great reason; because, (1.) They knew that the time of their deliverance did now draw very near. (2.) From The extraordinariness of Moses's preservation; by his being hid three months in his father's house without discovery; by his floating upon the waters in an ark of bulrushes without danger, when an infant; they might have rationally thought that such a person was designed by God for very great purposes. 3. From his readiness to defend them at this time, when an Israelite and an Egyptian contended; for it was wonderful that so great a person as Moses was, and might have been, should concern himself in a private quarrel betwixt two obscure persons. Moses might well suppose, that his brethren would have understood, how that God by his hand would have delivered them; but they understood it not. 3. The ill treatment given to Moses, when he offered himself to be a reconciler; they thrust him from them, and expostulate with him, Who made thee a ruler or a judge? The meeke man replies, Sirs, ye are brethren, why do ye wrong one to another? Where note, 1. Who were the persons doing wrong to each other; they were Israelites, both Israelites: To see an Israelite and an Egyptian struggling, had been no wonder; but to see two Israelites, who were brethren, brethren by nation, brethren by religion, brethren in tribulation, both of the seed of Abraham, both initiated into the same covenant, both in bondage to a cruel tyrant, Pharaoh, who had condemned them to an ignominious slavery, and designed such a degree of cruelty, as to murder all their male issue: This was an astonishing sight, and Moses might well say, Why do ye wrong one to another? Plainly implying, that both parties were to blame: but that party most, who would not hear of a reconciliation, or putting a stop to the quarrel; a reconciler is more odious than a stranger in the apprehension of some. Lastly, How Moses being thus ill treated by them, departs from them, and they hear no more of him for forty years, verse 29. Then fled Moses, and was a stranger in the land of Midian: Where note, The years of Moses's life were an hundred and twenty: Forty years he spent at the court at Egypt; forty years he spent in Midian with his father-in-law Jethro; and the last forty years of his life in the wilderness. Now all this time Moses was a worshipper of the true God and that in an acceptable manner; and most of his time he worshipped God without either tabernacle or temple. From whence St. Stephen draws his argument to prove, that as God was acceptably worshipped by holy men, before either tabernacle or temple were erected, in like manner he may be so again, after both tabernacle and temple are destroyed; and consequently, that they unjustly accused him of blasphemy, or speaking blasphemous words against Moses, and against God.

30 And when forty years were expired, there appeared to him in the wilderness of mount Sina an angel of the Lord in a flame of fire in a bush. 31 When Moses saw it, he wondered at the sight: and as he drew near to behold it, the voice of the Lord came unto him. 32 saying I am the God of thy fathers, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. Then Moses trembled, and durst not behold. 33 Then said the Lord to him, Put off thy shoes from thy feet; for the place where thou standest is holy ground. 34 I have seen I have seen the affliction of my people, which is in Egypt, and I have heard their groaning, and am come down to deliver them. And now come, I will send thee into Egypt. 35 This Moses, whom they refused, saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge? the same did God send to be a ruler and deliverer by the hands of the angels which appeared to him in the bush. 36 He brought them out, after that he had shewed wonders and signs in the land of Egypt, and in the Red-sea, and in the wilderness forty years. 37 ¶ This is that Moses which said unto the children of Israel, A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren like unto me: him shall ye hear, 38 This is he that was in the church in the wilderness with the angel, which spake to him in the mount Sina, and with our fathers, who received the lively oracles to give unto us. 39 To whom our fathers would not obey, but thrust him from them, and in their hearts turned back again into Egypt, 40 Saying unto Aaron, Make us gods to go before us: for as for this Moses which brought us out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him. 41 And they made a calf in those days and offered sacrifice unto the idol, and rejoiced in the works of their own hands. 42 Then God turned, and gave them up to worship the host of heaven; as it is written in the book of the prophets, O ye house of Israel, have ye offered to me slain beasts and sacrifices by the space of forty years in the wilderness? 43 Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan, figures which ye made to worship them: and I will carry you away beyond Babylon. 44 Our fathers had the tabernacle of witness in the wilderness, as he had appointed, speaking unto Moses that he should make it according to the fashion that he had seen. 45 Which also our fathers that came after brought in with Jesus into the possession of the Gentiles, whom God drove out before the face of our fathers, unto the days of David, 46 Who found favour before God, and desired to find a tabernacle for the God of Jacob. 47 But Solomon built him an house. 48 Howbeit the most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands; as saith the prophet, 49 Heaven is my throne, and earth is my footstool: what house will ye build me? saith the Lord: or what is the place of my rest? 50 Hath not my hand made all these things?

St. Stephen here goes on with the history of Moses and having, in the former verses, made mention of what occurred to him in Egypt and in Midian, here an account is given of what happened to him in the wilderness; and the first thing observable, is the appearance of God to him in a flame of fire out of the midst of a bush, which burned, but was not consumed. This bush was an emblem of the church: This bush burning, pointed out the afflicted state of the church in Egypt, having been a long time in the fiery furnace there; but the burning bush, not consumed, signified the church's preservation. God was in the midst of the bush, whilst the bush was in the midst of the burning. Where note, How almighty God, intended to send Moses as a deliverer of his people out of Egypt, gives him a visible sign for confirming of his faith, in the sight of this burning, but unconsumed bush: 1. To assure him of his people's deliverance, that though they were now slaves in Egypt, yet they should be set free, and inflated in a land flowing with milk and honey; next to satisfy him that he should be the instrument to bring to pass so glorious a work. O how gracious is God's condescension towards his servants, who is pleased, by visible signs, to support the weakness of their faith! The Lord appeared to Moses in a flame of fire in the bush. 2. How Moses, in the faith of God's presence with him, protection over him, and assistance of him, goes forth for Egypt, where he works many signs and wonders before Pharaoh, at last brings the people forth into the wilderness to Mount Sinai, where God gave them his law, and appointed Moses then to make a tabernacle for his worship. Now, the use which St. Stephen makes of this, is to convince the Jews, that for above four hundred years their fathers had worshipped God without any tabernacle at all, and consequently, that now that sort of worship was abolished, God might be very acceptably served and worshiped in the absence of it. 3. That notwithstanding Moses was raised up by God, and sent to be a deliverer into Egypt, and a law-giver to the Israelites in the wilderness; yet they rebelled against him, and against God in him; for they ran into the vilest idolatry, even to make and worship a golden calf, to adore the host of heaven, the sun, moon, and stars, for deities; yea, they carried about with them the images and pictures of the heathen gods, Mars and Saturn, with design to worship them; for which gross idolatry God sent them into captivity beyond Babylon. Hence learn, 1. That there is a strange inclination in man's heart to the sin of idolatry; the reason is, because it is a worship of our own invention. Now, man is most fond of, and forward for, that service of God which is of his own finding out and setting up. We love a devotion of our own devising very dearly. 2. That idolatry in worshipping the sun, moon, and stars, is a very ancient sin; both the old Gentiles and old Jews were guilty of it; and consequently, we may infer, that neither antiquity, nor universality will bear us out in idolatrous worship. Example is no plea against a rule, nor antiquity against truth: It is no excuse to us, when we do evil, to say our forefathers did so before us. 3. That the idolatry of the Jews owned him and gloried in him. But though they knew God, they worshipped him not as God. 4. The Israelites being come out of Egypt by the conduct of Moses, and having entered the wilderness at God's appointment and particular direction, the tabernacle for his worship and service is erected: This is here called, ver. 44. The tabernacle of witness; it being the place where God used to witness and manifest his glorious presence, and because the ark of the covenant, the law and the testimonies, were laid up in it, which were witnesses and declarations of God's will how he would be served. Now this tabernacle was an ambulatory temple, as the temple was a standing tabernacle. This tabernacle was moveable: they carried it with them from place to place, while they sojourned in the wilderness, and at last they brought it with them into Canaan, ver. 45. which tabernacle our forefathers brought in with Jesus, (that is, Joshua) into the possession of the Gentiles, that is, the land of Canaan, where it continued all the days of David, till Solomon began his reign, who built the temple in a most magnificent and sumptuous manner. Here note, 1. That the public worship of almighty God is a moral duty, founded in the light of nature and the common reason of mankind. 2. That solemn places for public worship have been from the beginning, before the giving of the law. The ancient devotion of the world delighted much in groves, Gen. xxi. 33. Abraham planted a grove, and called there on the name of the

the Lord. This was a sort of oratory or chapel, whither Abraham and his family resorted, to worship the true God: After the giving of the law, while the people of the Jews were in an unsettled condition, God was contented with a mean tabernacle; but when they were settled in Canaan, then a magnificent temple is built, in some measure suitable to the greatness and majesty of that God who was to be worshipped in it. From whence we may infer, That the public worship of God, though it doth require inward and spiritual devotion, yet, as public, is necessarily external; and as such, it ought to express, in the best manner we are able, that profound reverence, which we pay to divine majesty. And therefore that the circumstances of it should not only be decent, but very solemn and magnificent, the sight of nature seems plainly to require, and the gospel doth no where gainsay. When David resolved to build God an house for public worship, he determined it should be exceedingly magnificent; which resolution was not a piece of ceremonial piety, but grounded on a moral and eternal reason, of equal force in all ages; namely, that the greatest and best of Beings be most awfully adored by us in the best manner we are able; and that we declare our high regard and esteem of so glorious a Majesty, by all outward fitting testimonies of respect and reverence. Lastly, That after the temple was built, the worship of God was not so tied to that place, as that he could not be worshipped acceptably any where else; for God hath declared, by the mouth of his holy prophet, Isa. lxvi. 1, 2: That he delighted not in temples made with hands, as if He was included therein, or bound thereto. And thus St Stephen, by a large indiction of particulars, made good his defence, that he was not guilty of blasphemy, for affirming that Christ would destroy the temple, and change the customs which Moses delivered. He closes his apology with this argument, That which was not blasphemy to affirm of the tabernacle, though it was set up by God's special appointment given to Moses, is not blasphemy to affirm against the temple: But it was no blasphemy to affirm the use of the tabernacle to have been temporary, and consequently alterable; therefore to affirm the same of the temple, is not blasphemy; especially since the Lord hath said, That he dwelleth not in temples made with hands.

51 Ye stiff-necked, and uncircumcised in heart, and ears, ye do always resist the Holy Ghost; as your fathers did, so do ye. 52 Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted? and they have slain them which shewed before of the coming of the just One, of whom ye have been now the betrayers and murderers: 53 Who have received the law by the disposition of angels, and have not kept it.

Observe here, 1. How St. Stephen, having finished his general discourse in the foregoing verses to the Jews, comes now to a particular and close application of it to them. All the while he was generally discoursing, they were quiet and still, and made no noise at all; for generals do not affect: But when he came to apply it particularly, and say, You are the men, ye stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart, this enrages them, and drives them into the worst kind of madness. Learn hence, 1. That the efficacy of the word preached lies in a particular and close application of it to every man's conscience. 2. That it is a minister's great duty not to satisfy themselves with delivering general truths to their people, but they must point at their particular sins (though not at their particular persons) and reprove them for the same, what hazards soever they run, and whatever the event may be. St. Stephen's close preaching here, and impartial reprov'g of sin, he saw would cost him his life; but, not terrified by his adversaries, he spares not to tell them, the greatest of them, of their faults. Accordingly observe, 2. The particular sins which St. Stephen here convicts them of, and reproves them for: 1. The stoutness and stubbornness, and stiff-neckedness of their hearts; Ye stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart: A metaphor taken from a bullock not used to the yoke, who therefore will not submit his neck to bear it. Wicked men are often called children of Belial, because they will not endure the yoke of obedience: but when God comes to put it upon their necks, they lift up their heel against him. 2. He charges them with rebelling against, and resisting the Holy Spirit of God; Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost: That is, both the outward testimony of the Holy Ghost speaking to them in the ministry of the prophets and apostles, and also the inward operations of the holy Spirit, in that work of illumination and conviction which they had been under. 3. For their imitating their cruel ancestors, who killed the old prophets, and crucified the Lord of life and glory; As your Fathers did, so do ye. 4. For their wicked violation of the holy law of God, which was given them by the glorious ministry and proclamation of angels: Ye received the law by the disposition of angels; that is, the angels were testes and internuncii, witnesses and messengers betwixt God and Moses, in giving of the law, or Jesus Christ the angel of the covenant, who is God's messenger, and the angel that appeared to Moses in the bush: He gave that law to Moses, and by Moses to you, which law ye have notwithstanding violated and never kept.

54 ¶ When they heard these things, they were cut to the heart, and they gnashed on him with their teeth. 55 But he being full of the Holy Ghost, looked up stedfastly into heaven, and saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God, 56 And said, Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God. 57 Then they cried out with a loud voice, and stopped their ears, and ran upon him with one accord, 58 And cast him out of the city, and stoned him: and the witnesses laid down their clothes at a young man's feet, whose name was Saul:

Observe here, 2. The Jews angry and unreasonable resentment of the foregoing representation; though it was exact truth and matter of fact, yet were they cut to the heart; that is they were angry even unto madness. Here was a most proper corrosive, and applied by a skilful hand; but

but they would not let it stick, nor endure a cure; such is the enmity of wicked hearts, that when the ministers of God reprove sin sharply, instead of receiving the message they rage at the messenger: When they heard these things, they were cut to the heart. 2. How they discover their rage against the holy man two ways; by their gestures, and by their actions: Their gestures made a full discovery of their enraged minds. 1. They gnashed upon him with their teeth; the action of damned fiends. 2. They made a great outcry with unanimous and tumultuous rage; They cried out with a loud voice. 3. They stopped their ears, resolved to hear no more either of his counsels or complaints. 4. They ran upon him with one accord, like persons united and combined together in malice and madness. 5. They cast him out of the city, not out of the synagogue only, but out of the city also. They look upon this good man, of whom the world was not worthy, as a person not fit for human society. "Lord! why should any of thy present ministers and ambassadors wonder at, or be discouraged by the ill treatment which an unkind world now gives them, when thy blessed apostles, full of the Holy Ghost, and endowed with power to work miracles, were cast out before us as the filth of the world, and the off-scouring of all things!" But this was not all; not only by their gestures, but by their actions did they discover the utmost effects of their rage and malice against this holy and innocent person; for they put him to death; yea, stoned him to death; shooting a whole volley of cruelty at his naked breast; a shower of stones came down upon him, from those hands which ought to have cast the first stone at themselves; but all this did but join him the closer to Christ, the Corner stone; Et par tot lapides petra conjungi ur uni. Learn hence, That it is not in the power of piety and religion to exempt and secure the most holy and religious person either from the attempts of popular fury, or from the stroke of a violent and bloody death; They cast him out of the city and stoned him. Observe, What a blessed sight St. Stephen had of heaven, and of Jesus in heaven, to prepare and fit him for his sufferings, and to support and uphold him under them, ver. 56. Behold, I see the heavens opened, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God. Blessed Jesus! what an encouragement it is to us, suffering for thee on earth, to look up stedfastly by faith unto thee in heaven, who art continually standing there to behold and observe, to support and strengthen, to receive and reward thy suffering servants; to count every stone cast at them, and to revenge all the injuries and wrongs done unto them! Lastly, How these bloody persecutors manage their cruelty under a form of law, that they might appear the more specious. By the law of God, stoning was the punishment due to blaspheming; and they that witnessed against the blasphemer were, by the law of God, to cast the first stone at him, Deut. xvii. 7. Accordingly the witnesses here put off their upper garments to fit themselves for their bloody work; and a young man called Saul undertook to look to them, kept their garments for them, and consequently consented unto his death, and had a hand in stoning of him: The witnesses laid down their garments at a young man's feet, whose name was Saul. By consenting to the sins of other men, we certainly become partakers of other men's sins.

59 And they stoned Stephen, calling upon God, and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit.

Note here, 1. The holy deportment of this humble saint at his death; he prays. Learn thence, That good men should shut up their lives with prayer, and die with prayer in their mouths. Our Saviour did so; his first martyr here did so. St. Stephen imitated the death of Christ, and he imitated Christ in his death; turning from malicious men to speak unto a merciful God in prayer. They stoned Stephen calling upon God. 2. The object of his prayer, or whom St. Stephen prays to, Jesus Christ: He doth not say, "O blessed Virgin! O St. Thomas! O St. Bridget! intercede with my Saviour for me." But he directs his supplication immediately to Christ, saying, Lord Jesus! From whence we may, strongly infer the divinity of Christ. Prayer is an act of religious worship, and he that is the proper object of religious worship must be God: None must be the object of my prayer, but he that is the object of my faith. How shall I pray to him, in whom I have not believed? 3. The subject of his prayer, or what he prays for, his soul; Lord Jesus, receive my spirit; he doth not say, Lord Jesus save my life, which is in so much danger of being taken away; O, deliver me from the hands of my persecutors, and bring me off safe! Not a word like this; but let it go well with my soul: Lord, receive my spirit. Learn hence, that the godly man's care, living and dying, is for his soul; because this is the principal and immortal part, because this is the greatest talent that ever God put into our hands, and because the happiness and eternal welfare of the body depends upon the blessed condition of the soul: If the soul be happy, the body cannot be miserable. 4. The sweet surrender; the happy and cheerful resignation which the good man makes of his soul into the hands of Christ; Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. (1.) The godly man's spirit or soul is his own, he has not sold it to sin, nor pawned it to Satan, nor exchanged it for the world; he has reserved it for Christ, who redeemed it for him. (2.) Receive. Learn thence, It is the duty and disposition of a gracious person, to resign up his soul willingly and cheerfully into Christ's hands, whenever God calls for it: his soul is surrendered by him, not extorted from him. The knowledge that a good man has of Christ's love and care, of his faithfulness and power, encourages him to this resignation, Psal. xxxi. 6. Lord, into thy hands I commit my spirit, for thou hast redeemed it. And surely he that redeemed it will not hurt it.

60 And he kneeled down, and cried with a loud voice, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge. And when he had said this, he fell asleep.

We had St. Stephen's prayer in the foregoing verse for himself; in this verse he prays for his murderers. Where note, 1. His pious charity in forgiving his enemies, and praying for them, that God would forgive them also, Lord lay not this sin to their charge: How doth this holy Martyr imitate his dying Saviour? Luke xxiii. 34. Father forgive them. Note, 2. His regular charity: his charity began at home: he prays first for himself, then for his murderers: first, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit; next, Lord, lay not this sin sin to their charge. Where remark, That Christ prayed first for his enemies, then for himself, Luke xxiii. 34 36. Father, forgive them; Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit; But St. Stephen intercedes first for himself. The reason of the difference is this, Christ needed no prayer for himself, but Stephen did: We are to love our enemies as ourselves; but Christ loved his enemies above himself, and better than himself. Christ's love to his enemies was the copy and pattern, St. Stephens but the transcript. Note, 3. His holy fervency in prayer; he cried out with a loud voice, endeavouring by his prayers to drown the noise of the stones which rattled about his ears, and to divert that shower of vengeance from them, which their shower of stones upon him deservedly called for from heaven. 4. The holy martyr prayed for himself standing, but for his enemies kneeling. Ver. 59. He stood when he said, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit; but, ver. 60. when he said, Lord lay not this sin to their charge, he kneeled down and cried. He was more importunate for his enemies, than he was for himself. How near did Stephen, the first Martyr, come to his blessed Master Jesus Christ, in praying for his enemies? 5. The success and benefit of his prayer: God heard and answered Stephen's prayer in Paul's conversion, recorded in the ninth chapter. Si Stephanus non orasset ecclesia Paulum non habuisset, saith one of the ancients; "Saul's conversion was owing to St. Stephen's intercession." 6. The holy man's exit and happy conclusion, He fell asleep. Where note, 1. The thing recorded of him is his death. 2. The metaphor which his death is set out by, and clothed with, and that is sleep. 3. The circumstance of time when he fell asleep; namely, after he had served Christ, and suffered for him. Learn thence, That it is a blessed thing when death calls us off the stage of this world, after a life of service and suffering: When he had so said, he fell asleep. Happy is that christian who falls asleep with his Lord's work in his hand.

C H A P. VIII.

The history of Saul's cruelty and conversation is next recorded; the former in this chapter, the latter in the next; the design of both is to excite us to consider, what a great change the grace of God can make in turning Sauls into Pauls; persecutors into professors; and the opposers of Christ and his truth, into faithful servants unto both.

AND Saul was consenting unto his death.—

That is, St. Stephen's, mentioned in the close of the last chapter; how far he consented to his death, the text tells us, He kept the garments of them that stoned him, they laid down their clothes at his feet, chap. vii. 58. His hand did not throw one stone at the holy Martyr's head, but his will concurred with others in that bloody act; and this denominated him guilty. Learn hence, That God chiefly inspects the heart, and if the vote be passed there he looks upon the man as guilty, though he proceeds no farther. It is easy to murder another by silent wish, or passionate desire. In all moral actions God values the will for the deed, and reckons that man an actor, that is an applauder. Consent unto the sins of others makes their guilt our own: Saul was consenting unto his death. It follows:

—And at that time there was a great persecution against the church which was at Jerusalem: and they were all scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judea and Samaria, except the apostles.

Note here, 1. How the spite and cruelty of the church's adversaries was not quenched, but rather inflamed by the blood of Stephen: From whence arose a bitter persecution against the church at Jerusalem, upon which the multitude of believers fled from thence. Persecution scatters the professors of religion; but God makes scattering the way to increasing, and what was intended for the hindrance, God over ruled for the furtherance of the gospel: As God overpowers the devil, so he outwits him too: This scattering persecution at Jerusalem, which was designed to smother and suppress the gospel, did propagate and spread it more and more. 2. How God sets bounds and limits to this sharp persecution: though the believers were scattered, yet the apostles continued at Jerusalem: They were all scattered, except the apostles. The twelve stay there untouched in the midst of the fiery furnace of persecution, to comfort and cherish the church in that sad and doleful day, maugre the malice of wicked men, and of enraged devils: and those who were scattered, carried the light of the gospel among the Gentiles. Thus out of the darkness of persecution, God bringeth forth the light of the gospel, providing at once for the safety of some by their flight, and for the calling home of others by their dispersion: They were all scattered abroad, &c.

2 And devout men carried Stephen to his burial, and made great lamentation over him.

Note here, 1. Though St. Stephen was stoned to death by his bloody persecutors, yet are they not so inhuman as to deny him a burial; it is a mercy to have a grave, and a decent burial is a blessing: The body is the garment of the soul; we lay up this garment in the wardrobe of the grave, with assurance that we shall put it on again (when made spiritual and incorruptible) in the morning of the resurrection, and wear it to all eternity. 2. The persons described who carried Stephen to the bed of the grave, devout men: that is, truly religious men, men of eminent piety and holy courage also; Devout men carried Stephen to his burial. A noble instance of a generous and christian courage. that they durst, among such a multitude of persecutors and furious zealots, own their esteem of, and pay their last respects to the name and memory of the holy martyr. 3. The doleful solemnity of his funeral, They made made great lamentation over him; and reason enough there was for it, because of the church's great loss at that time. When any of the ministers of God are snatcht away by death, especially by a violent death, from the service of the church, there is just cause for great and solemn lamentation: Devout men carried Stephen to his burial, and made great lamentation over him.

3 As for Saul, he made havock of the church, entering into every house, and haling men and women, committed them to prison.

"Bloody Saul! was it not enough for thee to see a single faint destroyed, but wilt thou seek to destroy the whole fraternity and communion of saints?" Behold the fiery zeal of this furious persecutor; he spares neither age nor sex, neither men nor women, neither young or old, but without respect he hales them to prison. O fury! worse than inhuman, not only to drag men spitefully, but to hale women shamefully to prison. Women in all ages have been exempted from the insults of tyranny, but not always freed from the persecutor's fury. And blessed be God for that masculine courage and constancy which the feebler sex have shewn, when they have been called forth to bear their testimony for Christ: out of weakness they have been made strong. With what wisdom and courage have they answered their examiners, convicted their accusers, confuted their opposers, kissing the stake, hugging the faggots, embracing the flame! Thus can God help the weak things of the world to confound the strong; and teach the foolish to confute the wise.

4 Therefore they that were scattered abroad, went every where preaching the word.

This severe persecution at Jerusalem, dispersed the whole body of the church, and scattered both members and teachers thereof, except the apostles. Some went to Damascus, some to Samaria, some to Phœnicie, Cyprus and Antioch. But God over-ruled this scattering for his church's encreasing; he brought good out of evil, light out of darkness, order out of confusion. It is a great and certain truth, that the Holy God would suffer no sort of evil to be, did he not know how to bring some excellent good out of that evil.

5 Then Philip went down to the city of Samaria and preached Christ unto them. 6 And the people with one accord gave heed unto those things which Philip spake, hearing and seeing the miracles which he did. 7 For unclean spirits, crying with a loud voice, came out of many that were possessed with them; and many taken with palsies, and that were lame, were healed. 8 And there was great joy in that city.

Note here, 1. Amongst the dispersed, who went to Samaria, Philip was one; not Philip the apostle (for all of them remained at Jerusalem) but Philip the deacon, who was the second in order after Stephen, among the seven deacons: He comes to Samaria, and preaches there. 2. The doctrines which he preached; he preached Christ unto them; that is, Christianity, or the Christian religion; namely, The doctrine of Christ's incarnation: holy life and death, resurrection and ascension, together with remission of sins through faith in his name. 3. The success of Philip's doctrine at Samaria; the people with one accord embrace the gospel, Giving heed to the things which he spake: The presence of the holy Spirit accompanying his ministry, united his hearers hearts, as well as their ears to attend diligently to the doctrine of Christ delivered to them. This diligent attention was a blessed preparative to the Samaritans conversion, seeing faith comes by hearing: Yea, they did not only attend to, but acquiesce in all he spake. Note thence, That were there a more reverent attention to the word, there would be more conversions by it than at this day there are. 4. The external ground and reason of Philip's success in his ministry at Samaria; the miracles which he wrought. These were undeniable evidences of the truth of what he spake, and by which he shewed God's authority for what he did and said; he healed diseases, and cast out devils (called unclean spirits, because they delight in sin, that spiritual uncleanness of the soul) who cried out with a loud voice, as very loath to lose their lodgings, had they not been constrained to it. The miracles which Christ and his apostles wrought were heaven's broad-seal, to confirm the truth of what they taught: The people gave heed to what Philip spake, seeing the miracle which he did. Lastly, What joy and rejoicing there was among the Samaritans at their receiving and entertaining of the gospel: There was great joy in that city; not only for the cures wrought upon their bodies, but for the doctrine of reconciliation and salvation preached to their souls. As the gospel is in itself a message of Joy and glad tidings, so it fills the soul with joy unspeakable, that cordially receives and entertains it. Joy in the Holy Ghost is one of the sweet effects of the kingdom of God; that is, the gospel, Rom. xv. verse 17. The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness, &c.

9 But there was a certain man called Simon, which before time in the same city used sorcery and bewitched the people of Samaria, giving out that himself was some great one. 10 To whom they all gave heed from the least to the greatest, saying, This man is the great power of God.

An account is here given of one of Philip's auditors at Samaria, Simon Magus by name, or Simon the Sorcerer, a vile man, the blackest Ethiopian that ever baptismal water wet or washed. Notorious for sorcery, for hypocrisy, for final apostacy, and avowed impiety. Ecclesiastical history informs us of the heresies he broached, of the divine honours he assumed, of the statutes and images built to him, and his strumpet Helen, which lewdly accompanied with him; of an altar erected to him with this blasphemous inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, "To Simon the holy God;" and of his tragical end, by breaking his neck, when attempting to fly up to heaven, because the people would no longer be-cheated with his impostures here below. From this example, note, 1. That into the most eminent and populous cities do oft-times enter the greatest and vilest impostors, the most atheistical and diabolical forcerers: There they lurk and lodge, there they seek to set up and play their prizes. 2. That the vilest impostors, and the worst seducers, have yet many, very many followers: The silly multitude is soon deluded. To him they all gave heed, from the least to the greatest. 3. That such vile deceivers have the confidence to brag, and the multitude have the weakness to believe, that they are very extraordinary persons, and can do extraordinary things. Simon gave it out himself, that he was some great one; and the people cry him up as the great power of God.

11 And to him they had regard, because that of long time he had bewitched them with forceries:

12 But when they believed Philip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized both men and women. 13 Then Simon himself believed also: and when he was baptized he continued with Philip, and wondered, beholding the miracles and signs which were done.

Note here, 1. How long a time this vile forcerer-by, God's permission, and Satan's power wrought these lying wonders among the people: He had of a long time bewitched them with forceries, verse 11. Deceivers are not always suddenly detected, and drossy hypocrites are not presently discovered; but the vizard will drop off sooner or later. 2. That where the true knowledge of God comes, and the clear light of the gospel shines, there gross impieties and impostures, there cheats and delusions will be found out detested and abhorred; When they believed Philip's preaching they were baptized, both men and women. Where the light shines, Satan falls as lightning; magic vanishes. This Dagon cannot stand before the ark of God: When the people of Ephesus received the gospel, they soon made a bonfire of their magic books, Acts xix. 10. 3. The success of the gospel preached by Philip; the people believed and were baptized both men and women. Mark, 1. Believed, and then baptized; these were adult or grown persons, not infants, and they were heathenish idolators, strangers to the covenant; and therefore must believe the gospel, and profess their faith in Christ, before their baptism. Baptism is not to be administered to any that are out of the visible church, till they profess their faith in Christ, and obedience to him. 4. The persons baptized were women as well as men: When they believed Philip they were baptized, &c. Women under the gospel are capable of the seal of the covenant as well as men. Under the law they were, then they were circumcised in the men: Now they are baptized for themselves: They were baptized, &c. 5. A great and sudden change wrought in Simon himself by the preaching of Philip; He believed also, and was baptized: Behold, the forcerer is become a professor, a believer, a baptized person. The gospel preached may have a common operation upon a soul, where it never produced any inward sanctification. All that are by the gospel profelyted, are not savingly converted. All are not good fish that are inclosed in the gospel's net; but some fish, some trash. As there will be wheat and tares in the same field, chaff and corn in the same floor; so there will be some saints and some sinners in the purest earthly church. Lastly, upon a bare profession of faith, Simon Magus is baptized. Learn thence, That outward profession justly gains admission into the christian congregation, and gives a person right to external ordinances; De occultis non judicat ecclesia, "The church's judgment is a judgment of charity, not of certainty;" of the outward, not of the inward man; of the life, not of the heart. The faith of Simon Magus was no other than a temporary, historical, yea, hypocritical faith; however, Philip baptizes him upon his making profession of it. An heart-hypocrite is no hypocrite (in foro ecclesie) in the sight of the church, though most abominable in the sight of God! Simon the unsound professor was more odious in the sight of God than Simon the forcerer.

14 ¶ Now when the apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John. 15 Who, when they were come down, prayed for them that they might receive the Holy Ghost. 16 (For as yet he was fallen upon none of them: only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.) 17 Then laid they their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost.

Note here, 1. How the apostles at Jerusalem, hearing the glad tidings of Samaria's conversion by Philip's ministry, thought fit to send down two of the twelve to confirm the new converts in their faith, and to constitute a church there by their apostolical authority. 2. The persons whom the college of the apostles at Jerusalem thought fit to send to Samaria, Peter and John. Where note, That Peter's being deputed by the rest of the apostles to this service, is an argument that Peter had no primacy or superiority over the rest of the apostles: Or, if in this employment there was any sign of primacy, John was sharer in that as well as Peter. The apostles sent Peter and John. 3. What the apostles Peter and John did when they came to Samaria, They prayed, and laid their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost. Where, by the Holy Ghost is not to be understood the sanctifying graces of the Holy Ghost, which the apostles never did nor could dispense, but the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost, the gift of tongues and prophecy, and a power to work miracles. These were now conferred on such persons whom the Holy Ghost directed them to lay their hands upon, as persons appointed and chosen to be preachers of the Gospel. Where note, That imposition or laying on of hands has been an ancient rite used by the officers of the church, in their solemn dedicating of persons to the service of God and his church.

18 And when Simon saw that through laying on of the apostles hands the holy Ghost was given, he offered them money. 19 Saying, Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost. 20 But Peter said unto him Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money. 21 Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter; for thy heart is not right in the sight of God.

Here note, 1. How infinitely mistaken this wretch was, in thinking that the marvellous gifts of the Holy Ghost could be purchased with money. 2. In supposing that the apostles had a power to dispense these gifts when and where and to whom they pleased. 3. And that they could enable others to impart this also; which were all very gross conceits. From this deed of Simon's, it is called simony, to seek to buy spiritual gifts or offices with money. 2. What it was that put Simon upon purchasing this power; doubtless, it was covetousness and vain-glory. He hoped to make a penny of this privilege, and render himself famous among his followers by this prerogative. Learn thence, That cunning and close hypocrites, corrupt and hypocritical professors, do seek to make a gain of godliness, and a merchandize of Christianity. Simon had never bid so freely for the Holy Ghost, if he had not expected to receive as freely of others for the Holy Ghost; which he desired to buy, but not to keep; and intended to sell, not to give. 3. How St. Peter scorns the vile motion made by Simon, and rejects it with the greatest detestation: Thy money perish with thee. Learn, That wicked (though gainful) motions are to be scorned and refused by the godly with the greatest detestation and abhorrence. Our hearts can never rise too high in a just indignation against sin, and against all temptation unto sin: Thy money perish with thee: thou and thy money perish together. Observe How plainly St. Peter deals with him; he searches him to the quick, to the heart, sounds the depth of sin; lays open the core of his hypocrisy before his face, and tells him to his teeth, that his heart was rotten and unsound; Thy heart is not right in the sight of God. The baptismal water had washed his out-side, but his inwards were unclean. The heart is the worst part of man till it be mended, and then it is best where most evil lies, there we must first begin to be good; all will be good, if the heart which is the seat, the sink and seed plot of all evil, be made good. The life would not be so bad, if the heart were not worse: All the obliquity of our lives proceeds from the impurity of our heart and nature, as the muddiness of the stream from the foulness of the fountain.

22 Repent therefore of this thy wickedness, and pray God, if perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee. 23 For I perceive that thou art in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity. 24 Then answered Simon, and said, Pray ye to the Lord for me, that none of these things which ye have spoken come upon me. 25 And they, when they had testified and preached the word of the Lord, returned to Jerusalem, and preached the gospel in many villages of the Samaritans.

Observe here, 1. The odious character wherewith sin in general, and hypocrisy in particular, is branded, it is bitterness and bondage; it is the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity. Learn thence, 1. That sin is an exceeding bitter thing: It is bitter to God, it provokes him to bitter anger; it was bitter to Christ, it laid him under the bitter wrath of God; it was bitter to the angels, it turned them out of heaven, and banished them from the presence of God evermore; it is bitter to good men, it costs them bitter repentance, and it occasions them bitter chastisements; and it will be bitter, eternally bitter to the wicked and impenitent world. Now the bitterness of sin is not a medicinal and wholesome bitterness, but an intoxicating and stupifying bitterness, a poisonous and a baleful bitterness. Sin's bitter draught is a baneful draught. 2. That not only bitterness, but bondage attends the service and servants of sin: As sin is the gall of bitterness, so it is the bond of iniquity, and the bondage of sin; it is a shameful and ignominious bondage, a fruitless and unprofitable bondage, a stupifying and insensible bondage, a restless and unwearied bondage, an endless and eternal bondage. 3. That every soul before conversion is in and under this deplorable bondage; Thou art in the bond of iniquity. Observe, 2. The means prescribed and directed to for the soul's delivery out of this deplorable bondage namely repentance and prayer. 1. Repent. Learn, That timely and sincere repentance is a special mean, prescribed and appointed by God for the recovery of the worst of sinners out of this deplorable bondage. 2. Pray. Here note, 1. A wicked man may pray, and ought to pray. As bad as Simon Magus was, St. Peter doth not drive him to despair, but directs him to his duty: Pray to God. Prayer is a part of natural worship, which we owe to God; it is the souls motion Godward; therefore to say a wicked man should not pray, is to say, that he should not turn to God. 2. That all the prayer in the world, without a man's own prayer to God for pardon and remission, will be ineffectual and unavailable to salvation. Simon Magus desired the apostle to pray for him, ver. 24. But St. Peter bids him to pray for himself, as ever he hopes for forgiveness with God, Repent of this thy wickedness and pray to God. Observe, 3. The encouragement given to make use of the means prescribed, namely, a probability of forgiveness and acceptance with God. Repent and pray, &c. Learn, That the vilest and worst of sinners upon their repentance, accompanied with prayer and supplication unto God, have good ground of encouragement to hope for pardon of sin and acceptance with him. 4. How St. Peter takes most notice of that of which Simon Magus took least, and that was the wickedness of his thoughts; That the thought of thy heart may be forgiven thee. Hence learn That wicked and evil thoughts, lodged and entertained in the heart, ought in a special manner to be repented of, and humbled for, by all that expect forgiveness with God; for sinful thoughts are radical and seminal evils; they were the root of the angels apostasy and Adam's apostasy also. A world of sin may be lodged in the thoughts.

26 ¶ And the angel of the Lord spake unto Philip, saying, Arise, and go toward the south, unto the way that goeth down from Jerusalem unto Gaza which is desert. 27 And he arose and went. And behold, a man of Ethiopia, an eunuch of great authority under Candace queen of the Ethiopians who had the charge of all her treasure, and had come to Jerusalem for to worship, 28 Was returning, and sitting in his chariot read Esaias the prophet. 29 Then the Spirit said unto Philip, Go near, and join thyself to this chariot. 30 And Philip ran thither to him, and heard him read the prophet, Esaias, and said, Understandest thou what thou readest? 31 And he said, How can I, except some man should guide me? and he desired Philip that he would come up and sit with him.

Here we have recorded the remarkable conversion of the eunuch by the preaching of Philip; concerning which several circumstances are to be observed: 1. The author or instrument converting, Philip, who was commanded by the angel in a vision to go to Gaza; but not the common way, or ordinary road, but by the way of the desert, a difficult, and perhaps a dangerous way, over mountains and through vallies: Philip knew not whither he was going; but God knew whither, and wherefore he sent him. O Philip! It was worth thy going many steps out of the way, to convert one soul: Happy for the eunuch that thou wentest out of the way, and that he as happily met thee. 2. The subject or person converted, (1.) An Ethiopian, the most despised of all the Gentiles in the sight of the Jews. Behold! the sanctifying grace of God washing a blackmoor white, and making an Ethiopian clean. (2.) A nobleman, a courtier, a treasurer to the queen; yet he concerns himself with religion, and being a profelyte, travels in his chariot as far as Jerusalem, to worship God in a solemn manner. O how will this example rise up in judgment against our great ones, who have more light, but less heat; more knowledge, but less love! (3.) A bookish man, one that delighted in reading, and in reading of the scriptures too, and thus whilst he was riding in his chariot, to lose no time for gaining the knowledge of his duty. If our courtiers and great men read not at all in their coaches, or if so, plays or romances only, this ignorant Ethiopian lord did better, though he knew not so much as these. He read in his chariot the prophet Esaias. 3. The means which God sanctified and blessed for the eunuch's conversion: it was the reaping and expounding of the holy scriptures: The word of God, read and preached, is the great instrument in the hand of the Spirit for sinners illumination, conversion, and salvation; and blessed are they that hear and read the word with attention, affection and application. 4. The wonderful modesty and humility of this great man, he thankfully accepts Philip's offer to instruct and teach him, (some would have huffed at it as a rude affront) but he condescends to learn of one beneath him. Such as are modest and thoroughly humble, are also truly docile and teachable, willing to learn knowledge, although from the mouth of an inferior: He desired Philip to come up and sit with him.

32 The place of the scripture which he read was this, He was led as a sheep to his slaughter; and like a lamb dumb before his shearer, so opened he not his mouth. 33 In his humiliation his judgment was taken away: and who shall declare his generation? for his life is taken from the earth. 34 And the eunuch answered Philip, and said, I pray thee of whom speaketh the prophet this? of himself or of some other man: 35 Then Philip opened his mouth and began at the same scripture, and preached unto him Jesus, Observe here, 1. The particular text of holy scripture which God directed the eunuch to read in order to his conversion: It was a prophecy of Christ the promised Messiah, recorded in the liii. of Isaiah; He was led as a sheep to the slaughter, and as a lamb dumb before his shearer. Pointing out the innocency, the meekness and patience of the Lord Jesus Christ, in and under all his satisfactory sufferings for our sins: In the day of his humiliation: particularly in the day of his trial and sentence: His judgment was taken away; that is, his right was taken away by the unrighteous judgment of the Jewish sanhedrim, and no right or justice done him; and who can declare sufficiently the wickedness of that generation, which cut off so innocent a person from the land of the living? This text Philip informs the eunuch, was truly applicable to the Messiah, who was certainly come into the world, and both did and suffered all that was prophesied of him. Here note, How the divine providence did work in a concurring tendency towards the eunuch's conversion. God moves his heart to read, to read the scriptures, to read this scripture, which informed him of the sufferings of the Lord Jesus, and sends Philip out of his way to meet him, and he meets him just as he was reading that portion of scripture which most concerned him: He wanted to be informed concerning Christ, and Philip is at his elbow at that very juncture, to instruct him in a most fundamental truth in order to his conversion and salvation. O the wonderful love, and manifold wisdom of God, in finding out ways and methods for bringing home souls to himself! If his providence brings them not under the means, it will bring the means to them: This church wanted the ordinary means of knowledge; but being desirous of spiritual knowledge, God steps out of the ordinary road to meet him, though an Ethiopian commonly esteemed the meanest of mankind; and thereby shews, that as there is no respect of persons, so no difference of nations with him; but whoever feareth God and worketh righteousness, is accepted of him. In the close, Phillip preaches a public sermon to him displaying Jesus Christ before him, and by the blessing of God upon the ordinance, saving faith was effectually wrought in the eunuch's soul.

36 And as they went on their way, they came unto a certain water. And the eunuch said, See here is water: what doth hinder me to be baptized?

37 And Philip said, If thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest. And he answered and said, I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God. 38 And he commanded the chariot to stand still: and they went down both into the water, both Phillip and the eunuch; and he baptized him. 39 And when they were come up out of the water, the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip, that the eunuch saw him no more; and he went on his way rejoicing. 20 But Philip was found at Azotus: and passing through he preached in all the cities, till he came to Cesarea.

Observe 1. The eunuch is instructed before baptized;

and he desired baptism of Philip; it was not forced upon him by Philip against his will, The eunuch said, What hinders me to be baptized? To drive men to baptism, as they drive beasts to watering, and force christianity upon them against their wills, to send forth booted apostles with javelins in their hands, and crosses on their breasts, as the Romish church doth to dragoon men into christianity, is the way to make hypocrites, but not profelytes; for it is not whole armies that can besiege my reason, nor cannons batter my will. It is conviction, not compulsion, that must induce assent. 2. The eunuch after instruction desired baptism, See here is water; let me be baptized. As if he had said, "O Philip! as thou hast instructed me, I pray thee also baptize me. Now that I have received the benefit of thy doctrine, let me not want the comfort of the sacrament." Where the heart is truly touched by the ministry of the word, and the soul thoroughly converted unto God, there is a desire to be partaker of the sacraments. 3. The condition required of the eunuch before he was baptized, namely, A profession of his faith in the promised Messias; If thou believest, thou mayest be baptized. There is a necessity of faith, to render a man a meet partaker of the holy sacraments: If we come to any of the sacraments without faith, we are sure to depart without fruit. 4. The qualification of that faith which gives a right to the holy sacraments; If thou believest with all thine heart; only that faith gives a right to baptism, and intitles to salvation, which is with all the heart. This eunuch believed with his whole heart, that Jesus Christ was the Son of God. This gave him at once a right to baptism, and a title to heaven. 5. The manner of the administration of baptism to the eunuch; he went down into the water and was baptized by Philip: In those hot countries it was usual so to do, and we do not oppose the lawfulness of dipping in some cases, but the necessity of dipping in all cases. In sacraments, it is not the quantity of the elements, but the significancy of them that ought to be attended to; as in circumcision, it was not the quantity of the flesh cut off; and in the Lord's supper, it is not the quantity of the bread and wine taken down; so in baptism, a few drops of water poured upon them, doth signify and seal, and convey and confirm to me a right and interest in all the benefits of my Saviour's death and resurrection, as fully as if, with Jonah, I were plunged into the main ocean. 6. What followed upon the eunuch's baptizing, and coming out of the water. (1.) The Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip; by the ministry of an angel he was carried out of sight, that the eunuch might be the more assured of the truth of those things which were taught him by Philip's ministry; and that he was a person sent of God to direct him in the way to true happiness. (2.) The eunuch went on his way rejoicing, as well he might; it was the happiest journey he ever took, to meet with Christ and conversion in his way, and heaven and salvation at his journey's end. A converted man hath great cause of rejoicing; the gospel proclaimed, much more, heartily embraced, is matter of great joy. Behold the fruit of faith, joy and rejoicing; the eunuch is instructed, believed, is baptized, and goes home rejoicing. The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Lastly, Philip was found at Azotus, or Ashdod, thirty-four miles from Gaza, so far had the ministry of the angels carried him, and there safely set him down. Learn, How good it is to obey God in the most difficult command. Philip had a hard and tiresome journey from Samaria to Gaza, footing it through a desert, in untrodden paths, and running as fast as the eunuch's charriot, to join himself unto it at the command of God. But now from Gaza to Azotus he has a swifter and easier passage, he rides in an angelic flying chariot. When we attend the execution of God's commands, the holy angels shall attend us, and take care of us, and administer necessary help unto us: like tender nurses they keep us safe whilst we live, and bring us home in their arms to our Father's house when we die. Blessed be God for the ministry of his holy angels.

C H A P. IX.

This chapter relates to us both Saul's cruelty and conversion; and acquaints us with the wonderful method which the infinitely wise God took for his church's deliverance from the fury of persecution; whereby the church had rest and peace.

AND Saul yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, went unto the high priest, 2 And desired of him letters to Damascus to the synagogues, that if he found any of this way, whether they were men or women, he might bring them bound unto Jerusalem.

*Note here 1. The lively character of a bloody persecutor: He breathes out threatenings and slaughter against the members of Christ. His very breath smells of fire; threatenings and slaughter, like lightnings and thunder, proceed out of his mouth. Whilst a persecutor hath in him the breath of his own life, he breathes nothing but death against others: Nothing will satisfy him but the death and destruction of the members of Christ. An indiscreet and ungovernable zeal soon degenerates into fury and madness. 2. How restless unwearied persecutors are in the prosecution of their bloody designs and purposes. Saul was now inquisitor hæreticæ pravitate: away he trots to the high priest for a commission to bind heretics, who believed on Jesus, and opposed the traditions of the fathers; and having, as he thought, swept Jerusalem of saints, he resolved next to ransack Damascus, though it was five or six days journey from Jerusalem: However he spurs on, away he goes through fire and water to revenge his malice on the poor members of Jesus Christ. *Learn hence, That persecutors will spare neither purse nor pains, they will stick at nothing, though never so toilsome and hazardous, so they may glut their malice, and satisfy their revenge upon the poor disciples of Jesus Christ. The high priest needed not to hire Saul to this black work, he both offers himself, and sues for the office: No doubt the high priest and council highly applauded his zeal and forwardness for extirpating heretics, commending the gallantry of his resolution, and the bravery of his mind; and having sealed his commission, sent him away with wishes of success.

and

3 And as he journeyed, he came near Damascus; and suddenly there shined round about him a light from heaven. 4 And he fell to the earth, and heard a voice saying unto him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? 5 And he said, Who art thou, Lord? And the Lord said, I am Jesus whom thou persecutest. It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks.

Saul was now onward of his journey to Damascus (the worst journey that ever he intended, but the best he ever undertook) a journey most maliciously purposed by him, but most mercifully disposed by God. Heaven had designed him for better service, and work of another nature; and accordingly he is stopped in his way, knocked off his horse, a sudden beam of light beyond the brightness of the sun darts upon him, dazzles him, and he hears a voice, saying, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? that is, me in my members. Whatever is done against Christians for any thing that Christ commandeth them, he takes it as done against himself. Such as persecute the saints for their sanctity, persecute Christ himself; and he can no more endure to see them wronged, than himself. As the honour of Christ the Head, redounds to the members, so the sorrows of the members are sent by the Head. Christ said not thus to his murderers on earth, Why bind ye me? Why buffet ye me? Why scourge ye, and why crucify ye me? But here, when the members suffer, he cries out from heaven, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? Lord! thou art more tender of thy body mystical, than thou wast of thy body natural; more sensible of thy members sufferings, than of thine own. 2. The wonderful power of the heart changing grace of God. Saul cries out, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? Saul is no longer a lion, but a lamb; the wolf that hunted before for his prey, now gently couches like a sheep; hears and obeys the voice of Christ the great Shepherd; and of a persecutor of the church, becomes the great doctor of the Gentiles. Behold! the tare is become wheat; the child of wrath a chosen vessel; the prodigy of nature, the miracle of grace. Lord! who can enough admire and magnify the sovereignty and omnipotent prevalence of divine grace, which could refine and did extract very precious gold, from so rough, so coarse, and so base a metal? Conversion is a work of wonder in all men, but a miracle in this man, and extraordinarily strange, and instantaneously sudden; and therefore is by no means to be made the treasure and standard of every man's conversion. Shall we think no man converted, unless he be struck down with a light and power immediately from heaven, and be taken with a fit of trembling, and frightened almost out of his wits? How many, by the benefit of a good education, others by the blessing of God upon some affliction, and upon calm consideration, without any great terrors and amazement, have been visibly changed and converted? The effects and fruits of conversion are very visible in all, but the manner of conversion is not alike in all. Things may be very visible in their effects, which yet are not visible in their cause. If the fruits of our conversion be visible, the certainty of it is unquestionable, and the advantage of it will be unspeakable, although we cannot tell the time when, or the manner how, the holy Spirit wrought it in us.

6 And he trembling and astonished, said, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? and the Lord said unto him, Arise, and go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou must do.

Note here, 1. How easily God can make the fiercest persecutor to quake and tremble: Saul is struck down, but it is to convert him, not confound him; he trembles, but his trembling was in order to rejoicing. It was a favourable, though an affrighting stroke, which struck him down, but with design to raise him up again. Humiliation for sin, in some measure always goes before a soul's acceptance of Christ, and subjection to him. 2. How ready and desirous a converted person is to know and do the mind and will of God: Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? He is inquisitive after his duty, and desirous of the knowledge of it: We may sooner find fire without heat, than a true convert without operative grace. It is not, Lord, what wilt thou have me to say? but, What thou wilt have me to do? It is not the taking, but the walking and working person that is the true christian. 3. God's answer to Saul's inquiry; Arise, go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou must do. Mark, He was going to Damascus before, on the Devil's errand, now God bids him go; he had better authority for his going thither now, than what he had from the high priest before: he went before for others' destruction; he now goes for his own instruction, in order to salvation: There it shall be told thee what thou must do.

7 And the men which journeyed with him stood speechless, hearing a voice, but seeing no man.

Note here, The testimony or witnesses of Saul's conversion, to wit, the men that journeyed with him; it is probable that he had a considerable number of officers with him, to bring both men and women that professed christianity bound to Jerusalem. These saw the light shining, and heard a confused noise like thunder; but they saw not Christ himself, as he did, nor heard the articulate voice of Christ that he heard, which spake so powerfully, so convincingly, and so convertingly to his soul. Lord, how many are there, that come under thine ordinances, who hear only (like Saul's companions) a confused noise and empty sound! They do not hear the distinct voice of Christ speaking to their hearts with a strong hand, inwardly and effectually, and so remain under the power of unbelief, in an unconverted state.

8 And Saul arose from the earth: and when his eyes were opened he saw no man; but they led him by the hand, and brought him into Damascus. 9 And he was three days without sight, and neither did eat nor drink.

Note here, 1. The change of Saul's posture; He arose from the earth. He that fell to the earth a persecutor, rises up a saint. O free mercy, and astonishing rich grace! that the earth upon which he lay did not open her mouth and swallow him up alive: He that had run away from God, and employed his feet in the service of the devil, is once more set upon his feet again, 2. His blindness and loss of sight: When his eyes were opened he saw no man. Christ taught him, by his bodily blindness, the blindness of his soul in spiritual things, which till now he was insensible of. As Saul was, so all men naturally are spiritually blind, before regeneration and conversion: True, he was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, and was a great proficient in human learning, but after his conversion he counted that knowledge no better than blindness, Phil. iii. 7, 8. Note, 3. His introduction or leading by the hand into the city; They led him by the hand into Damascus. Who led him? Doubtless his companions that came along with him upon his bloody design from Jerusalem. Here the blind led the blind; those very hands lead him to Damascus, which should have haled the saints from Damascus to Jerusalem; But, O Saul! thou hadst a better leader than all these, even Christ himself: He led thee by the hand into the city, in order to the completing of thy conversion: Now happy Saul! though formerly rebellious, who hast thy Saviour for a leader, thou shalt never wander nor miscarry. 4. The duration and continuance of Saul's blindness: He was three days without sight. This was a long night to him who persecuted the children of the day; a just time for him to be in darkness, who so implacably attempted to blow out the light of the gospel: But perhaps no less time would have been sufficient to humble him for his rage and madness against Christ and his members. Besides, there are some that think, that, in these three days of his continued blindness, he had that rapture into the third heaven, which is mentioned 2 Cor. xii. 2. But however that be, doubtless in that time his mind was filled with divine contemplations; and that glorious gospel was taught him in three days, which he taught to others all his days. 5. His abstinence from food: He did neither eat nor drink: He spent those three days, we may believe, in fasting and prayer, and extraordinary humiliation before God, for his former wicked life, and particularly for his violent persecution of the church of Christ: He fasted, to make him more fervent in prayer: for fasting prepares for prayer, and gives wings to prayer.

10 ¶ And there was a certain disciple at Damascus named Ananias, and to him said the Lord in a vision, Ananias. And he said, Behold, I am here, Lord. And the Lord said unto him, Arise, and go into the street which is called Straight, and inquire in the house of Judas, for one called Saul of Tarsus; for behold he prayeth, 12 And hath seen in a vision, a man named Ananias coming in, and putting his hand on him, that he might receive his sight.

Note here, 1. Though Christ converted Paul himself, yet Ananias his minister must instruct him. By Christ is grace infused, by his ministers increased; such an honour doth Christ put upon the ministers of the gospel, that he makes use of their endeavours ordinarily both for the production and augmentation of grace in the hearts of his people. O, the necessity and usefulness of a standing ministry! It is a singular favour to have the mind of God made known to us by men like ourselves: And behold the honour that God puts upon the ministers, in using them as conduit pipes, for conveying the water of life to us, which he is not pleased to communicate immediately from himself. 2. What an exact knowledge the Lord has of particular persons and particular places: He tells Ananias in what city Saul was, in Damascus; in what street he was, in the street called Straight; in whose house he was, in the house of Judas. It is a manner of consolation, yea, of highest consolation to the children of God, to know and remember that God knows them, that God knows their persons, knows their purposes, knows their performances, knows their place of abode: that he knows who they are, what they do, and where they dwell. It assures them as to their persons, they shall be accepted; as to their performances, that they shall be rewarded; as to their habitations, that they shall be loved, blessed and protected by him. So dear are the holy servants of God unto him, that he loves the very street in which they lodge, the house in which they dwell; the walls of their habitation are always before him, and he delights continually to look upon the them. Let holiness to the Lord then be always writ in fair and legible characters upon the walls of our houses. Zech. xiv. 16. Note, 3. The course which Almighty God takes to remove all fear from Ananias's mind, and to encourage him to go to Saul, according to the direction given him; although he had been such a bloody persecutor, he tells him, That, Behold, he prayeth; as if he had said, "Though he has been bad, he is not now what he was, he is another man; nay, he is a new man, he is truly and thoroughly converted; and this is the undeniable evidence and testimony of it; That whereas before he persecuted, now he prayeth: Behold he prayeth." Learn thence, That spiritual breath is a good sign of spiritual birth: None of God's children are still born, they all come crying into the world. The duty of prayer faithfully and perseveringly performed, is a good evidence that a soul is thoroughly converted and brought home by repentance unto God: Behold, Saul prayeth! But did he never pray till now? Yes, no doubt, many a time when he was a strict Pharisee, he prayed after a loose and customary manner; but he never prayed so sensibly and so feelingly, so spiritually and affectionately, so fervently and perseveringly before, as he did after his conversion: His prayer before, was the cry of the old, now of the new creature; before, he prayed with coldness and indifferency, now he prays with warmth and fervency, as a person in earnest for his soul's happiness and salvation; therefore Christ brings it in with a note of attention and observation: Now, Behold he prayeth.

13 Then Ananias answered, Lord, I have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done to thy saints at Jerusalem. 14 And here he hath authority from the chief priests to bind all that call on thy name. 15 But the Lord said unto him, Go thy way: for he is a chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children children of Israel. 16 For I will shew him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake.

Note here, 1. Ananias's reluctance and fear to go to Saul, because of his former violent persecution, and present commission; Lord, I have heard of this man, &c. Learn, That such as are very ready and forward for Christ's service, may, upon appearing difficulties, hang back, till they be helped over those difficulties by the helping hand of Christ, Thus it was with Ananias: Behold, says he, here am I Lord, ver. 10. to shew his readiness to run on any errand that Christ would send him: But when he came to understand his message, he was affrighted and began to draw back: Therefore the Lord graciously condescends to remove the stumbling-block that lay in the way of his servant's obedience. Fear not; as if Christ had said, "Go thy way, he is not what he was, he is another man: yea, he is a new man." 2. The honourable title which Christ puts upon Saul, He is a chosen vessel; that is, a person chosen of God to convey the divine treasure of the gospel, not only to Jews, but Gentiles also, even to the greatest and highest among them; He is a chosen vessel &c. Where observe, 1. The term of usefulness; he is a vessel. Now a vessel is not a natural, but an artificial instrument. No man is born, but made a minister of the gospel. Vessels are not of equal capacity, some are greater, others less; all ministers have not like endowments, nor are they equally fitted for the sacred employment. Again, vessels are receptive instruments; they must take in before they can give out. What the ministers of the gospel have received of the Lord, that they deliver to their people; they give out what God gives in. Finally, vessels are for effusion, as well as for reception: they let out, as well as take in; yea, therefore take in, that they may let out; therefore have the ministers of Christ a treasure of divine knowledge in themselves, that they may communicate and impart it to others. And it is not impaired by imparting, but like the oil in the widow's vessel, increased by pouring out. A minister, by communicating the treasure of his knowledge, enriches others without impoverishing himself. 2. The term of excellency, He is a chosen vessel, chosen to preach Christ, chosen to suffer for Christ; a vessel chosen to bear the divine treasure of the gospel both to Jews and Gentiles. Lord! what honor dost thou put upon thy ministers in making them vessels of honor fit for the master's use and the family's service! If I may not be a vessel of gold or silver, let me be a vessel of wood or stone, so I may be a vessel unto honor, a successful instrument in thy hand, for thy glory, and the church's good.

17 And Ananias went his way, and entered into the house; and putting his hands on him, said, Brother Saul, the Lord, even Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest; hath sent me that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost. 18 And immediately there fell from his eyes as it had been scales: and he received sight forthwith, and arose, and was baptized. 19 And when he had received meat, he was strengthened. Then was Saul certain days with the disciples which were at Damascus.

Note here, 1. Ananias, though no apostle, no deacon, nor minister that we read of, but an ordinary and private christian only, yet he has power to heal Saul of his blindness, and to confer the Holy Ghost; Receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost: If so, undoubtedly he had an extraordinary warrant for this extraordinary work; for none but the apostles had power to confer the Holy Ghost.— No ordinary person ought to undertake any part of the ministerial function without an extraordinary call and commission. 2. The title given by Ananias to Saul, Brother Saul; they were now brethren by faith and profession, owning the same God, united to the same Saviour, animated by the same Spirit, encouraged by the same promises, partakers of the same hope, and heirs of the same glory. As the scripture speaks of a brotherhood betwixt Christ and believers, He is not ashamed to call them brethren; so it speaks of a brotherhood betwixt believers themselves, Love the brotherhood; that is, the whole fraternity and society of christians, who are sanguine Christi conglutinati, cemented by the blood of Christ, and united by the bond of love. 3. How this converted person, Saul, takes upon him the badge of christianity by baptism; He arose and was baptized. Lifting himself thereby a soldier under Christ's exalted banner, and entering himself a member of that church which heretofore he had made havock of. 4. The prudent care which Saul takes of his health, by giving nature its necessary refreshment; He received meat, and was strengthened. Doubtless the body was much weakened and enfeebled, by his long journey partly, but by his consternation, fear, and grief especially, as also by his humiliations, watchings, fasting and prayer: It was therefore his duty to refresh nature, and to strengthen himself for the service of his great master, wherever he should please to send him. Whilst we are in the body, there is a debt of care which we owe to the body: Meat and drink are the supports of life, under the influence of the divine blessing; and all superstitious abstinence from food is no better than will-worship. Lastly, Saul is no sooner changed himself, but he changeth his company and acquaintance. He no longer associates with the chief priests and rulers of the synagogues, but with the followers of Jesus, ver. 19. Then was Saul, &c. Men who cunningly conceal their inclinations, may yet be known by their constant companions. Saul was now a companion of them that feared God, and kept his commandments. The disciples at Damascus, whom he came to destroy, are now become his delight.

20 And straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues, that he is the Son of God. 21 But all that heard him were amazed, and said, Is not this he that destroyed them which called on this name in Jerusalem, and came hither for that intent, that he might bring them bound unto the chief priests? 22 But Saul increased the more in strength, and confounded the Jews which dwelt in Damascus, proving that this is very Christ. 23 ¶ And after that that many days were fulfilled, the Jews took counsel to kill him. 24 But their laying await was known of Saul. And they watched the gates day and night to kill him. 25 Then the disciples took him by night, and let him down by the wall in a basket.

Here we have an account of St. Paul's entrance upon his ministerial office in preaching the gospel; Straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues. Where note, 1. The time of his preaching, Straightway; he fell presently to his Master's work, not consulting flesh and blood about the difficulties and dangers that might attend it: but perform his duty with such zeal and immediate application, as became a person of his holy character and profession. 2. The place where he preached, In the Jewish synagogues: He was afterwards indeed the apostle of the Gentiles, but according to Christ's command, he first preached the word of life to the Jews, to convert some, and to leave others without excuse: After which he turned from them unto the Gentiles, according to Acts xiii: 46 It was necessary that the word of God should be first spoken to you, &c. 3. The doctrine he preached; That Jesus was the Son of God, the true, promised, and expected Messiah; and that all the prophecies and predictions of the prophets concerning the Messiah, were exactly fulfilled in his person. 4. The effect of his preaching: (1.) Some of his auditors were amazed, admiring that so pestilent a persecutor was become a powerful preacher, These glorified God in him. (2.) Others were confuted, yea, confounded, being unable to withstand the force and dint of his argument, by which he proved, that this is the very Christ. Note, 5. The hazard which the apostle ran in preaching the gospel at Damascus; his enemies, who were not able to resist the Wisdom and Spirit by which he spake, took counsel to kill him, and in order to this, watched the gates of the city day and night, there being in their apprehensions no possibility of his escaping. 9. The manner and means of his deliverance; some christians who dwelt at Damascus, let him down in a basket by the wall, and so he escaped the hands of his bloody enemies. The wisdom of God is never at a loss to find out ways and means, either ordinary or extraordinary, for the deliverance of his servants, when their deliverance makes most for his own glory, and the gospel's advantage. God had much work for Paul to do: and till he had finished his work, his enemies could not take him off with all their combined power and malice.

26 And when Saul was come to Jerusalem, he assayed to join himself to the disciples: but they were all afraid of him, and believed not that he was a disciple. 27 But Barnabas took him, and brought him to the apostles, and declared unto them how he had seen the Lord in the way, and that he had spoken to him; and how he had preached boldly at Damascus in the name of Jesus. 28 And he was with them coming in and going out at Jerusalem. 29 And he spake boldly in the name of the Lord Jesus, and disputed against the Grecians: but they went about to slay him. 30 Which when the brethren knew, they brought him down to Cesarea, and sent him forth to Tarsus.

Here we have an account of the second place which Paul exercised his ministry in; namely, Jerusalem. Having escaped with his life at Damascus, he comes to Jerusalem, and attempts to join himself to the disciples there, who were all afraid of him, knowing how bloody a persecutor he had been. The conversion of a persecutor is so rare and seldom heard of, that it puts the largest charity hard to it, to believe the verity and reality of such a person's conversion unto God. The disciples who had formerly felt the effects of Saul's persecuting rage and fury, might justly be afraid taking him into an intimate fellowship and communion with the church. Observe next, How Barnabas was stirred up by the Spirit of God to present Saul to the church, and free their minds of all fears and jealousies which they had entertained concerning him; and this he doth by a three-fold argument: 1. Because he had seen Jesus Christ in the way, as he went to persecute the saints at Damascus. 2. Because the Lord had spoken to him with a strong hand, and wrought a mighty change in him, and upon him; the persecutor being now become a great professor. 3. Because he was not only become a professor, but a preacher of that gospel he had persecuted, and this boldly and publicly both at Damascus and in Arabia; proving undeniably that Jesus was the Christ, and the true Messiah. This testimony of Barnabas was full and satisfactory, both to the church at Jerusalem, and also to Peter, James, and John, who gave Paul the right hand of fellowship, and he went with them to the work. Observe, lastly, How the enemies of the gospel conspire against Paul's life at Jerusalem, as they did before at Damascus; for preaching Christ, and disputing with the Grecians in defence of the gospel of Christ they lay siege for his life. Learn thence, That always opposition, and often persecution, is the evil ghost that haunts the preachers and preaching of the gospel wherever it goes. To preach the word convincingly brings the ill-will of an evil world infallibly upon the head of the preacher. But why did these men rather seek to kill Paul than Peter, James or Barnabas? Answer, because he was formerly one of their own, of their own company, of their own college; a persecutor like themselves, and a persecutor with themselves. This enraged them; they looked not upon him as an apostle, but as an apostate; one that had revolted from them, a renegade, and as such they meditate his destruction night and day; insomuch, that it is probable, that never were so many sufferings heaped upon the head of any minister of the gospel throughout the world, as upon St Paul, (see them reckoned up, 2 Cor. xi. 23.) partly through the hatred of the Jews, and partly through the fury of the blind Gentiles; yet the Lord delivered him out of all. Till his work was done, and his race run, and he had finished the course of his ministry, neither the malice of men, nor the rage of devils, could take him off. Blessed be God, our times are in his hands, not in our enemies, nor yet in our own.

31 Then had the churches rest throughout all Judea and Galilee and Samaria, and were edified;

and

and walking in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, were multiplied.

That is, "After Saul's miraculous conversion, and after he was sent away, and departed from those parts, where the Jews, his old companions in persecution, could not endure his presence, he having been just before as zealous a persecutor as themselves: then the churches planted by Philip and others throughout Judea, Samaria, and Galilee, had much rest and peace, and were greatly edified in knowledge and faith, in holiness and love; and the grace and comfort of the holy Spirit daily increasing in them, the number of believers daily multiplied." Learn thence, 1. That after the persecution and wearisome troubles of the church, God has his times for their peace and rest. God sends his church sun-shine after showers, a calm after a storm, health after an hectic, and a Canaan's rest after a wilderness journey. 2. That it is the church's duty to improve her peace and rest for her spiritual edifying; that is, for her settlement and growth, for her establishment and increase in all the graces and comforts of the holy Spirit. 3. That it is a very great blessing to have the churches of God multiplied, and their multiplication is the happy fruit and consequence of their having peace; Then had the churches rest, were edified, and multiplied.

32 ¶ And it came to pass, as Peter passed throughout all quarters he came down also to the saints which dwelt at Lydda. 33 And there he found a certain man named Eneas which had kept his bed eight years, and was sick of the palsy. 34 And Peter said unto him, Eneas, Jesus Christ maketh thee whole: arise, and make thy bed. And he arose immediately. 35 And all that dwelt at Lydda and Saron saw him, and turned to the Lord.

The Holy Ghost now leaves the relation of St. Paul's life and actions for the present, and returns to give a farther account of St. Peter, what he said, what he did, and what he suffered, particularly at Lydda, at Joppa, and Cesarea: At Lydda he healed Eneas, at Joppa he raised Dorcas, and at Cesarea he preached the gospel to the Gentiles. Observe 1. What this great apostle St. Peter did at Lydda: He there, in the name, that is, by the power of Christ healeth Eneas, who lay sick of the palsy, and had kept his bed eight years. Where note, The difficulty of the cure, the manner of the cure, and the effects of the cure. 1. The difficulty of the cure; the disease was a dead palsy, which had taken away the use of his limbs, and made him bed-rid for eight years: all this is recorded, to shew the difficulty of the cure, and the greatness of the miracle: Omnipotentis medici nullus insanabilis occurrit morbus; "To such an Almighty Physician, as the great God is, no disease is found incurable." 2. The manner of the cure: St. Peter acts in Christ's name, not his own; and lets the lame man know whom he should own for his benefactor, Christ himself: The apostle was but the instrument in Christ's hand; and that the cure was perfectly miraculous, appears by this, The cripple was cured immediately; and cured perfectly; it was a present cure, ver. 34. And he arose immediately.

The instantaneous manner of the cure shews it to be miraculous, and by a divine power; for nature and art act in time and by degrees, bringing nothing to be perfection on a sudden, whereas this cure was wrought in a moment his strength is restored in an instant. It was also a perfect cure, and as an evidence of it, he takes up his bed. This was to shew that he was fully recovered. 3. The effects of this cure: It had such an influence upon the spectators of this miracle, that all that dwell at Lydda and Saron, when they saw it, turned to the Lord, ver. 35. That is, they embraced the faith, seeing the cripple so strangely, so suddenly, and so perfectly cured.

36 ¶ Now there was at Joppa a certain disciple named Tabitha, which by interpretation is called Dorcas: this woman was full of good works, and alms deeds which she did. 37 And it came to pass in those days that she was sick and died: whom when they had washed, they laid her in an upper chamber. 38 And forasmuch as Lydda was nigh to Joppa, and the disciples had heard that Peter was there, they sent unto him two men, desiring him that he would not delay to come to them. 39 Then Peter arose and went with them. When he was come, they brought him into the upper chamber; and all the widows stood by him weeping, and shewing the coats and garments which Dorcas made while she was with them. 40 But Peter put them all forth, and kneeled down and prayed, and turning him to the body, said, Tabitha, arise. And she opened her eyes, and when she saw Peter, she sat up. 41 And he gave her his hand, and lifted her up; and when he had called the saints and widows he presented her alive. 42 And it was known throughout all Joppa: and many believed in the Lord. 43 And it came to pass, that he tarried many days in Joppa with one Simon a tanner.

This chapter concludes with a relation of a second miracle wrought by St. Peter at Joppa, in raising dead Dorcas to life. Where note, 1. The woman upon whom this miracle was wrought; Dorcas a woman rich in good works, full of alms-deeds; yet neither her piety towards God, nor her liberality to the poor, could preserve her either from death or from diseases. A dear disciple may be diseased, and die: Behold he whom thou lovest is sick. John xi. 2. yea, and dead too. Strength of grace and dearth of respect, even from Christ himself, cannot prevail against diseases. Good Dorcas here lies dead, with her body washed, not only fit for her burial, but especially to shew their hope of the resurrection. The doleful lamentation made by the widows for the loss of this good woman, who used to clothe the naked with the labour of her hands: She did not spend her time in making rich apparel for herself, but in making garments for the poor; and it seems she had good store of them ready made by her for the poor's use, as their necessities did require; They shewed coats and garments which Dorcas had made; the undoubted tokens and evidences of her pious charity. Learn hence, That the best relics of saints that can remain in honour of them when departed, are acts of piety towards God, and of charity to the poor. 3. The manner of St. Peter's working this miracle. (1.) He puts them all out of the room where the dead lay; partly to prevent ostentation and vain glory; partly to prevent disturbance by their immoderate mourning; and partly to prevent interruption in the exercise of prayer, which he was now about to perform. (2.) He kneeled down; which recommends to us that reverential posture in our prayers to the great God, of kneeling before him. 3. He prayed; thereby owning and acknowledging, that the power of raising her was from God, not from himself. Note lastly, The effect of this miracle: Many believed in the Lord: She was raised more for the good of others than her own; for her restoring to natural life was the occasion of raising many to a life of faith; Upon the sight of this famous miracle performed by St. Peter, many believed.

C H A P. X.

This chapter acquaints us with the first overtures which the apostles made to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles: according to Christ's command, they begun at Jerusalem, and preached to the Jews throughout Judea, Samaria, and Galilee; but now time was come, for beating flat and laying down the partition wall betwixt Jew and Gentile, which accordingly is done in this chapter, by St. Peter's preaching to Cornelius, who was the first fruits of the Gentiles conversion to Christianity.

THERE was a certain man in Cesaria, called Cornelius, a centurion of the band called the Italian band, 2 A devout man, and one that feared God with all his house, which gave much alms to the people, and prayed to God alway:

Observe here, 1. The person described, to whom St Peter is sent to preach the gospel; by his name, Cornelius, by his occupation, a soldier; by his religion, a profelyte or converted Gentile, of which there are two sorts; some were profelytes of the covenant, that is, such Gentiles as submitted themselves to circumcision, and the whole Mosaic pedagogy: These were counted as Jews, and freely conversed with as such. Others were called profelytes of the gate: These were not circumcised, nor did they conform to the Mosaic rites, but were obliged only to observe the seven precepts of Noah; namely, to worship the true God, and not idols; to abstain from blood, from fornication, from robbery; to administer justice impartially, and to do as they would be done unto. Such a profelyte as this, the Jews would not converse with, but counted unclean, being a Gentile, and such an one was this Cornelius; but though a Gentile, though a soldier, though a commissioned officer, yet a pious, charitable, good man. In all nations, in all places, of all employments, God has a number of holy and gracious persons to honour him in the world, according to their present measure of light received from him. 2. The evidence which Cornelius gave of his religious fearing God; He feared God with all his house, he gave much alms: and prayed to God always. Cornelius was therefore really, because relatively, religious; the obligeth his family to fear God as well as himself, and together with himself, like Abraham, he commands his household after him to keep the way of the Lord; Gen. xviii. 19. And thus the blessing of Abraham came upon this Gentile, Cornelius. He feared God with all his house; and his charity was as eminent as his piety: He gave much alms to the people; that is, to the people of the Jews, to whom alms was not unclean, though given by an heathen person. It is further added, That He prayed to God always: He prayed to the true God, not to idols; and he prayed to God always; that is, at every fitting season, and convenient opportunity for the duty. We are said in scripture to do a thing continually, when we do it seasonably. Thus to pray always, to pray evermore, to pray without ceasing, is first, to keep the heart continually, as much as may be in a praying frame and disposition: and, secondly, to embrace the proper seasons and opportunities for prayer. The beauty of religion lies much in the harmonious performance of the duties of it; when one duty doth not interfere with another, but we prudently find time for all. Thus did Cornelius here: He feared God with all his house, &c.

3. He saw in a vision, evidently, about the ninth hour of the day, an angel of God coming in to him, and saying unto him, Cornelius. 4 And when he looked on him, he was afraid, and said, What is it, Lord? And he said unto him, Thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a memorial before God.

*Observe here, 1. The extraordinary favour afforded to Cornelius; namely, the vision of an holy angel. This devout man did not seek the face of God in vain; God sends him first an angel to comfort him, then an apostle to instruct him: He saw in a vision an angel of God. 2. The effect which the sight of the angel had upon Cornelius; He was afraid. Learn hence, That whilst our souls inhabit these mortal and sinful bodies, the appearance of angels is terrible and frightful to them, and cannot be otherwise; partly upon a natural, and partly upon a moral account: Upon a natural account, because the dread of spirits strikes our natural spirits, they shrink and tremble at the approach of spirits; spirits of men and beasts quake at it; witness the ass, Numb. xxii. 25. that Balaam rode upon: And also upon a moral account, because of our consciousness of guilt; wherever there is guilt, there will be fear on an extraordinary appearance of God to us, though it be not mediated by an angel. 3. The joyful message which the angel brings to Cornelius; that his prayers and his alms were come up for a memorial before God. Learn, That as God records all the prayers of his people, so he books all the acts of mercy which any of them at any time do exercise and shew unto his members; he takes notice of the person, of the action, of the time when, of the manner how, of the measure and degree, how much; if it be a cup of water, yea, a cup of cold water, given in love to Christ in his members, it shall not be forgotten, but recorded and rewarded.*

5 And now send men to Joppa, and call for one Simon whose surname is Peter: 6 He lodgeth with one Simon a tanner, whose house is by the sea-side: he shall tell thee what thou oughtest to do.

Note here, 1. That although God sent an angel to Cornelius, to acquaint him with his will; yet the angel was to direct him to the apostle, who was to instruct him in the faith. This, no doubt, God did, to put honour upon the ministers and ministry of the gospel; as also to let us understand and know, that we are not to expect extraordinary ways of teaching, when God affords us the use of ordinary means. Send to Joppa, and call for Peter, he shall tell thee what thou oughtest to do. 2. What an exact knowledge Almighty God has of particular persons, and particular places; he tells Cornelius, by the angel in what town Peter was in Joppa; in whose house he lodged, in Simon the tanner's; in what part of the town the house stood, by the sea-side. It is matter of consolation, yea, of great consolation to the people of God, to know and remember that God knows them: He knows their persons, their purposes, their performances, their places of abode; he knows who they are, what they do, and where they dwell. So dear are the holy servants of God unto him, that he loves the very street in which they lodge, the house in which they dwell, the walls of their habitation are continually before him, and he delights perpetually to look upon them: O let holiness to the Lord be writ in legible characters upon the walls of our houses; Zech. xiv. 20. Then will God dwell where we dwell, and the beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by him.

7 And when the angel which spake unto Cornelius was departed, he called two of his household servants, and a devout soldier of them that waited on him continually. 8 And when he had declared all these things unto them, he sent them to Joppa. 9 ¶ On the morrow as they went on their journey, and drew nigh unto the city, Peter went up upon the house-top to pray, about the sixth hour. 10 and he became very hungry, and would have eaten: but while they made ready, he fell into a trance, 11 And saw heaven opened, and a certain vessel descending unto him, as it had been a great sheet, knit at the four corners, and let down to the earth: 12 Wherein were all manner of four footed beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air. 13 And there came a voice to him, Rise, Peter; kill, and eat. 14 But Peter said, Not so, Lord: for I have never eaten any thing that is common or unclean. 15 And the voice spake unto him again the second time, What God hath cleansed, that call thou not common, 16 This was done thrice: and the vessel was received up again into heaven.

Observe here, That as Cornelius had a vision from God to encourage him to send for Peter, so the apostle had likewise a vision to encourage him to go to Cornelius. In which, note, (1.) The time when he had this vision, it was at the sixth hour; or high noon; which was one of the three hours of prayer: When we are upon our knees in prayer, then is the time for receiving gracious manifestations from God. (2.) The place where he had this vision; when at prayer upon the house-top. The Jewish houses being flat roofed; with battlements on them, he went up to the house top to pray, as a place of privacy and retirement, free from noise and distraction; as also to take advantage of the place for divine contemplation, and perhaps to look towards the temple; which was formerly a type of Christ. It teaches us, that sitting places, as well as sitting seasons for prayer are to be sought out and improved by us: Peter went up upon the house top to pray. (3.) The frame wherein St. Peter was as to his body, when he had this vision; namely, exceedingly hungry: God ordered it so to fit him the more for this dish of dainty meat. O taste and see how gracious the Lord is in sending down a dish of dainties from heaven to his hungry children, that are pressing to him here on earth! (4.) The manner how the vision was made to St. Peter: It was in the way of a divine rapture or ecstasy; he fell into a trance; his soul was as it were abstracted out of the body, and absent from it; that is, drawn off from the perception of all earthly and sensible objects, and enabled unto a more entire attendance upon spiritual and heavenly manners and mysteries: I be sure it made him forget his dinner, and filled him with divine consolation; a soul fed and filled with divine dainties doth sometimes forget bodily hunger: We read no more of St. Peter's sharp hunger after this divine entertainment. 5. The vision itself, or what was represented to St. Peter first to his eye, then to his ear: To his eye first, He saw heaven opened, ver. 11. Teaching, that although heaven had been shut to the children of men by the sin of the first Adam, yet now it was opened by the grace of the second Adam to all believers, both Jews and Gentiles. Next, he saw a great vessel descending like a large sheet, with all sorts of meats in it, both clean and unclean; and he hears a voice from God, giving him a commission, though he was a Jew, to feed freely without distinction of clean and unclean; signifying to him thereby, that he might indifferently converse with Gentiles as well as Jews, and preach the gospel to the one as well as the other. Note, lastly, How St. Peter's Jewish principles made him startle at this large commission, looking upon the command as unlawful and impious, verse 14. Not so, Lord: for I have never eaten any thing that is common or unclean. But mark the divine correction: What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common. His mistake was rectified by God, who gave him by this vision a clear intimation, that the distinction of meats was now taken away, and the difference between nation and nation was now taken away by the death of Christ; and consequently, that he might go and preach the gospel to Cornelius, a Gentile, without scruple or doubtfulness; the partition wall betwixt Jew and Gentile being now broken down. Learn hence, That the doctrine of the conversion of the Gentiles came first from heaven, was revealed and made known by God himself, who has graciously declared, Gal. iii. 28. That there is neither Jew nor Greek; neither bond nor free, neither male nor female. For we are all one in Christ Jesus. Thanks be to God, that the blessing of Abraham is come upon us, through Jesus Christ.

17 Now while Peter doubted in himself what this vision which he had seen should mean, behold, the men which were sent from Cornelius had made inquiry for Simon's house, and stood before the gate, 18 And called, and asked whether Simon which was surnamed Peter lodged there. 19 While Peter thought on the vision, the Spirit said unto him, Behold three men seek thee. 20 Arise therefore, and get thee down, and go with them, doubting nothing: for I have sent them.

Here note, 1. How St. Peter sets himself to meditate upon what he had seen and heard from God; He pondered with himself what this vision, which he had seen, should mean. Whatever passes from God to man, either by the eye, or through the ear, ought to be subject of our deepest meditation. We are to contemplate the excellencies and perfections which are in the word and works of God with an intellectual eye; and to dwell upon them in our serious thoughts. 2. The care which the holy Spirit took to resolve satisfactorily the inward doubtings and reasonings of St. Peter's mind concerning this matter: I have sent them says the holy Spirit, therefore arise and go down, nothing doubting. Where observe, Both the divinity and personality of the Holy Ghost: He that knows the thoughts, the doubting and reasonings of man's heart, as the Holy Ghost here did St. Peter's, is truly and really God; and he that commands or forbids, is really a person. So doth the holy Spirit here; he commands St. Peter to go to Cornelius, and forbids his doubting of the lawfulness or success of his journey; Go with them, doubting nothing, &c.

21 Then Peter went down to the men which were sent unto him from Cornelius: and said, behold, I am he whom ye seek: what is the cause wherefore ye are come? 22 And they said, Cornelius the centurion, a just man, and one that feareth God, and of good report among all the nation of the Jews, was warned from God by an holy angel to send for thee into his house, and to hear words of thee. 23 Then called he them in, and lodged them. And on the morrow Peter went away with them, and certain brethren from Joppa accompanied him. 24 And the morrow after they entered into Cesaria. And Cornelius waited for them, and had called together his kinsman and near friends. 25 And as Peter was coming in, Cornelius met him, and fell down at his feet, and worshipped him. 26 But Peter took him up, saying, stand up: I myself also am a man. 27 And as he talked with him, he went in, and found many that were come together. 28 And he said unto them, ye know how that it is an unlawful thing for a man that is a Jew, to keep company with, or come unto one of another nation: but God hath shewed me that I should not call any man common or unclean. 29 Therefore came I unto you without gainfaying, as soon as I was sent for. I ask therefore for what intent ye have sent for me?

Note here, 1. The messengers whom Cornelius sent to St. Peter, two of his household servants, and a devout soldier. All soldiers are not rude; but some are religious. Behold a devout soldier under a devout captain, and two household servant's whom their Master's example had rendered humble and modest. 2. The just and laudable, not false and flattering character, which they gave of their Master Cornelius; That he was a just man, one that feared God; and one of good report among all the nations of the Jews. It is both the duty and the commendation of servants, to give to their Master's due honour; and, when called to it, their deserved character. 3. How St. Peter's doubts being resolved, he disputes no farther, delays no longer, but hastens immediately to Cornelius: When once God's command is plain, we must not dispute, but dispatch; we must no longer object, but obey. 4. The reverence given by Cornelius to Peter; he fell down at his feet and worshipped him. It seems to be more than a civil reverence which he gave him: It looks as if Cornelius took him for an angel in human shape, or a person sent immediately from heaven to him; and accordingly he prostrates himself before the apostle: But St. Peter would by no means receive any undue honour or respect from him, assuring him that he was but a man, and God's messenger sent unto him. Whatever St. Peter's pretended successor challenges as his due, of reverence and homage, St. Peter himself would not suffer Cornelius to lie at his feet, much less to kiss his feet: The ambassador would not run away with the honour which belonged to the prince that sent him. 5. How St. Peter acquaints Cornelius, that that partition wall betwixt the Jews and Gentiles, which was erected and set up by God's command, was now by the same authority pulled down and removed; and that no man is now unclean by any ceremonial uncleanness, because he is not circumcised; and consequently, that Cornelius though of another nation, might converse with and be conversed with as freely as if born a Jew. Since the coming of Christ, no person or nation is legally or ceremonially unclean; but every nation, or every person, by nature, morally unclean.

30 And Cornelius said, Four days ago I was fasting until this hour, and at the ninth hour I prayed in my house: and behold, a man stood before me in bright clothing, 31. And said, Cornelius, thy prayer is heard, and thine alms are had in remembrance in the sight of God. 32 Send therefore to Joppa, and call hither Simon whose surname is Peter. He is lodged in the house of one Simon a tanner, by the sea-side; who when he cometh, shall speak unto thee. 33 Immediately therefore I sent to thee; and thou hast well done that thou hast come. Now therefore are we all here present before God, to hear all things that are commanded thee of God.

Note here, 1. Cornelius relates the occasion of his sending for St. Peter, and the warrant which he had for so doing: He declares that as he was fasting and praying in his family, he had a vision, in which an angel directed him to send for the apostle. Where note, That Cornelius doth not talk of his fasting, praying, and alms giving, by way of ostentation, to boast of himself, but only to give satisfaction to St. Peter, that he had certain advice from heaven for what he did in sending for him. 2. The readiness of Cornelius's obedience in sending for St. Peter; Immediately therefore I sent to thee. Joppa from Cefaria is computed to be about forty miles; but no sooner did Cornelius receive the commandment, but without delay he put it in execution, and sent men to Joppa. When our call is clear, our obedience must be speedy. 3. The kind reception which Cornelius gives St. Peter; thou hast well done that thou art come; He doth not only approve of the apostle's coming, but thanks him for it. 4. The preparation and readiness of Cornelius and his friends, to hear and receive the word of God from St. Peter's mouth: We are all here present before God, to hear all things that are commanded thee of God. Where note, 1. He desires the same holy doctrine which the apostle came to preach, may be delivered to his family, his friends, and his kinsfolk, as well as himself. A good man would not go to heaven alone; but is desirous of the instruction, conversion, and salvation of others, as well as of himself: We are all here. 2. The place of God's pure worship is the place of his special presence: We are all here present before God. 3. The end for which they were now come into the presence of God; it was to hear what God should speak, yea, to hear all things which God should command the apostle to speak: Intimating to us, that as St. Peter himself was, so all the ministers of Christ are, confined within their commission, and must only speak what God commands; neither are hearers bound to receive any thing else. Wo unto us, if when God sends us of his errand, we will tell our own tale: The word is the counsel of God; now it is the counsel of God only, and the whole counsel of God also, that we are to declare, and our people are to hear; We are all present before God, to hear all things, &c.

34 ¶ Then Peter opened his mouth, and said, of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons: 35 But in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him.

As if the apostle had said, "I now very plainly perceive that the partition wall is broken down, and that national prerogatives, or personal excellencies, find no acceptance with God; But that any man, be he of what nation or family soever, if he feareth God and worketh righteousness, shall find acceptance with him." Note here, 1. That no external qualifications, personal privileges and prerogatives, will procure favour and acceptance with God, who neither receives nor rejects men barely for outward respects: I perceive that God is no respecter of persons. 2. The true character of a religious man; he is one that feareth God and worketh righteousness; that is, a strict observer of the duties of both tables, of piety towards God, and of justice and charity towards man; and the phrase of working righteousness, implies diligence, and delight, and perseverance in the ways and works of righteousness. 3. The privilege of such a religious and truly righteous man; He is accepted with God. Thence learn, That both the person fearing God, and his works of righteousness are accepted with him, of any nation under heaven, of any calling, sex or condition whatsoever: In every nation, he that, &c.

36 The word which God sent unto the children of Israel, preaching peace by Jesus Christ: He is Lord of all: 37 That word, I say, ye know, which was published throughout all Judea, and began from Galilee, after the baptism which John preached; 38 How God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost, and with power: who went about doing good and healing all that were oppressed of the devil: for God was with him. 39 And we are witnesses of all things which he did both in the land of the Jews and in Jerusalem: whom they slew, and hanged on a tree: 40 Him hath God raised up the third day, and shewed him openly; 41 Not to all the people, but to witnesses chosen before of God, even to us who did eat and drink with him after he rose from the dead. 42 And he commanded us to preach unto the people and to testify that it is he which was ordained of God to be the judge of quick and dead, 43 To him give all the prophets witness, that through his name whatsoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins:

Observe here, 1. The antiquity of the gospel, or of the doctrine of reconciliation by Jesus Christ; it was preached to the patriarchs, and by the prophets to the ancient Israelites; The word which God sent to the children of Israel, preaching peace by Jesus Christ. Thence learn, That there is but one way to salvation, namely, reconciliation with God through the blood of Christ: and this was declared to the children of Israel, as well as unto us; to them more darkly, to us more clearly, They went to heaven then the same way that believers do now, namely, by faith in the Lamb of God, who was to be slain; we by faith in him as already slain. 2. The dignifying title given to Christ: He is Lord of all. (1.) He is Lord of all, as God together with the Father and the Holy Ghost: The absolute and supreme Lord of the whole creation, and unto whom all creatures are subject. (2.) He is Lord of all, as Mediator; Lord of all men, whether Jews or Gentiles: He is Lord of his church, Lord over saints and sinners. Hypocrites and sincere christians, all are his subjects by obligation, some by voluntary consent, and by an absolute obedience unto his commands. 3. The argument by which the apostle proveth Christ to be Lord of all: As Mediator, namely, from his divine unction, ver. 38. How God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost, and with power; that is, endued the human nature of Christ with with the fulness of the graces of his holy Spirit, and consecrated him to the work and office of a Mediator. 4. How Christ faithfully executed this office which he was anointed to: He went about doing good, all the time he was on earth, healing diseases, and casting out devils: for God was with him, in the fulness of his Deity, as he was his eternal Son: and in power, grace, and favour, as he was man and Mediator. Here note, 1. The great work and business of our Saviour's life; it was to do good, namely, to the souls and bodies of men, to promote the temporal happiness of the one, the spiritual and eternal happiness of the other. 2. Our Saviour's diligence and indefatigable industry in this work of doing good; he made it the great business and constant employment of his life: He went about doing good: that is, seeking out all opportunities of being useful and beneficial to all mankind. 3. The evidence and testimony which the apostle produces for all that he affirmed concerning Christ: We are witnesses of all things which he did in the land of Judea and in Jerusalem. Christ took the twelve apostles as it were into his family, that by their familiar converse, and constant conversation with him; they might be enabled to testify of him: (1.) Touching his death that he was slain and hanged on a tree; dying an ignominious and shameful, as well as a dolorous and painful death. (2.) Concerning his resurrection, that God raised him from the dead; though he was laid yet he was not lost in the dust: God would not suffer the Beloved of his soul to rot in a grave, but raised him up, and shewed him openly. And, (3.) As to the final judgment, the apostles were commanded to preach and testify to the people, that Jesus Christ was ordained of God to be the Judge both of quick and dead; that is, of all that are in their graves, and of all that shall be found alive at his coming.

44 ¶ While Peter yet spake these words, the Holy Ghost, fell on all them which heard the word. 45 And they of the circumcision which believed were astonished, as many as came with Peter, because that on the Gentiles also, was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost. 46 For they heard them speak with tongues, and magnify God. Then answered Peter, 47 Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, which have received the Holy Ghost, as well as we? 48 And he commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord Then prayed they him to tarry certain days.

Observe here, 1. What a miraculous power of the Holy Ghost did accompany St. Peter's ministry at this time, thereby giving him assurance of the future conversion of the Gentiles to the great wonder and astonishment of the Jews, who thought the promise of sending down the Holy Ghost belonging to the house of Israel. Accordingly, while Peter was thus preaching to Cornelius and his friends the Holy Ghost, by his wonderful gift of tongues, descended on them, though Gentiles; at which the Jews marvelled. 2. The conclusion which the apostle draws from this forasmuch as the Gentiles were baptized with the Holy Ghost, he infers, that they ought to be baptized with water; and the argument runs thus: "They that have the grace signified by, and promised in baptism, have an undoubted right to baptism, the seal of the promise; but these Gentiles have the grace signified by and promised in baptism; they have the inward part, or thing signified; why then should the outward sign be denied them? He that has the inheritance, may claim the writings, the seals, &c, belonging to the inheritance. 3. The apostle without scruple baptized those Gentile converts; Then commanded he them to be baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus: That is, he either baptized them himself, or gave commandment to others to do it; and though only the name of the Lord Jesus be mentioned, yet this does not imply, but that they were baptized according to our Saviour's prescription, Matt. xxviii. In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. This done, they desired him to stay some days with them, that they might be farther instructed, confirmed, and comforted by his ministry.

C H A P. XI.

This chapter gives us an account how the promise of Jews and Gentiles becoming one flock, and enrolled in one church, received its accomplishment: This was performed by the ministry of St. Peter who was the first that opened the door of faith to the Gentiles.

AND the apostles and brethren that were in Judea heard that the Gentiles had also received the word of God. 2 And when Peter was come up to Jerusalem, they that were of the circumcision contended with him, 3 Saying, Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and didst eat with them.

Observe here, 1. How the Jews apprehending that Christ and his grace had been only promised and confined to themselves, the call and conversion of the Gentiles became a dreadful stumbling-block unto them, even to the believing as well as the unbelieving Jews. Hereupon note, 2. How they contended with Peter for eating and conversing with the Gentiles, and especially for admitting them into the gospel-communion without circumcision: Whereas, although God forbid marriages with the Gentiles, he never forbid commerce and conversation with them: No conversation with the Gentiles, in order to the gaining of the Gentiles unto God, was never forbidden by God; but only such as might withdraw the Jews from God, and corrupt them by idolatry.

4 But Peter rehearsed the matter from beginning, and expounded it by order unto them, saying, 5 ¶ I was in the city of Joppa, praying: and in a trance I saw a vision, a certain vessel descend, as it had been a great sheet, let down from heaven by four corners; and it came even to me, 6 Upon the which when I had fastened mine eyes, I considered and saw four-footed beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air. 7 And I heard a voice saying unto me, Arise, Peter, slay, and eat. 8 But I said, Not so, Lord: for nothing common or unclean hath at any time entered into my mouth. 9 But the voice answered me again from heaven, What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common. 10 And this was done three times: and all was drawn up again into heaven, 11 And behold, immediately there were three men already come into the house where I was, sent from Cesarea unto me. 12 And the Spirit made me go with them, nothing doubting, Moreover, these six brethren accompanied me, and we entered into the man's house: 13 And he shewed us how he had seen an angel in his house, which stood and said unto him, Send men to Joppa, and call for Simon, whose surname is Peter; 14 Who shall tell thee words whereby thou and all thy house shall be saved. 15 And as I began to speak, the Holy Ghost fell on them as on us at the beginning. 16 Then remembered I the word of the Lord, how that he had said John indeed baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost. 17 Forasmuch then as God gave them the like gift as he did unto us, who believed on the Lord Jesus Christ, what was I that I could withstand God? 18 ¶ When they heard these things, they held their peace and glorified God, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life.

Observe here, 1. How far St. Peter was from pretending to a superiority over the rest of the apostles; he did by no means think himself so far above them, as to disdain sincerity and humility, rehearsed and related the whole matter of fact, to their entire and joint satisfaction. 2. How he acquaints the apostles with the vision he had seen, in which he was commanded to make no distinction of clean and unclean: Because there was no natural turpitude in any kind of meat, save only as it was prohibited by God; and that God, who having made the law about difference of meat, had now abrogated it, and made all meats clean, and free to be eaten. 3. How he gives them the interpretation of this vision, and acquaints them with the end for which this vision was designed; namely, not so much to reveal to him the lawfulness of eating all sorts of meat's as to acquaint him with his liberty and duty to converse with and preach the gospel to the Gentiles, whom he was no longer to look upon as unclean, though they were not circumcised; but as heirs and fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God. Lastly, The conclusion which St. Peter drew from the premises: "Seeing God hath made the Gentiles equal in grace with the believing Jews; seeing the Holy Ghost came down upon them in the same manner, and with the same effects as he did upon us apostles, I could not reasonably deny them baptism, and by baptism admission into the gospel-church; for having the grace signified by baptism, they ought to have baptism, the seal of that grace; they that have the inward, are not to be denied the outward baptism; and they that were baptized with the Holy Ghost (as Cornelius and his family were) might and ought to be baptized with water, as Cornelius was; for had I denied them church-communion for want of the ceremony of circumcision, it had certainly been a downright resistance of, and disobedience against God. Thence learn, That it is a downright opposition to the will of God, to shut them out of the church, and to debar them from the communion of it, who have received the sanctifying graces of God's Holy Spirit; but differ from us in external rites and ceremonies only.

19 ¶ Now they which were scattered abroad upon the persecution that arose about Stephen, travelled as far as Phenice, and Cyprus, and Antioch, preaching the word to none but unto the Jews only. 20 And some of them were men of Cyprus and Cyrene, which when they were come to Antioch, spake unto the Grecians, preaching the Lord Jesus. 21 And the hand of the Lord was with them: and a great number believed, and turned unto the Lord. 22 ¶ Then tidings of these things came unto the ears of the Church which was in Jerusalem: and they sent forth Barnabas, that he should go as far as Antioch. 23 Who, when he came, and had seen the grace of God, was glad, and exhorted them all, that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord. 24 For he was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost, and of faith: and much people was added unto the Lord.

Observe here, 1. That Antioch becomes the Jerusalem of the Gentile Christians: That is, the chief place whither the Gentile converts resorted; as Jerusalem, before the dispersion by persecution, was resorted to by the Jews, and made the principal seat of their residence. 2. How God over-ruled the persecution and dispersion occasioned by St. Stephen's death, for disseminating and scattering the gospel as far as Antioch, verse 19. They which were scattered abroad, &c. Thus has the blood of the martyrs all along been the seed of the church, and what the devil and his instruments have designed for the extirpation, God has constantly over-ruled for the propagation of the gospel. 3. The great success which the ministers and ministry of the gospel had at Antioch: The hand of the Lord was with them and a great number believed. By the hand of the Lord, is meant the power and assistance of the Lord, which did accompany them in dispensing of his word, and enable them to work miracles for the confirmation of it. The hand is the organ or instrument of working in man. When it is attributed to God, it denotes his power and help: The hand of God was manifested in the miracle which they wrought, and in faith and conversion, which the sight of those miracles produced. Learn hence, That faith and conversion are wrought by the hand of the Lord; they are his his work: Study and endeavour is the minister's, the blessing and success is God's; when he takes the sword of the Spirit into the hand of the Spirit, then shall it work wonders. 4. How the joyful tidings of the success of the gospel at Antioch, being heard and understood by the apostles that remained at Jerusalem, they sent Barnabas to confirm the new converts at Antioch in the Christian faith.—Learn thence, That the news of any sinner's, much more of many sinners, conversion unto God, by the preaching of the gospel, is matter of great delight and rejoicing to the ministers of Christ. 5. The holy and honorable character which the Spirit of God gives of Barnabas; he was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost, and of faith; and much people were added unto the Lord. By a good man, is meant a kind and charitable man; he having actually sold his estate, and laid it at the apostles' feet, for the benefit of the poor, as Acts iv. 36, 37. informs us; and his good works accompanying his good preaching, his good life seconding his sound doctrine, was a great mean of the conversion of so many, and that much people were added to the Lord. Lastly, the holy exhortation which Barnabas gave these new converts at Antioch; He exhorted them, that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord: That is, with a firm and fixed resolution of will to keep close to the profession of the truth of Christ, whatever tribulation or distress they might meet with. Young converts need exhortation and counsel, to establish and confirm them in the faith of the gospel, and to encourage them to hold fast to Christ.

25 Then departed Barnabas to Tarsus, for to seek Saul: 26 And when he had found him, he brought him unto Antioch. And it came to pass, that a whole year they assembled themselves with the church, and taught much people. And the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch.

Note here, A further instance of the piety of that good man. Barnabas having a great zeal and fervent desire that the gospel might be more and more propagated, he went to Tarsus to seek out Saul, that they might join together in the work of Christ: and having found him, he brought him to Antioch; where for a whole year they instructed the church in that city, and taught much people: O how happy is it for the church of Christ, when her ministers, laying aside all private interest, do unitedly apply themselves to promote the common interest of christianity, by propagating the gospel far and near! Farther, How the believers both Jews and Gentiles, were united in one common name at Antioch. The Jews had hitherto called them Nazarites and Galileans, and they called themselves disciples, believers, brethren, and these of the church; but now in this place, Antioch, they were first called Christians: A very great honor conferred upon this Gentile city, which exalted her now above Jerusalem itself. At Antioch, a Gentile city; Christ set up his standard for the Gentiles, and displayed his banner, and puts his own name upon the despised Gentiles. They who before were counted dogs, and the off-scouring of all things, have now the venerable name of Christ imposed on them. Lastly, The disciples did not call themselves christians first at Antioch, much less did their enemies give them that name; but they had it by divine authority imposed upon them: God would have Christ's disciples called Christians, (1.) As scholars, who receive their denomination from their master, they are taught to learn of and imitate Christ, whose name they bear. (2.) As the word Christians signifies anointed ones, it puts them in mind of their divine unction, which they have received from the Holy One, whereby they are made kings and priests unto God. We are at this day called reformed Christians. God grant that we may not cheat ourselves with an empty and insignificant name; but let us fill up that glorious title, and be reformed in our lives, as well as in our religion; beautifying our holy profession by an holy and becoming conversation; otherwise an unbaptized heathen, at the great day, will not change estates with many baptized Christians.

27 ¶ And in these days came prophets from Jerusalem unto Antioch. 28 And there stood up one of them named Agabus, and signified by the Spirit, that there should be great dearth throughout all the world: which came to pass in the days of Claudius Cæsar. 29 Then the disciples, every man according to his ability, determined to send relief unto the brethren which dwelt in Judea: 30 Which also they did, and sent it to the elders by the hands of Barnabas and Saul.

Note here, 1. That the wisdom of God, at the first planting of the Christian church, did confer upon some of its members extraordinary gifts; as the gift of tongues, the gift of miracles, the gift of prophecy, and the like. Accordingly, at this time, certain persons who had the gift of prophecy, and did foretell things to come, being now at Antioch, by revelation from the Spirit of God, foretold that there would shortly be a great famine over all Judea, and several other parts of the world; which exactly came to pass in the reign of the emperor Claudius. Where observe, That as it is God's prerogative to foreknow future things, so it is his prerogative to enable others to foretell future things. This famine was here foretold, not by judicial astrology, but by divine revelation: That God, who provided for the patriarchs, by means of Joseph's foreseeing the famine in Egypt, provided now for the Christians, by Agabus's foretelling the famine which came upon Judea. Agabus set up and signified by the Spirit, &c. As God's omnipotence is exerted for his church's protection, so is his omniscience employed for its sustentation and preservation: Yea, all his attributes are engaged for her benefit and advantage. 2. The full proof and evidence which the new converts at Antioch gave of the truth of their conversion to the christian religion: Namely, their charity and alms seasonably sent to the succour and relief of their fellow-members in Christ, which were in Judea. These were become very poor, by reason of the extraordinary malice, and long persecution of the Jews against them. And the seasonable succour now sent them from Antioch, was a singular comfort to them, and a sweet-smelling sacrifice unto God. Lastly, The wise regulation of their charity, every man gave according to his ability. This is the true standard of charity: We are to give plus of such things as we have, and according to what we have. Christian prudence must direct us in the exercise of christian charity: that must direct us in finding out fit and proper objects for our charity, that we may give most to them that have most need. Prudence must also direct us in timing of our charity, that we do not put our poor brethren off with frivolous excuses and tedious delays. And it must direct us in the measure of our charity, that it doth not exceed the bounds of our estates. Few indeed are guilty of crying on that hand; but it is possible there may be an error in the excess, as well as in the defect of our christian charity. To prevent both evils, let the practice of these primitive christians be a pattern for our imitation: Who determined every one, &c.

CHAP. XII.

St. Luke having related what success the apostles had at Antioch; he now returns to Judea, and declares what persecution the church met with at Jerusalem: Where St. James was beheaded, and St. Peter imprisoned, as this chapter informs us.

NOW about that time, Herod the king stretched forth his hands to vex certain of the Church:

Note here, 1. Satan, the grand enemy of the church of God, never wants instruments for carrying on his persecuting designs against the church; he had many Pharaohs in the Old Testament times, bitter oppressors of the Jewish church; and several Herods under the New Testament; as Herod Antipas, and Herod Agrippa, who were very warm in the worst work: namely, that of persecution. Herod stretched forth his hand to vex certain of the church: that is, to kill some, and to imprison others. Satan's bloodhounds have such an insatiable thirst after the blood of the saints, that they can never be satiated with it. A tyrannical persecutor is like an hydropic person, the more he drinks, the more he thirsts.

2 And he killed James the brother of John with the sword. 3 And because he saw it pleased the Jews, he proceeded further to take Peter also. (Then were the days of unleavened bread.)

Note here, 1. The person slain by the sword of Herod, James the brother of John. We read in the gospel that he was one of the sons of Zebedee, that desired of Christ the pre-eminence to sit at his right hand in his kingdom; and now he is the first of the apostles that suffered martyrdom, who drank of Christ's cup, and baptized with his baptism. He was called Boanerges, or a son of thunder, for his zealous and earnest preaching: No wonder then that Herod and the enraged Jews hated him, and were stirred up by Satan to destroy him. For such as are most useful to, and most eminent in the church, are always the objects of Satan's wrath and anger, and of the persecutor's rage and fury: He killed James the brother of John with the sword. 2. James being slain, Peter is to follow; He proceeded farther to take Peter also. The rage of persecutors is not easily satisfied, and the blood which they shed, is but oil to feed the flames of their revenge. But mark the overruling power and goodness of God, though St. James was murdered, St. Peter shall be but imprisoned; The husbandman doth not commit all his corn to the oven, but saves some for seed. Persecutors cannot do all the mischief they would, and they shall not do all they can.

4 And when he had apprehended him, he put him in prison, and delivered him to four quaternions of soldiers to keep him; intending after Easter to bring him forth to the people.

Peter being imprisoned, observe, What an excess of care and caution Herod takes for securing his prisoner: Sixteen soldiers are set to guard him; four at a time, and to take their turns at the four watches of the night, to relieve one another. Thence learn, That the enemies of the church make the surest work they can, when at any time God permits his servants to fall into any of their hands. Thus they dealt with the Head, when they had apprehended him. The watch word was, Hold him fast, Matt. xxvi. 48. When they crucified him, they nailed him fast to his cross: when they buried him, they made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, and setting a watch; and thus they deal with the members: St. Peter has guard upon guard set over him, some soldiers chained to him, and others always standing at the door to observe him. But all this care, concern, and caution to secure the prisoner, did illustrate the glory of the miracle in his wonderful deliverance.

5 Peter therefore was kept in prison; but prayer was made without ceasing of the Church unto God for him.

That is, fervent and importunate prayer was put up to God by the church on Peter's behalf: With the united strength of their whole souls they stormed heaven, and took him by force out of Herod's hand. Learn, 1. That when the church is plunged into deep perplexities, the only help she can hope for must come unto her in the way of prayer. 2. That when God suffers any of the ministers of the church to fall under the rage of persecutors, it is the church's duty to wrestle with God by prayer in an extraordinary manner on their behalf: Prayer was made without ceasing of the church. 3. That when God intends to bestow any extraordinary mercy upon his church, he stirs up the hearts of his people to pray for it in a very extraordinary manner.

6 And when Herod would have brought him forth, the same night Peter was sleeping between two soldiers, bound with two chains; and the keepers before the door kept the prison.

Note, Peter continued in prison till the very night before Herod intended to bring him out to the people: And if they desired it, it is probable he intended to put him to death the next day. Learn thence, That God oft-times suffers his children to come to the pit's brink, and then delivers them, that they may be the more sensible of his mercy, and have the greater cause to magnify his power. Peter was now come to his last night: the tyrant Herod probably probably intended his execution the next morning. Now was the time for God to step in: Our extremity is his opportunity. Farther, That notwithstanding Peter's imminent and impending danger, he sleeps very soundly, resigning up himself into the hands of Christ, and resolving, if he may no longer live Christ's servant, that he will die his sacrifice. I question whether Herod that imprisoned him slept half so soundly. Lord! how soft and secure a pillow is a good conscience, even in the confines of death, and in the very jaws of danger! Lastly, God takes most care of Peter, when he was least able to take care of himself: When he was asleep, and altogether insensible of his danger, God was awake, and acting effectually in order to his deliverance. Happy prisoners! who have God with them in prison: Such are prisoners of hope indeed, and shall certainly experience divine help.

7 And behold, the angel of the Lord came upon him, and a light shined in the prison; and he smote Peter on the side, and raised him up, saying, Arise up quickly. And his chains fell off from his hands. 8 And the angel said unto him, Gird thyself, and bind on thy sandals: and so he did! And he saith unto him, Cast thy garment about thee, and follow me. 9 And he went out and followed him, and wist not that it was true which was done by the angel; but thought he saw a vision. 10 When they were past the first and second ward, they came unto the iron gate that leadeth into the city; which opened to them of his own accord: and they went out, and passed on through one street: and forthwith the angel departed from him.

Note here, 1. That God hath sometimes made use of the ministry of angels to effect deliverance of his people. 2. The several good offices which the angels now did for Peter, in order for his enlargement: Peter is asleep, the angel awakes him; he is laid, the angel raises him; he is amazed, the angel directs him; he is bound, the angel unties him; he knows not where he is, the angel goes before him, and guides him; he is to pass through many difficulties, the angel conducts him. Lord! How innumerable are the good offices, which at thy command the holy angels do for us, though they are not sensibly in this manner apprehended by us! What love and service do we owe to thee! What honour and respect should we pay to them, for their care over us, and attendance upon us! 3. Peter must rise, gird himself, bind on his sandals, cast his garment about him, follow the angel, and use his own endeavours in order to his own deliverance. God will have him use the means, even then when he was about to work a miracle for him. What a tempting of God is it then to neglect the means, when we cannot expect miracles! As to trust to means, is to neglect God; so to neglect the means, is to tempt God. We must always subserve the providence of God in the use of such means as his wisdom has appointed and directed us unto. Lastly, That this deliverance was so amazing and surprising, that Peter thought it a dream only, ver. 9. He wist not that it was true, but thought he saw a vision. Learn thence, That sometimes the deliverances of the godly from imminent and apparent dangers, are so very wonderful, and attended with such a croud of improbabilities, that they have much ado to believe them though they see them with their eyes. When God turned the captivity of Peter, he was like unto them that dream, Ps. cxxxvi. 1.

11 And when Peter was come to himself, he said, Now I know of a surety, that the Lord hath sent his angel, and hath delivered me out of the hand of Herod, and from all the expectation of the people of the Jews. 12 And when he had considered the thing, he came to the house of Mary the mother of John, whose surname was Mark; where many were gathered together, praying. 13 And as Peter knocked at the door of the gate, a damsel came to hearken, named Rhoda. 14 And when she knew Peter's voice, she opened not the gate for gladness, but ran in, and told how Peter stood before the gate. 15 And they said unto her, Thou art mad. But she constantly affirmed that it was even so. Then said they, It is his angel: 16 But Peter continued knocking: and when they had opened the door, and saw him, they were astonished. 17 But he beckoning unto them with the hand to hold their peace, declared unto them how the Lord had brought him out of the prison: And he said, Go shew these things unto James, and to the brethren. And he departed, and went into another place.

Observe here, 1. The wise and holy course which the church took for the apostle's enlargement, and that was keeping a day of prayer: A number of christians got together, and importune heaven; the enemies plot, the church prays; they shut the prison doors, the church opens heaven's doors, and God gives Peter in, as an answer of prayer, before they rose off from their knees. O how good is it to draw nigh to God! What a prayer-hearing God is our God! How great is the power and prevalency of the enjoined prayers of good men! God's praying people ever have been, and will be, a prevailing people. Whilst these pious souls were in the very act of calling upon God for Peter's release, God gives in Peter released to them. God never wants means for his people's deliverance, when he is once set on work by the prayers of his people. 2. St. Peter being delivered meditates whilst he was walking in the streets, and going along by himself, of the greatness of his danger, and the graciousness of his deliverance: Holy and suitable thoughts, pious meditations and ejaculations, do well become us in any place, at all times, and upon all occasions, but especially after signal deliverances from signal dangers. We can never enough ruminate on them or be sufficiently thankful for them. 3. The wisdom and goodness of the divine providence in directing Peter in the dead of the night, to the house where the saints were praying for him. This is the more remarkable, because the angel having done his work which God sent him upon, after he had delivered Peter, from his chains and imprisonment, he left him to shift for himself, and to take care of his own safety; but though an angel left him, yet the providence of God conducted him to a place where he was both safe and welcome. 4. What an ancient opinion it was, that every good man had a guardian angel appointed him by God, to take a special care of him to his life's end; to direct him in his way, to guard him from dangers, and to deliver him in his distresses: They say, It is his angel. For which saying there could be no reason, had there not been a current opinion among them of guardian-angels. Blessed be God, his holy angels are our keepers, our counsellors, our defenders, our loving and friendly associates; and they shall never depart from us, till they have safely conducted us to our heavenly father's house, where we shall be as the angels of God in heaven. 5. How Peter gives God, and not the angel, the glory of his deliverance. ver. 17. He declared how the Lord had brought him out of the prison. The angel was but the instrument, God was the principal agent, ver. 11. The Lord hath sent his angel, &c. All deliverances must be ascribed to him, who commands deliverances for his people. 6. The prudential care which St. Peter takes for his future preservation: He departed and went to another place. He could not think himself safe whilst Herod was so near, no more than a lamb could be safe near the lion's den. He knew he should be hunted for, therefore escapes for his life. And besides his own danger, he was not willing to endanger his friends, who did now entertain and harbour him: but both for his own and their preservation, he departs to another place. Learn, That a prudential use of all lawful means for our own, and others preservation, in subserviency to the divine providence, is our duty, our wisdom and interest, both as men and christians.

18 Now as soon as it was day, there was no small stir among the soldiers, what was become of Peter: 19 And when Herod had sought for him, and found him not, he examined the keepers, and commanded that they should be put to death. And he went down from Judea to Cesarea, and there abode.

Note here, 1. How wicked persecutors are mightily enraged, when their bloody purposes are disappointed. Herod having lost his prize, is so incensed, that he caused the keepers first to be examined (and possibly by tortures) and then to be put to death. 2. The justice of God, and the great injustice of Herod: It was just in God to suffer the soldiers, who were Herod's instruments in persecution, to die by the bloody hand of Herod, whose tools they were. Instruments in persecution God oft-times meets with in this world, and sometimes they fall by the hands of persecutors themselves: yet was it notorious injustice in Herod to put to death those innocent soldiers, who could not help what was done, and were no ways accessory to the prisoner's escape.

20. ¶ And Herod was highly displeased with them of Tyre and Sidon: but they came with one accord to him, and having made Blastus the king's chamberlain their friend, desired peace; because their country was nourished by the king's country.

Observe, Herod, upon St. Peter's escape out of his hands, leaves Jerusalem; and goes to dwell at Cesarea, where, being highly displeased with the rich citizens of Tyre and Sidon, he designs to make war upon them. But they being sensible that their cities lying upon the sea-coasts and having little land belonging to them, they must be beholden to Judea and Galilee, which were under Herod's jurisdiction, for a great part of their provisions; therefore they prudently compound the matter with him, knowing that to fight with him who fed them, was the ready way to be famished. And opening the breast of Blastus the king's chamberlain, with a golden key, through that passage they made their access to satisfy the king. Interest leads us to pay homage to them, whom our dependency is upon: Yet though men depend upon God for all which they do enjoy, (our country being nourished by the king of heaven's country;) yet how few by prayer do own their dependance upon him, or by praise and thanksgiving do acknowledge the hand that supplies them?

21 And upon a set day, Herod arrayed in royal apparel, sat upon his throne, and made an oration unto them. 22 And the people gave a shout, saying, It is the voice of a god, and not of a man. 23. And immediately the angel of the Lord smote him, because he gave not God the glory: and he was eaten of worms, and gave up the ghost.

Upon a set day, that is, as some suppose, on his own birth-day, he was arrayed in royal apparel, in a cloak made of cloth of silver, but dyed with St. James's blood, ver. 2. which being beaten upon by the sun-beams, did greatly dazzle the eyes of all spectators; he made an eloquent oration more gaudy than his apparel, unto the people, who cried out in approbation thereof, The voice of a God, and not of a man! Herod, instead of repelling this their impious flattery, embraces and hugs their praises, as proper to himself; and thereupon an angel, and worms, the best and the basest of creatures, meet in his punishment; the angel smiting him, and the worms eating him up: And no wonder that worms quickly devoured him, whom those flesh-flies had blown up before; no wonder that he is eaten up of worms, who forget that he was a worm! Quest. But why were not the people punished as well as the prince, seeing they were equally guilty of robbing God of his honour? True, Herod was the receiver, but they were the thieves; why then fell not the punishment on the whole multitude? Ans. Because more discretion is expected from a prince, than from the rabble: Besides, what in them was but a blasphemous compliment, was by his acceptance of it made a reality, and was usurped by him, and assumed to him as due to his deserts. From the whole, note, 1. That flattery, either given or taken, is a very dangerous sin, a God-provoking, and a wrath-procurring sin. If we flatter men, God will not flatter us, but deal plainly, yet severely, with us. One of the ancients said, he

he was afraid of praise and commendation as much as of a crack of thunder. When men give much glory to men it is very hard for men to give their glory back again to God. Herod was so pleased and tickled with the glory which the people gave him, that he could not part with it; but by keeping that, he lost his life. 2. That though God bears long with many sorts of sinners, yet not with sinners of this sort: Immediately the angel of the Lord smote him: Agreeably to that of Job, chap. xxxii. 22. I knew not how to give flattering titles, for in so doing my Maker would soon take me away. The great God will admit of no co-rivals; he will not suffer his glory to be given to another; he will be a swift witness against the flatterer, as well as against the false swearer, Malachi iii. 5. He can destroy both flatterer and flattered with the twinkling of an eye, or with the turning of a hand; and those that are cried up as gods to day, are as dung to-morrow.

24 ¶ But the word of God grew and multiplied.
25 And Barnabas and Saul returned from Jerusalem when they had fulfilled their ministry, and took with them John, whose surname was Mark.

Note, Herod the tyrant and persecutor being dead, the gospel prospered, and was preached up and down with great success. Persecutors, by their weak endeavours to pull down the church, do build it up the stronger. The church in Egypt never grew so high, as when Pharaoh laboured most to keep it low; the more he molested them, the more he multiplied them. Thus here, after Herod's death, and Peter's deliverance, the word of God grew and multiplied; that is, the number of believers increased through the preaching of the word, as seed is multiplied by the scattering of the hand; the word preached is the seed sown in the furrows of the field: The ground was now harrowed by the hand of the persecutors, and the seed grew the better, and the fruits of faith and obedience did by every shower of persecution more and more abound. The truth of God may for a time be oppressed, but it shall never be finally and finally suppressed; still the word of God grew and multiplied.

CHAP. XIII:

St. Luke having given us an account how the Christian church was first planted among the Jews by St. Peter's ministry, in the twelve first chapters, now applies his pen in declaring how the gospel was planted and propagated amongst the Gentiles by St. Paul's ministry to the end of the book.

NOW there were in the Church that was at Antioch, certain prophets and teachers; as Barnabas, and Simeon that was called Niger, and Lucius of Cyrenè, and Manaen, which had been brought up with Herod the tetrarch, and Saul.

Note here, That the city of Antioch being the first Gentile city which entertained the gospel, there were at that time several prophets and teachers in that city to instruct the people, and to lay the foundation of a christian church amongst them; And amongst others, there was found one very eminent person named Manazem, who was of that high rank and quality, that he was brought up with Herod at court; and as the learned Lightfoot thinks, was converted there by the preaching of St. John the Baptist: Yet this man contemning with Moses the pleasures of the court, did think it no disparagement to him to be a teacher at Antioch. Learn thence, That God is pleased to manifest the freeness of his grace, in effectually calling some of all sorts and ranks of men, to the knowledge and obedience of the gospel, and to a participation of the benefit offered in and by the Lord Jesus Christ.

2 As they ministered to the Lord, and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul, for the work whereunto I have called them. 3 And when they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, they sent them away.

Observe here, How the Holy Ghost takes occasion, when the teachers of the church at Antioch were assembled together in God's presence, and about his work, to give them particular instructions and directions concerning his will and their duty. Farther, The solemn charge given by the Holy Ghost to set apart Saul and Barnabas by solemn imposition of hands for the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles: This was a great work, and not to be undertaken without a special call from God; therefore says the Holy Ghost, Separate me Barnabas and Saul to the work whereunto I have called them: Which words prove both the Deity and personality of the Holy Ghost; He who calls ministers to the office, and unto whose service they are separated, is both God, and a distinct person in the Godhead; but this the Holy Ghost did: Separate me Barnabas and Saul. Here note, 1. That the work of the ministry is a separate work. Ministers must be set apart for the work of the ministry before they undertake it; a call from God is not sufficient without a separation by man. Note, 2. That this separation, ought to be performed by the chief ministers of the church who have authority from Christ to separate and set others apart for the works of the ministry. The holy Ghost said to the teachers of the church at Antioch, Separate me. 3. That this solemn act and ordinance ought to be performed in a very solemn manner, by fasting, prayer, and imposition of hands. 4. That when thus performed, it is agreeable to the mind, and according to the institution and appointment of the Holy Ghost: The Holy Ghost said, Separate, &c. Lastly, Though the office of the ministry be an honourable office, yet withal it is a laborious work. Separate them for the work whereunto I have called them. It is work that requires attendance, and zealous application, both in season and out of season. Praying, preaching, administering sacraments; guiding and governing the flock by a private admonition and public censure: These are weighty works, found so now by those that perform them faithfully, and will be found so at the great day by the slothful and negligent. How can that be esteemed by any slight and inconsiderable work, unto the faithful performance whereof so great a reward is promised, and to the omission whereof so dreadful a wo is denounced?

If Satan destroy men's souls, he shall answer for them as a murderer only, not as an officer entrusted with the care of them; but if the watchman doth not warn, if the shepherd doth not feed, if the watchmen doth not instruct, if the steward doth not provide, he shall answer not only for the souls that have miscarried, but for an office neglected, for a talent hidden, and for a stewardship unfaithfully administered. Lord! how unable shall we be at the making up of our accounts, to endure the hideous outcries of distressed souls, saying, Parentes sensimus parricidas: Our guides have misled us, our watchmen have betrayed us, our stewards have defrauded us, and the following of their evil example has undone us.

4 ¶ So they being sent forth by the Holy Ghost departed unto Selucia, and from thence they sailed to Cyprus. 5 And when they were at Salamis, they preached the word of God in the synagogues of the Jews: and they had also John to their minister. 6 And when they had gone through the isle unto Paphos, they found a certain forcerer, a false prophet a Jew, whose name was Bar-jesus: 7 Which was with the deputy of the country, Sergius Paulus, a prudent man; who called for Barnabas and Saul and desired to hear the word of God. 8 But Elymus the forcerer, (for so is his name by interpretation,) withstood them, seeking to turn away the deputy from the faith. 9 Then Saul, (who also is called Paul,) filled with the Holy Ghost, set his eyes on him, 10 And said, O full of all subtilty and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord? 11 And now, behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thee, and thou shalt be blind, not seeing the sun for a season. And immediately there fell on him a mist and a darkness; and he went about seeking some to lead him by the hand. 12 Then the deputy, when he saw what was done, believed, being astonished at the doctrine of the Lord.

Observe here, 1. The apostles Barnabas and Saul having received their commission, set forth for their work to which they were designed; and their first journey was from Antioch to Cyprus, an island of the Gentiles, lewd and wicked; where Venus was worshipped: And much filthiness was committed by them in that abominable Pagan worship. Yet the free grace of God cast a look of pity and love upon sinful Cyprus: The holy Ghost directs these apostles thither to reclaim them from sin, and reduce them to the obedience of the gospel. 2. That though Saul and Barnabas were sent forth to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, yet they made the first tender of it to the Jews wherever they came; accordingly here in Cyprus, there being a great number of Jews, the apostles went into the Synagogue, and preached to them. Christ was the minister of circumcision, who was himself sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel; and accordingly sent his apostles out first to feed and gather these poor scattered sheep; these were accounted the children of the house and the Gentiles reckoned as dogs; but when those wanton and full-fed children began to waste their meat, and cast it under the table, then did the Gentile dogs gather up their leavings: Acts xiii. 46. It was necessary, both by virtue of Christ's command and example also, that the word of God, &c. 3. What an early opposition the devil made against the apostles in their preaching the gospel to the Gentiles; he feared the battering down the walls of his kingdom, and therefore stirs up his instrument Elymus the forcerer to withstand them, and particularly to endeavour to divert Sergius Paulus, who governed that island, from the faith. Where note, The character given of this vile man by the apostle. O full of all subtilty, and mischief: a child of the devil, an enemy of all righteousness: Intimating, 1. That to be subtil to do mischief is the genius or disposition of the devil's children. 2. That to be an opposer of good, is to be conformable to the devil: It is the height of wickedness not only to do evil, but to oppose good; to be an enemy to, and opposer of goodness, is the very character of Satan and his children. So much as any man opposes goodness, so much he has of the devil's disposition in him: Thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness. 4. The judgment inflicted by God on this wicked instrument of the devil, and suitableness of the judgment inflicted on the sin committed; he wickedly shut the eyes of his understanding against the light of the Gospel, and God deprives him of his bodily sight. Thus the wisdom of God doth oft-times so suit his judgments to the sins committed, that a person may even read his sin in his punishment: Yet how did God temper mercy with the judgment, inflicting blindness upon this vile wretch, only for a season? Even the very judgments of God are medicinal and in mercy: When God punishes, it is with a design not to ruin, but reform. Lastly, What success St. Paul's ministry together with the sight of this miracle, had upon Sergius Paulus the governor, he was thereby converted to the faith: When he saw what was done, he believed; being astonished at the doctrine of the Lord. The word never works more kindly, than when it is received with admiration. Yet doth the word sometimes work admiration, where it does not produce faith: Many marvelled who never believed; but this governor was astonished, and believed also.

13 Now when Paul and his company loosed from Paphos, they came to Perga and Pamphylia: and John departing from them returned to Jerusalem. 14 ¶ But when they departed from Perga, they came to Antioch in Pisidia, and went into the synagogue on the sabbath-day, and sat down. 15 And after the reading of the law and the prophets, the rulers of the synagogue sent unto them, saying, Ye men and brethren, if ye have any word of exhortation for the people, say on.

Here we have an account of another journey which Paul and Barnabas took to preach plant and propagate the gospel: Namely, to Perga in Pamphylia; and from thence Antioch into Pifidi, fo called to diftinguifh it from the other Antioch in Syria, from whence they were fent forth, ver. 1, 2, 3. where their colleague and companion, John Mark withdrew from them, and went no farther with them to the work. This Paul took very ill, as he might, if he left them becaufe of the difficulties and dangers which he faw did accompany and attend them in the planting and propagating of the gofpel; for he that putteth his hand to that plough and then draweth back, juftly deferveth cenfure and reproof. However, fuch was the zeal of the two apoftles, that they travel on to Antioch without their companion, where entering into one of the fynagogues of the Jews on the fabbath-day; after the reading fome fections in the law and the prophets, as their manner was, the rulers of the fynagogue defired a word of exhortation from them. Where note, How wonderfully God over-ruled the hearts of thefe rulers of the fynagogue, not only to fuffer, but to defire the apoftles to preach the gofpel to them. The rulers of the fynagogue fent unto them, faying, Ye men and brethren if ye have any word of exhortation for the people, fay on. Hereupon the apoftle St. Paul ftands up and makes a moft excellent fermon to them in the following verfes. Where note, How readily the bleffed apoftle embraces an opportunity to preach the gofpel; the rulers had no need to ask him twice: Little importunity will ferve to perfuade an holy heart to undertake the work of God. The faithful minifters of Chrift are forward for as well as zealous in their Mafter's work. No fooner did the rulers of the fynagogue request a word of exhortation from the apoftle, but immediately, though not unpreparedly he ftands up and preaches to the people.

16 Then Paul ftood up, and beckoning with his hand, faid, Men of Israel, and ye that fear God, give audience. 17 The God of this people of Israel chole our fathers, and exalted the people when they dwelt as ftangers in the land of Egypt, and with an high arm brought he them out of it. 18 And about the time of forty years fuffered he their manners in the wildernefs. 19 And when he had destroyed feven nations in the land of Canaan, he divided their land to them by lot. 20 And after that he gave unto them judges, about the fpace of four hundred and fifty years, until Samuel the prophet. 21 And afterward they defired a king: and God gave unto them Saul the fon of Cis, a man of the tribe of Benjamin, by the fpace of forty years. 22 And when he had removed him, he raifed up unto them David to be their king. To whom alfo he gave testimony, and faid, I have found David the fon of Jefe, a man after mine own heart, which fhall fulfil all my will. 23 Of this man's feed hath God, according to his promife, raifed unto Israel a Saviour, Jefus; 24 When John had firft preached before his coming, the baptifm of repentance to all the people of Israel. 25 And as John fulfilled his course he faid, Whom think ye that I am? I am not he. But behold there cometh one after me, whose fhoes of his feet I am not worthy to loofe. 26 Men and brethren, children of the ftock of Abraham, and whofever among you feareth God, to you is the word of this falvation fent.

This latter part of the chapter containeth an historical and practical fermon, preached by St. Paul at the request of the rulers of the fynagogue. Where note, 1. His prologue or preface, in which he craves their careful attention; withal intimating, that none of them would attend, but only fuch as truly feared God: Men of Israel, and ye that fear God, give audience. That is, the proper character of a right attentive hearer. 2. The narrative which the apoftle gives of the many divine favours, benefits, and bleffings, which the Lord beftowed of old upon Israel his people; namely, his free election and chufing them before all nations; his wonderful deliverance of them out of Egypt; his great indulgence towards them for forty years in the wildernefs, as a mother bears with a child's ftowardnefs and ftubbornnefs; and his conftituting a form of government for them under the judges firft, and kings afterwards particularly Saul and David; who is defcribed firft by his conformity to the nature of God; he was a man after his own heart. Secondly, By his conformity to the will of God: He fhall fulfil all my will. Having thus ended the historical part, he next begins the practical part of his difcourse; and lays down this grand propofition, That Jefus is the Chrift and Saviour of the world. This assertion he defends and proves. (1.) From his ftock and family according to the flefh, foretold by God. (2.) From the testimony of John the Baptift his forerunner, ver. 23, 24. Of David's feed hath God, &c. After this he makes a clofe application of the whole to them: Men and brethren, to you is the word of this falvation fent. Learn thence, That the gofpel is the doctrine or word of falvation fent by God unto a loft world. The gofpel is a message of glad tidings; the glad tidings which the gofpel brings, is falvation; and the way and manner how the gofpel brings falvation, is threefold. (1.) By way of preparation and difcovery; the gofpel makes a difcovery of falvation exclusively to any other way; no angel in heaven could have difcovered it, if God had not firft declared it in and by the gofpel. (2.) By way of tender and offer: O this joyful message of falvation is fent to every man's door! free grace falls upon its knees and begs of every finner to accept it. (3.) By way of efficacy and power. The gofpel brings with it a convincing and converting power, to put men into a ftate of falvation; and hath alfo an eftablifhing and confirming power to preferve them in that eftate. Bleffed be God that to us, even to every one of us is the word of this falvation fent. What monfters then are they who are enemies to our falvation: The only way to heaven is by Chrift, the only way to Chrift is by faith, and and the only way to faith is by the word.

day, they have fulfilled them in condemning him. 28 And though they found no cause of death in him, yet desired they Pilate that he should be slain. 29 And when they had fulfilled all that was written of him, they took him down from the tree, and laid him in a sepulchre. 30 But God raised him from the dead: 31 And he was seen many days of them which came up with him from Galilee to Jerusalem who are his witnesses unto the people. 32 And we declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made unto the fathers, 33 God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that he hath raised up Jesus again; as it is also written in the second Psalm, Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee. 34 And as concerning that he raised him up from the dead, now no more to return to corruption, he said on this wise, I will give you the sure mercies of David. 35 Wherefore he saith also in another Psalm, Thou shalt not suffer thine Holy One to see corruption.

Note here, 1. The apostle declares the ignominious death. 2. The glorious resurrection of the Lord Jesus, whom he proves to be the true and promised Messiah. (1.) For his ignominious death, the Jesus hanged him upon a tree. The Son of God was not only put to death, but to the worst of deaths, even the death of the cross, by the wicked Jews: Yet the apostle acknowledges, that neither the Jewish rulers nor people did understand him to be the Messiah, as they might have done, had they considered the predictions of the prophets; and therefore their ignorance would not excuse them: for the ignorance and heedlessness of men, enjoying the means and opportunities of knowledge, will certainly bring destruction upon them. To sin blindly, without knowledge, or to sin wilfully against knowledge when we have the means of knowledge is a damnable sin: The rulers, because they knew him not, nor yet the voices of the prophets, have fulfilled them in condemning him. Note 2. To take away the scandal of the cross, the apostle shews that our Saviour's resurrection was as glorious as his death was ignominious. God wiped away the reproach of the cross, by raising up Christ from the grave, and declared him to be his Son with power, by the resurrection from the dead. And accordingly the apostle applies that prophecy to Christ, in Psalm ii. 7. Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. As if the Father had said, "Now thou hast again recovered thy glory, and thy resurrection day is to thee as a new birth-day." Three ways is Christ said to be begotten: (1.) Of the essence of the Father before all worlds. (2.) When his body was formed of the substance of the Virgin's flesh. (3.) When God raised him from the dead; This day have I begotten thee: That is, declaratively, for he was the Son of God before, even from all eternity; but whilst he was in a suffering condition, his divinity was veiled: Whereas after his resurrection it was more apparent, and he was then declared to be the Son of God; not then made the Son of God, but then made manifest to be the Son of God, but the resurrection from the dead. Learn, That the Lord Jesus Christ was the Son of God, antecedent to his resurrection, even from all eternity; he was declared and manifested, but not made or constituted the Son of God by the resurrection. Then it was that his divinity brake forth as the sun, after it had been shut up under a dark and thick cloud. Christ was the eternal Son of God; but his resurrection was a declaration, and full manifestation of it to the world; Rom i. 4. Declared to be the Son of God with power.

36 For David, after he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell on sleep, and was laid unto his fathers, and saw corruption.

The Holy Ghost here gives a compendious account of David's life and death: Of his life, He served his generation according to the will of God: Of his death: He fell asleep, and was gathered to his fathers, and saw corruption. In the account given of David's life, note, 1. His activity and zeal for God, he served as well as reigned: This serving implies not single or individual act, but a series and succession of good actions throughout the whole course of his life. 2. The publicness of his activity; he served not himself, but his own generation. 3. The rule of his activity, he that was the will of God; as he served his generation, so he served God in his generation faithfully according to his will. All our serviceableness for God and our generation, must be guided and directed by the word and will of God. David served his own generation by the will of God. This is the account of his life. Note next, The relation of his death. He fell asleep, was gathered to his fathers, and saw corruption. He fell asleep; death to the servants of God is as a sleep, and but a sleep. As a sleep, it gives rest and cessation from labour; and as a sleep, it gives cessation after labour; and as they that sleep shall certainly awake, so those that sleep in Jesus shall awake in the morning of the resurrection, to see their glorified Redeemer face to face. 2. No serviceableness to God in our generation can exempt from death; for David fell asleep; this is the lot of the faithful, as well as the slothful servants. 3. It is a blessed thing when we fall asleep with our work in our hands; when death meets us after a life spent in the service of Christ. David, after he had served his generation, fell asleep; it follows, he was gathered to his fathers: that is, he was buried amongst his ancestors: and saw corruption; that is, his body corrupted in the grave like other men's.

37 But he whom God raised again, saw no corruption.

That is, Jesus Christ, whom God the Father raised to life the third day, he saw a dissolution, but no corruption. Sin had no inheritance in him, therefore death could have no dominion over him; but he overcame death in his own territories, the grave. Thus the apostle draws the argument home, that the foregoing words could not be meant of David's person, but of the Messiah whom David typified and represented.

38 Be it known unto you therefore, men and brethren, that through this man is preached unto you obscure affair; and accordingly, their authority being so illustrious and commanding, and the decree so pious and prudential, their determination was received with universal satisfaction. They delivered the epistle, which when they had read, they rejoiced. 3. What was the subject matter of their joy, and the special occasion of their rejoicing; They rejoiced for the consolation: That is, for the great consolation which they had, in being freed from the burden of the legal ceremonies, though originally of divine institution and appointed by God himself. From whence we learn, That liberty from toilsome ceremonies, though originally of divine institution, much more a freedom from superstitious ceremonies of human invention, is matter of great joy to the church of Christ. Lord! what numerous and burdensome ceremonies has the church of Rome imposed upon her blind votaries? When in their worship they would be thought truly zealous, they are really ridiculous. They please themselves, perhaps, but cannot please their Maker; all the acceptance they will find with God will be signified to them in that chiding question, "Who hath required these things at your hands?"

32 And Judas and Silas, being prophets also themselves, exhorted the brethren with many words, and confirmed them. 33 And after they had tarried there a space, they were let go in peace from the brethren unto the apostles. 34 Notwithstanding it pleased Silas to abide there still. 35 Paul also and Barnabas continued in Antioch, teaching and preaching the word of the Lord, with many others also.

Judas and Silas being prophets; that is, persons extraordinarily inspired, and endued with eminent gifts for teaching and interpreting the holy scriptures; they employed themselves at Antioch, confirming and building up their brethren in the faith of Christ. And after they had stayed at Antioch some time, they were of all kindness dismissed of the church there; and Judas returned to Jerusalem, to acquaint the apostles with the reception which their letter had met with, and what obedience was readily given to their decrees.

36 ¶ And some days after, Paul said unto Barnabas, Let us go again and visit our brethren in every city where we have preached the word of the Lord, and see how they do.

Note here, The pious and prudential care, which Paul, who had planted the churches, takes to visit and inspect them that he might see and understand how they did thrive and grow in the knowledge of Christ, and in their sincere obedience to him. This great apostle had been sowing the good seed of the word of God; his next care is, to examine and inquire, whether the envious ones had not sowed tares in his absence. A minister's work, and an husbandman's business are never at an end, but run round in a circle: Redit labor actus in orbem; after ploughing and sowing, there must be weeding and watering, before reaping and ingathering. Accordingly, St. Paul resolves upon the visitation here mentioned: Ver. 36 Let us go again and visit, &c. Here note, 1. The visitors, Paul and Barnabas. 2.

The visited, our brethren, both the elders and members of the church. 3. The action performed, visiting: The word imports a strict view, a most diligent and solicitous scrutiny, lest some errors in their absence might be crept into the doctrine and conversation of these new-planted churches. 4. The place where the visitation is to be held, in every city where they had preached the word of the Lord: Where they had planted, they were obliged to water; and where they had begotten any to the christian faith, they thought it their duty to nurture and nourish them; and therefore, though they were presbyters no doubt in every city, yet Paul and Barnabas challenged to themselves a power of visitation, where they had personally preached. The apostles who first converted them, had a peculiar right to inspect and govern them. Converted souls, and planted churches, must be farther visited, observed, and watered.

5. The end and design of the visitation, to see how they do, and what they do; to take an account of their faith and practice. From the whole, observe, 1. A disease which the churches of the apostles, own planting were supposed to be liable and obnoxious to; the purest of churches, and best of men in this military and mortal state, are apt to fall into distempers, witness this chapter: Where we find the converted Jews nauseating the bread of life, making it their choice to pick and eat the rubbish of the partition wall which Christ had demolished; I mean circumcision, and the legal ceremonies, which though expired at the death of Christ, and by this time had an honourable burial, yet they attempt to pull out of their graves, and give a resurrection to them. Such distempers will be in the purest churches, if we consider the hereditary corruption which is in all by nature; the remains of it in those who are renewed by grace, and the endeavours of Satan to solicit these remains, and invite them forth into act and exercise.

2. The remedy resolved upon for preventing and healing of this disease; namely, apostolical visitation, and episcopal inspection, as the word signifies: The constitution of the church is such, that it cannot continue long in repair, without inspection and government. For though the universal church is secure, being built upon a rock; yet particular churches are liable to dilapidations: And accordingly, it is the duty of the governors of the church: frequently to inspect the authority of those who preach, to examine their doctrines, to inquire into their lives, to give rules for preserving order, and to censure those who neglect those rules, and disturb that order. In fine, we see the church of Christ must be governed; in that government there must be a superiority in some, and a subordination in others; superiors must frequently visit, and narrowly inspect the doctrine, the lives and manners, both of the ministers and members of the church, according to the practice and example of those two great apostles, Paul and Barnabas, who said, ver. 36. Let us go again and visit, &c.

37 And Barnabas determined to take with them John, whose surname was Mark. 38 But Paul thought not good to take him with him, who departed from them from Pamphylia, and went not with them to the work. 39 And the contention was so sharp between them, they departed asunder one from the other : and so Barnabas took Mark, and sailed unto Cyprus. 40 And Paul chose Silas and departed, being recommended by the brethren unto the grace of God. 41 And he went through Syria and Cilicia confirming the churches.

St. Paul having made a motion to Barnabas, in the foregoing verses to visit and inspect the new-planted churches, Barnabas very readily complied with the motion, but desired that he might take his nephew John Mark along with him: This Paul consented not unto; because he left them at Pamphylia, and did not accompany them constantly in preaching the gospel to the Gentiles. St. Paul was in the right; Mark's cowardice in leaving them when they undertook a tedious and hazardous journey to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, was a considerable objection against his present going with them, and weighed more than his consanguinity or nearness of blood to Barnabas. Accordingly St. Paul insisted upon it, that he should not now go along with them; but this occasioned a very sharp and unhappy contention between them; inasmuch, that those two great and good men parted asunder, Barnabas going to Cyprus, and St. Paul to Cilicia; but God over-ruled this evil for good; causing their separation to tend to the publication and farther spreading of the gospel. Hence learn, 1. How industrious, yea, ambitious the devil is to sow the seeds of discord and dissention amongst the members, but especially amongst the ministers of Jesus Christ; and how ready he is to take all occasions to divide them. These holy men of God, these great apostles, whose hearts were united in the work of God, and went hand in hand together, to plant and propagate the everlasting gospel, divide among themselves, and are parted by Satan's policy and their own passions. 2. That the holiest and wisest of men are but men; men of like passions with other men, and whilst on this side of heaven not wholly free from passionate infirmities. These two great apostles verified here by their actions, what they affirmed before in their words, Acts xiv. 15. We are men of like passions with you. Learn, 3. That natural affections are apt to overweigh the wisest and best of men. Barnabas's great love to his kinsman here, prevailed contrary to his judgment, 4. That such is the wisdom, power, and goodness of God, that he knows how to bring good out of the greatest evil, and to over-rule sin itself, and make it subservient to his own glory and his church's good. The Lord was pleased to over-rule these divisions and dissentions betwixt Paul and Barnabas, for the enlarging the kingdom of Christ, and for spreading the gospel farther into several nations. Lastly, How this reflection upon John Mark's faint-heartedness in declining the hardships and the hazards of the ministry, made him for the future more vigilant and in the cause of the gospel, which occasioned that kind salutation which St. Paul gives him, Col. iv. 10. Though sin be only evil, absolutely evil, and infinitely evil: yet the wisdom and goodness of God sanctifies the miscarriages of his saints, rendering them more humble for the time passed, and more watchful and vigilant for time to come. Thus it was with Mark here; he was humbled for his sin, and afterwards became profitable to St. Paul for the ministry, was his fellow-labourer; and the apostle gives a special charge to the Colossians to entertain him kindly whenever he should come unto them, Col. iv. 10. Marcus, sister's son to Barnabas, when he comes unto you, receive him.

CHAP. XVI.

Then came he to Derbe and Lystra: and behold, a certain disciple was there, named Timothy, the son of a certain woman which was a Jewess and believed; but his father was a Greek: 2 Which was well reported of by the brethren that were at Lystra and Iconium. 3 Him would Paul have to go forth with him; and took and circumcised him, because of the Jews which were in those quarters. For they knew all that his father was a Greek.

The latter end of the foregoing chapter gave us a sad account of a dissention and difference arising between Paul and Barnabas, upon which they parted; Barnabas sails for Cyprus, but what success he had there, the scripture says not. St. Paul goes through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches, and doing good service in his peregrinations and travels. Here note, That St. Paul and Silas, before they set forth to their work, were in a solemn manner (by prayer) recommended by the brethren to the grace of God, chap. xv. 40. And accordingly their labours are succeeded and blessed. Barnabas and Mark set forth for Cyprus; but we read not of any solemn recommendation of them by the brethren to the grace of God; not a word of any success they had in their work: Teaching us the great necessity of fervent prayer to precede, accompany, and follow the preaching of the gospel. Let ministers pray, and people pray, and engage all the prayers they can for the success of their ministry. Lord, let me steep the seed I sow amongst thy people in tears and prayers before I scatter it! O pour out thy Spirit with thy word, that it may be mighty through God for pulling down of strong holds! Verily there is so little efficacy in ordinances for want of fervent wrestlings with God in prayer. Note next, The places which Paul and Silas in their travels first came unto; namely, Derbe and Lystra, where he finds young Timothy whom he takes along with him, and breeds him up for a gospel minister, calls him his fellow-worker and companion in his travels. Farther, The account here given of Timothy's birth and parentage; his mother Eunice was a believing Jewess: his Father was a Greek, a Gentile; for which reason Timothy was not circumcised, because it was not lawful for the mother to have her child circumcised against her husband's consent. Now St. Paul intending to take Timothy along with him as his companion in preaching the gospel, that his ministry might be the more acceptable to the Jews, who knew him to be uncircumcised, because the son of an uncircumcised father, he takes him and circumcises him; but at the same time, Titus, who was a Gentile, both by father and mother, him he would not circumcise, neither suffering the yoke of circumcision to be laid upon the Gentiles, which God had never imposed, imposed, nor would he seem to countenance those who held circumcision necessary to salvation. O what an admirable pattern has this great and humble apostle left to posterity! he became all things to all men, and either used or refused indifferent things according as the use or disuse of them tended to the church's edification, and men's salvation. From whence learn, That in things not absolutely necessary to salvation, Christians ought to act prudentially, and either do, or not do, some things of lesser moment, according as it may promote, and best conduce to, the church's peace and edification.

4 And as they went through the cities, they delivered them the decrees for to keep that were ordained of the apostles and elders which were at Jerusalem. 5 And so were the churches established in the faith and increased in number daily.

The sense is this, that as Paul and Silas passed through the cities in Syria and Cilicia, they delivered to the several churches, as they passed along, the decrees to observe, which were ordained by the apostles and elders met in council at Jerusalem, whereby those churches were established in the faith, and many more every day converted unto Christ. Here note, 1. The messengers which delivered these decrees, Paul and Silas, with a special regard unto the church's unity and peace. Behold here an excellent pattern for christians in general, and the ministers of the gospel in particular; as to maintain truth, so to procure, promote and preserve the church's peace. Truth and peace with God has joined together, Zech. viii. 10. let none dare to put asunder. 2. What it was that St. Paul here made the discovery of, the decrees made by the apostles and elders at Jerusalem; not the decrees made by the whole church, but by the ministers of the church only. None so fit to determine church-differences, as church-officers. 3. To whom these decrees were delivered; namely, to the churches as they passed along through the several cities; so many cities, so many churches: The whole company of Christians within a city, and the adjacent territory, were wont to be framed into a Christian society or church, and several congregations made but one church. To set up churches against churches, to set up churches in churches, and to gather churches out of churches, has no precedent, no warrant, no countenance from any phrase in scripture or practice of the apostles times. 4. The end for which these decrees were delivered; namely, to bring all the churches to unity and uniformity; to unity in judgment, and uniformity in practice, that they might all be of one heart, and one way. Learn thence, That an unity and uniformity among the churches of Christ is a thing to be earnestly desired and endeavoured; their unity is their strength and beauty both. Lastly, The success and fruit of the delivery of these decrees to the churches, ver. 5. So were the churches established in the faith, and increased in the number daily. Where observe, A double blessing accruing to the churches, the one of confirmation, So were the church's established; the other of augmentation, They increased in number daily. Learn 1. That as divisions do shake and unsettle, so unity and uniformity do establish and confirm the church of Christ: So were the church's established. 2. That it is a blessed thing to hear of the church increasing, provided it be by way of addition, not division: To hear of churches multiplying, by the number of converts increasing, is happy but to multiply churches by breaking churches in pieces, is a sad multiplication. The Lord keep his churches from such increases! and the Lord pardon those who for private interest have so increased churches by gathering churches out of churches, pretendedly for greater purity sake, but really for worldly advantage sake! Doctrines crying up purity to the reign of unity, reject; for the doctrine calls for unity as well as for purity.

6 Now when they had gone throughout Phrygia and the region of Galatia, and were forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in Asia, 7 After they were come to Mysia, they assayed to go into Bithynia: But the Spirit suffered them not.

Note here, How the apostle and his companions had a desire and design to propagate the gospel in several provinces but were forbidden by a secret impulse of the Holy Spirit. Learn thence, That the frustrating our attempts, and disappointing our designs to preach the gospel to particular places, which we were purposed to go unto, doth sometimes arise from the Holy Ghost. The very journeyings of the apostles, and first preachers of the gospel, as well as their divine exercises, were all ordered by the wisdom and will of God; they might neither speak, nor act, nor walk, but according to divine directions. Thus Almighty God at pleasure orders the candle of the gospel to be removed out of one room to another, sends it from one place and people to another, and accordingly ought all places and persons to prize it highly, and improve it faithfully.

8 And they passing by Mysia, came down to Troas. 9 And a vision appeared to Paul in the night: there stood a man of Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us 10 And after he had seen the vision, immediately we endeavoured to go into Macedonia, assuredly gathering, that the Lord had called us for to preach the gospel unto them.

These words are a relation of a message from heaven unto St. Paul to direct him in his preaching and publishing of the gospel, both as to the place where, and as to the persons to whom he was to deliver it. Where note, The manner of it; it was by a vision, A vision appeared. The time of it, it was in the night; the bringer, a man of Macedonia; the matter of it, help for the Macedonians, interpreted (ver. 10.) to be by the preaching of the gospel. Learn hence, 1. That no men in the world want help like them that want the gospel; Of all distresses, want of the gospel cries loudest for relief and help.: For by want of the gospel they want every thing that is worth having; they want Jesus Christ, who is revealed only by the gospel. They want communion with God; they want the comforts and refreshments of ordinances; they will at last want heaven and salvation. But that which is most deplorable is this, those those that want the gospel, though they want all these things yet are they not sensible that they want any thing. 2. That the sending of the gospel to one nation place or people, and not to another proceeds from the determinate will and pleasure of Almighty God, and is the effect of his own free grace and good pleasure: Stay not in Asia, go not into Bithynia, but come over into Macedonia: Even so, Father, for thus it seemeth good in thy sight.

11 Therefore loosing from Troas, we came with a strait course to Samothracia, and the next day to Neapolis: 12 And from thence to Philippi, which is the chief city of that part of Macedonia, and a colony. And we were in that city abiding certain days. 13 And on the sabbath we went out of the city by a river side, where prayer was wont to be made. And we sat down and spake to the women, which resorted thither. 14 And a certain woman named Lydia, a seller of purple, of the city of Thyatiria, which worshipped God, heard us: whose heart the Lord opened, that she attended unto the things which were spoken of Paul. 15 And when she was baptized, and her household, she besought us, saying, If ye have judged me to be faithful to the Lord, come in to my house, and abide there. And she constrained us.

A farther account is here given of St. Paul's travels to preach the gospel: he departs from Troas to Samothracia, from thence to Neapolis, and thence to Philippi, the chief city of Macedonia. Here on the sabbath-day he went out of the city to the river's side, where a meeting-place for prayer, say some, was built, and made use of, as being remote from the noise and observation of the multitude. In this oratory, St. Paul preached to the women, they being both most numerous and most zealous, and God gives him the seal of his ministry in the conversion of Lydia. In which famous conversion, observe how particular the Holy Ghost is in relating the several circumstances belonging to it: She is described by her person and sex, a certain woman; by her name, Lydia; by her calling and employment, a seller of purple; by her city, Thyatira; by her pious disposition, she worshipped God. Her conversion is described, (1.) By the efficient cause of it; the Lord opened her heart. (2.) By the instrumental cause of it; her attending to the things that were spoken of Paul. Learn, 1. That the hearts of persons are naturally shut up, and fast barred against Jesus Christ. 2. That the opening of the heart to receive Jesus Christ is the peculiar effect of the sovereign power and omnipotent grace of God. 3. That till God opens the heart of a sinner, the preaching of the gospel little affecteth, though never so plainly and persuasively preached. 4. That when once the heart is opened the ear will not be shut, the person is truly attentive to the preaching of the gospel; The Lord opened Lydia's heart, and she attended. Observe next, The seal of her conversion and salvation received by her, She was baptized, and her whole house. It was the ordinary way of the apostles to baptize households; not that they were sure that they were all believers, or that the family-governors could make them so; but it was their duty to devote all in their power to God, and to do their utmost to persuade: And God usually succeeded their endeavours. Note here, That the church of God for near seventeen hundred years, never refused the baptizing of infants of believing parents, as being taken into covenant with themselves. Having then for so many ages been in the possession of this privilege, we may more reasonably require (the anabaptists to prove by express scripture, that children were not baptized by the apostles, (when they baptized whole families, yea, whole nations, according to their commission, Matt. xxviii. 19.) than they can require us to prove that they were. Lydia and her house were baptized, says the text, that is, says the Syriac, Lydia and her children. Lydia, by reason of her faith in Christ having a right to baptism, all her family, upon her undertaking to bring them up in the knowledge of Christ, were admitted to the ordinance with her. Observe, lastly, A special fruit and evidence of Lydia's conversion, the constrained the apostles with an amicable violence; by fervent intreaties and passionate importunities, to receive the civilities of her house. Converted persons have so much love to Christ's ministers, who were the instruments of their conversion, that they greatly desire to express it by all acts of possible kindness; If ye have judged me faithful, come into my house, and abide there; and she constrained us.

16 ¶ And it came to pass, as we went to prayer a certain damsel possessed with a spirit of divination, met us, which brought her masters much gain, by soothsaying: 17 The same followed Paul and us and cried, saying, These men are the servants of the most high God, which shew unto us the way of salvation. 18 And this did she many days. But Paul being grieved, turned and said unto the spirit, I command thee in the name of Jesus Christ to come out of her. And he came out the same hour. 19 ¶ And when her masters saw that the hope of their gains was gone, they caught Paul and Silas, and drew them into the market-place unto the rulers. 20 And brought them to the magistrates, saying, These men being Jews do exceedingly trouble our city, 21 And teach customs which are not lawful for us to receive, neither to observe, being Romans. 22 And the multitude rose up together against them: and the magistrates rent off their clothes and commanded to beat them. 23 And when they had laid many stripes upon them, they cast them into prison, charging the jailor to keep them safely. 24 Who having received such a charge, thrust them into the inner prison, and made their feet fast in the stocks.

As we went to prayer, a damsel possessed met us. That is, as the apostles went towards the forementioned place of prayer, a damsel possessed with the devil, by whose inspiration she foretold future things, and revealed many secrets.

to them that consulted her, followed them, crying out, These are the servants of the most high God, who declare unto us the way of salvation. Where note, 1. That the father of lies sometimes speaks the truth, though never for truth's sake, but for his own advantage: Here what the devil said was truth, but it was for devilish ends; he transforms himself now into an angel of light, to draw men on to believe him, the prince of darkness. 2. How St. Paul refuses the devil's testimony concerning himself, even when he spoke the truth. The testimony of truth from the father of lies, is enough to render truth itself suspected. 3. The authority which St. Paul takes upon him in the name of Christ to dispossess the devil, and call him out of the damsel: Paul said, I command thee in the name of Jesus to come out of her: And he came out the same hour. These words St. Paul uttered by the motion of the holy Spirit, and relying by faith on the promise of Christ made by himself to his apostles, Mark xvi. 17. That in his name they should cast out devils; accordingly he received power from on high to cast out this darling devil. 4. How Satan seeks to be revenged on Paul for dispossessing him; he raises up an hot persecution, and soon casts him into prison, who had cast the devil out of the damsel: If we disturb and trouble Satan, he will be sure to trouble and disturb us. Such ministers as make the greatest opposition against Satan, must expect to meet with the greatest opposition from him. 5. Who were the instruments which Satan stirs up to raise this persecution against the apostles; they were the rulers and the rabble; The multitude rise up, and the magistrates rent their clothes, &c. Thus were the holy apostles, and innocent servants of Jesus Christ, imprisoned, and treated as the vilest malefactors, only for opposing Satan, and seeking the welfare of mankind. Lastly, That love of money was the root of all this persecution: the damsel's masters perceiving that their gain was gone, and that she could help them to no more money by telling people their fortunes, the devil of discontent possessed them: They stir up persecution against the apostles, they cast them into prison, into the inward prison, and, to make all sure, set them in the stocks.

25 ¶ And at midnight Paul and Silas prayed, and sang praises unto God: and the prisoners heard them. 26 And suddenly there was a great earthquake, so that the foundations of the prison were shaken: and immediately all the doors were opened, and every one's bands were loosed. 27 And the keeper of the prison awaking out of his sleep, and seeing the prison-doors open, he drew out his sword, and would have killed himself, supposing that the prisoners had been fled. 28 But Paul cried with a loud voice, saying, Do thyself no harm: for we are all here.

The apostles are here, by Satan and his instruments, cast into prison; but note, They have their prison-comforts. (1.) The joy of their hearts runs out of their lips, they sang praises unto God, when their bodies were in prison, and their feet were in the stocks; these holy servants of God were not only meek and patient, but joyous and chearful under persecution, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for him who had undergone so much indignity and shame for them. (2.) They enjoy sweet communion with God in prayer; At midnight they prayed, and the prisoners heard them: No place can be improper, no time unseasonable for prayer. No prison can bolt out God, nor deprive us of our communion with him: Prayer will get up to heaven in spite of all the opposition either of hell or earth. Note 2. How sudden the answer, and how sensible the return of prayer was which the Lord graciously gave his suffering servants: Suddenly there was a great earthquake, This earthquake was an infallible sign of God's audience; that he heard them, and would stand by them. 3. The powerful efficacy of St. Paul's prayer; his prayer shook the heavens, the heavens shook the earth, the earth shook the prison, even to the very foundations of it. Prayer has a divine kind of omnipotency in it: Vincit invincibilem & ligat omnipotentem; "It overcomes God with his own strength." 4. What influence this earthquake had upon the jailor, it occasioned such an heart-quake in him, that to give himself ease, silly soul, he resolves to murder himself. Lord! how miserable are the consolations which the carnate and unregenerate world have recourse and fly unto, when trouble and distress take hold upon them? They run to an halter, to rid them of their trouble, having no God to go unto, and thereby plunge themselves into endless troubles, yea, eternal torments. Lastly, How kind the apostle was to his cruel keeper; he that hurt the apostle's feet in the stocks, bears the apostle crying to him in the midst of the earthquake, Do thyself no harm. Good men ever have been, and are men of tender and compassionate dispositions; not so solicitous for their own liberties, as for others's lives: The apostles might have held their peace, and suffered the jailor to have slain himself, and thereby made their own escape; but they preferred the jailor's eternal salvation, before their own temporal liberty and happiness. Paul cried with a loud voice, saying, Do thyself no harm.

29 Then he called for a light, and sprang in, and came trembling, and fell down before Paul and Silas; 30 And brought them out, and said, Sirs, what must I do to be saved? 31 And they said, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house. 32 And they spake unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his house.

As if the jailor had said, "Sirs, I now see and acknowledge that the doctrine taught by you, is the truth of the eternal God; and he hath by this miraculous earthquake testified to me, that you are his true and faithful servants; tell me therefore I beseech you, what I must do to attain salvation?" They answer, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, &c. That is, "If you and your family receive the doctrine of Jesus Christ, and regulate your lives according to it, you shall be saved." Here note, 1. That scorers and persecutors will become tremblers, when once God hath touched their hearts, and wounded their consciences with remorse for sin: The jailor here came trembling, and fell down before before Paul and Silas; trembling under a sense of his guiltiness, and falling down upon his knees to ask them forgiveness. 2. That trembling sinners are always inquisitive, yea, very inquisitive persons: An awakened conscience will put a man upon enquiry, upon great and much inquiry, what he should do. 3. That the chief thing which the trembling soul inquires after, is the business of salvation; What shall I do to be saved? 4. That trembling sinners, and troubled souls, must be directed to Jesus Christ, and to faith in him, as the only way to obtain salvation by him; Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.

33 And he took them the same hour of the night, and washed their stripes; and was baptized, he and all his straightway.

Behold how sudden and strange a change was wrought in this jailor! Before his conversion he was cruel, barbarous and hard-hearted: Now he is meek, merciful, and compassionate. He that before had beaten, imprisoned, and hurt the holy apostles' feet in the stocks, now pities them, mourns over them, and washes their stripes. Learn thence, That religion, and the grace of God, softens and mollifies the hardest hearts, sweetens the fourest natures, and changes the most barbarous and bloody dispositions. Behold this jailor, before his conversion, a savage persecutor, a tyger, and a vulture, like the demoniac in the gospel, exceeding fierce, but now dispossessed of his fury, and by grace turned into a lamb for meekness, and a dove for innocency. 2. How the jailor believing, he and his whole house were baptized. The apostle denied not baptism to the jailor's household, upon the jailor's sincere profession of the christian faith; yet no doubt he promised to use his utmost endeavours to bring them to the knowledge and obedience of Jesus Christ. Lastly, How improbable it is that the jailor and his household were baptized by dipping: We do not deny the lawfulness of baptizing by immersion, but we cannot assert the absolute and indispensable necessity of it. St. Paul, who was newly washed, and his sores dressed, occasioned by stripes, cannot be supposed either to go out himself, or to carry the jailor and all his family in the dead of the night, to the river or a pond to baptize them; neither is it in the least probable, that St. Paul himself was baptized by dipping: See Acts ix. 18, 19. He arose and was baptized; and when he had received meat, he was strengthened. The context may convince us, that he was baptized in his lodgings, being sick and weak, having fasted three days, and being in a very low condition, partly by his miraculous vision, and partly by his extraordinary fasting; it was no ways probable that Ananias should carry him out to a river in that condition, to plunge him in cold water. Dipping, then, surely, cannot be so essential unto baptism, as for want of it to pronounce the baptism of all the reformed churches throughout the world, to be null and void, as some amongst us do.

34 And when he had brought them into his house, he set meat before them, and rejoiced, believing in God with all his house.

See here a special evidence, and sweet fruit of the jailor's conversion; he brings the apostles, who were the instruments of his conversion, into his house; and having washed their stripes, refreshes their bowels; he set meat before them. The truth of conversion will manifest itself in all thankfulness, and other tokens of respect to those whom God has made the instruments of our conversion. True conversion changes men's thoughts of God's ministers, and causes men to love and honour those whom before they did disdain and scorn, persecute and hate. Note, 2. How full of joy and spiritual rejoicing this new convert was, he rejoiced. O the sweet fruit of faith in Christ! namely peace with God, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Conversion always puts men into a joyful state: Rejoicing, spiritual rejoicing, is the portion, the proper portion, and the peculiar portion of converted persons, as it is sometimes their present portion: The jailor, upon his believing in God, instantly rejoiced.

35 And when it was day, the magistrates sent the serjeants, saying, Let those men go. 36 And the keeper of the prison told this saying to Paul, The magistrates have sent to let you go; now therefore depart, and go in peace. 37 But Paul said unto them, They have beaten us openly uncondemned, being Romans, and have cast us into prison; and now do they thrust us out privily? nay, verily; but let them come themselves, and fetch us out.

Note here, 1. The willingness of the magistrates to release those innocent prisoners, and holy apostles, and what might be the probable occasion of it; namely, (1.) The terror of the earthquake which affected them with fear. (2.) The consciousness of their own guilt from their injurious dealing with the apostles, scourging them, and casting them into prison, only for casting a devil out of a possessed servant. The consciences of the vilest and worst of men, at one time or other, do make furious reflections upon them for their cruelty and injustice towards the ministers and members of Jesus Christ. Note, 2. How the innocent apostles refused to be thus clandestinely released, and privately brought out of prison: They were unjustly laid in prison, and without any legal trial scourged and bound, contrary to the law and privileges of the Romans; and therefore the apostles insist upon their privilege, and would not be content with a sneaking clandestine dismissal, after such a public ignominious punishment, injuriously inflicted on them. Learn thence, That it is lawful to plead our right by the law against unjust magistrates; and though we must not return evil for evil, yet we may use all lawful means for redressing and removing of our own grievances. Thus did St. Paul here; yet more for the gospel's sake than his own, lest the word of God should be despised with their persons.

38 And the serjeants told these words unto the magistrates; and they feared when they heard that they were Romans. 39 And they came and besought them, and brought them out, and desired them to depart out of the city. 40 And they went out of the prison, and entered into the house of Lydia: and when when they had seen the brethren, they comforted them, and departed.

Note here, 1. What an awe God has over the consciences of men in general, and of magistrates in particular: They stoop to their prisoners, and beseech them to come out of prison, and depart from the city. The same can God do for all his servants who have been disgracefully and despitefully used. He can make their enemies become their benefactors at his pleasure, and their persecutors shall be their deliverers. 2. That as desirable as liberty was, those honest hearts chose rather to go without it, than to accept it upon dishonourable terms, either to the blemishing of their innocency, or to the aspersions of the gospel. Had they been privately released, they might have been publicly slandered, for making their escape by compact with the jailor, whom they had now made their own; therefore they stay in prison till publicly discharged, and then they go forth; The magistrates besought them, and brought them forth, 3. The holy use which these good men made of their restored liberty: They visit the brethren, and comfort them, and confirm them, and strengthen them in the faith of Christ. Thus this chapter concludes with an account of what St. Paul did and suffered at Philippi, where he laid the foundation of that eminent church, to which he wrote his epistle, which bears the title of his epistle to the Philippians; wherein he mentions many fellow-labourers that he had there, in the works of the gospel, Phil. iv. 3. Help those which laboured with me in the gospel, with Clement, and other my fellow-labourers, whose names are in the book of life. It is an happy encouragement to the ministers of Christ, when they are found helping and not hindering one another, strengthening each other's hands, and not saddening one another's hearts; but, by united endeavours, in public preaching, and private inspection, promoting the grand design of the gospel; namely, to fear God, honour their superiors, love one another. So be it.

CHAP. XVII.

NOW when they had passed through Amphipolis Apollonia, they came to Thessalonica, where was a synagogue of the Jews. 2 And Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them, and three sabbath-days reasoned with them out of the scriptures. 3 Opening and alledging, that Christ must needs have suffered, and risen again from the dead; and that this Jesus, whom I preach unto you, is Christ.

The foregoing chapter acquaints us with the travels of St. Paul to Lystra and Philippi: at Lystra he cured a cripple, and was stoned for it; at Philippi he cast out a devil, and was scourged and imprisoned for it. This chapter begins with St. Paul's travels to Thessalonica, the chief city of Macedonia, where this apostle gathered a famous church, unto which he wrote two excellent epistles. Coming to Thessalonica at this time, he went, (as his manner was) into the synagogue, not into a private house. As Christ taught daily in the temple, so did his apostles teach in the synagogues; it was the false apostles that crept into houses, and led captive silly women, as St. Paul complains, 2 Tim. iii. 6. Truth seeks no corners, but rejoices to be publicly seen: Besides, the gospel was first to be preached to the Jews, and, upon their rejection, to the Gentiles. Accordingly the apostle takes the advantage of the synagogue, where all the Jews were gathered together, and preaches to them Jesus and the resurrection. Where note, The first grand point which the apostle insisted, was to demonstrate that Jesus, whom he preached, was the long expected Messiah. Now to prove this, he produces the prophecies of the Old Testament, and compares them with what was done and suffered by Christ, making all things as plain and obvious to the eye of their understandings, as if they had seen with their bodily eyes, satisfactorily demonstrating to their judgments, that Jesus is the Christ. Lastly, How the gospel is like the sea, what is lost in one place, is gained in another; St. Paul is sent away from Philippi, but by that means the gospel was preached at Thessalonica. God over-rules the motions of his ministers, and the madness and malice of their persecutors, for the furtherance and spreading of the gospel.

4 and some of them believed, and comforted with Paul and Silas: and of the devout Greeks a great multitude, and of the chief women not a few. 5 But the Jews which believed not, moved with envy, took unto them certain lewd fellows of the baser sort, and gathered a company, and set all the city on an uproar, and assaulted the house of Jason, and sought to bring them out to the people. 6 And when they found them not, they drew Jason and certain brethren unto the rulers of the city, crying. These that have turned the world upside down, are come hither also; 7 Whom Jason hath received: and all these do contrary to the decrees of Cæsar, saying, That there is another king, one Jesus. 8 And they troubled the people, and the rulers of the city, when they heard these things. 9 And when they taken security of Jason and of the other, they let them go.

The foregoing verses acquaint us with St. Paul's preaching at Thessalonica in the Jewish synagogue, as also with the argument he insisted upon; namely, that the Messiah, according to the scriptures, was to die, and rise again from the dead; and that Jesus whom he preached, was the Messiah. Now the verses before us acquaint us with the different success which this sermon had upon the hearers: Some believed, others were blinded; some were converted, others enraged. O the different and contrary effects which the word has upon its hearers! opening the eyes of others; to some it is a savour of life unto life, to others the savour of death. Those to whom the clearest light is afforded, who sinfully shut their eyes against it, and say they will not see, how just is it with God to close their eyes judicially, and say they shall not see! 2. How the apostle specifies and particularly declares the success which the preaching of the gospel had upon the people of Thessalonica, both good and bad. The good success in the fourth verse; some (though few) of the Jews were converted; but many profelytes, and not a few of the Gentiles, and a considerable number of the devout women, and honourable matrons of the city. The bad event and success is recorded, ver. 5. The unbelieving Jews called the lewd fellows of the city together into a confederacy with them, and raised a persecution against the apostles. Thence note 1. That the progress and prosperous success of the gospel ever was, is and will be a grievous eye sore to the devil and his instruments. 2. That the worst enemies which the gospel ever met with in the world, are the unbelieving Jews. Here, the Jews which believed not, engaged the rabble on their side, who are the fittest tools to raise persecution against the ministers of Christ: The Jews which believed not, took certain lewd fellows of the baser sort, and assaulted, &c. 3. That the devil's old method for raising persecution against the ministers and members of Jesus Christ, has been, and still is, to lay the most grievous crimes, falsely, to the Christians charge. Here the apostles are charged with innovation and sedition, with turning the world upside down. Thus afterwards, in the primitive times, whatever calamities came upon the state and kingdom, whatever commotions or tumults did arise in nations, presently Christianity was blamed, and instantly the Christians were cast to the lions; whereas it is not the gospel, but men's corruption, which breeds disturbance; as it is not the sea, but the foulness of the stomach, that makes the men sea-sick. 4. How mercifully and marvellously the Lord delivered the apostles, Paul and Silas, at this time, out of the hands of their persecutors: They sought them in the house of Jason, but found them not. The devil now missed of his prey, for the Lord hid the apostles here, as he did the prophets before, Jeremy and Baruch, Jer. xxxv. 1. 26. having more work, and farther service for them to do. The wise husbandman doth not commit all his corn to the oven, but reserves some for seed. Lastly, That as the panther, when it cannot come at the person, will fly upon and tear the picture in pieces; so these enraged persecutors, finding that the apostles were escaped their hands, fall foul upon Jason, who had entertained them, and drag him before the rulers and magistrates charging him as an abettor of treason: Yet, observe, How God over-ruled the hearts of these rulers, that they did offer no violence to Jason, but only took security of him, for his own and others appearance before them, when called for. Thus the Lord knows how to deliver the godly out of tribulation, and to make a way for escape.

10 ¶ And the brethren immediately sent away Paul and Silas by night unto Berea: who coming thither went into the synagogue of the Jews. 11 Those were more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the word with all readiness of mind, and searched the scriptures daily, whether those things were so. 12 Therefore many of them believed; also of honourable women which were Greeks, and of men not a few. 13 But when the Jews of Thessalonica had knowledge that the word of God was preached of Paul at Berea, they came thither also, and stirred up the people.

Note here, 1. The pious and prudential care which the brethren took of the holy apostles, and the means which they took for their preservation: They presently sent them away unto Berea. The devil seeks nothing so industriously, as the lives of the ministers of the gospel (they making the great opposition to him and his kingdom); but God finds out ways and means for their preservation, to reserve them for farther work and future service: The apostles came by night unto Berea. 2. St. Paul makes again the Jews synagogue his preaching-place, here at Berea, as he had done before at Thessalonica, ver. 2. and afterwards at Athens, ver. 17. O how close did the apostle keep to his commission, to preach Jesus Christ! first to the Jews, and to wait upon them with the repeated tender of the gospel, till they put it far from them, and judged themselves unworthy of eternal life, before he turned to the Gentiles. 3. The honourable character which the Holy Ghost here gives of these Bereans; They were more noble than those of Thessalonica: That is, of a more ingenious, mild, and pliable temper of mind; they were not so possessed with prejudice and obstinacy against the gospel; they did not meet it with rage, but thought it worthy their search and serious enquiry; for which they are styled more noble. Thence learn, that to be of a teachable temper, and tractable towards the gospel of Jesus Christ, is the best sort of gentility and nobleness. The Bereans were better bred, and better descended than the Thessalonians, yet not by civil human dignity, but by spiritual and divine dignation; God gave them this preparation of their heart, and made them to differ from their neighbours: These were more noble than those of Thessalonica. 4. What it is these Bereans are so highly commended for; namely, for searching the scriptures. Where note, 1. That the scriptures then were in the vulgar tongue. 2. That, as they were in their own tongue, so the laity had them in their own hands. 3. That the common people did read them, and heard them read, searched, and examined them; and yet were so far from censure and blame, that they met with commendation for it from God himself. From the whole, note. That a diligent reading of, and daily searching into the holy scriptures, is a duty incumbent upon all those in whose hands the scriptures are, or may be found. These christians at Berea searching the scriptures, were a noble pattern for all succeeding Christians to imitate and follow. Lastly, How the inveterate malice of the unbelieving Jews at Thessalonica pursued the apostle as far as Berea, ver. 13. When the Jews at Thessalonica had knowledge, &c. As Christ sends his ministers, so the devil sends his messengers from place to place: And as the ministers of Christ are never weary of his service for the good of souls, so persecutors are restless, they will compass sea and land to harass and drive the faithful an balladors of Christ from city to city, and, if it were in their power, to banish them out of the world. Lord, help all thy faithful ministers to execute this piece of holy revenge upon Satan, that we may be even with him for all his malice and spite against us. O let us endeavour to do all the possible service, and the utmost good we can, wherever we come.

14 And then immediately the brethren sent away Paul to go as it were to the sea: But Silas and Timotheus abode there still. 15 And they that conducted Paul brought him unto Athens: and receiving a commandment unto Silas and Timotheus for to come to him with all speed, they departed. 16 ¶ Now while Paul waited for them at Athens, his spirit was stirred in him when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry. 17 Therefore disputed he in the synagogue with the Jews, and with the devout persons, and in the market daily with them that met with him. 18 Then certain philosophers of the Epicureans and of the Stoics encountered him. And some, said, What will this babler say? others say, He seemeth to be a setter forth of strange gods: because he preached unto them Jesus and the resurrection. 19 And they took him, and brought him unto Areopagus, saying, May we know what this new doctrine whereof thou speakest is? 20 For thou bringest certain strange things to our ears: we would know therefore what these things mean. 21 For all the Athenians and strangers which were there, spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell or hear something new.

The prudential care which the believing brethren took of the holy apostle, was observed before, ver. 10. His life being in danger at Thessalonica, they send him to Berea; being pursued to Berea, they send him to Athens, and detain Silas and Timotheus: Not that St. Paul was more fearful than the other two, but more useful, and consequently more hateful to the unbelieving Jews, and his life more sought after. To preserve which, his friends use an innocent policy; they make as if they sent him away to sea; but really he goes on foot to Athens: Immediately the brethren sent away Paul to go as it were to the sea. Hence learn, That human policy and prudence may lawfully be made use of, in subserviency to divine providence. It was good policy and great providence in the apostle and his friends, to look one way and go another; to look towards the sea, and go to Athens by land. There is a wise and holy subtlety in foreseeing the evil, and hiding ourselves: A serpent's eye is a singular ornament in a dove's head: Piety without policy is too simple to be safe, and policy without piety is too subtle to be good: The sagacity of the serpent, and the innocency of the dove, both may and ought to go together. 2. The place which the apostle comes to, Athens, a sovereign city, a famous university; the eye of Greece, as Greece was reputed the eye of the world: Yet, notwithstanding all their scholarship they were ignorant of God in Christ; all their learning could not teach them to attain any saving knowledge, but both city and university are wholly given to idolatry. Learn hence, That human learning alone can never teach any place or people the divine truths of Christ and his gospel. It is a good handmaid, but a bad mistress; it is good in itself, but when corrupted by a busy devil, and a base heart, it degenerates into the worst instrument in the world: For corruptio optimi est pessima; "The sweetest wine makes the fourest vinegar." 3. The temper of the men of Athens described to us; they were great and greedy newsmongers, they spent their time in telling and hearing news of any sort. All which was the effect of an itching curiosity; a disease which had descended from age to age, from place to place, from person to person, occasioning a sinful expence of time, which can never be recalled; the neglect of our necessary affairs, which can never be redeemed; spreading false stories of others, and provoking displeasure against ourselves. O how wise and happy were it, if we enquired after news, not as Athenians, but as Christians! that we might know the better how to manage our prayers and praises for the church and nation. 4. How the wickedness and idolatry of this place did vehemently affect this great apostle; His spirit was stirred, when he saw the city full of idols, and wholly given to idolatry. Their idolatry put him into a paroxysm, as the word signified; his mind was in a confusion by contrary passions: He was affected first with sorrow and grief that a city should be so learned, and yet so blind; next with indignation and anger, at the superabounding idolatry of that knowing people; and lastly, with fervent zeal, and an ardent desire to undeceive them and better inform them. In order to which, he takes all opportunities, both in the city, in the synagogue, and in the market-place, to preach to the people, to dispute with the philosophers, particularly the Epicurians, who denied the providence of God, and the immortality of the soul; who placed all their happiness in pleasure, and held nothing to be desirable but what delighted their senses: And doctrine which made them rather swine than men. And also with the Stoics, who placed all happiness in want of passion, denied all freedom of will, and ascribed all events to an absent and irrevocable fate; and having disputed with them he preached Christ crucified, risen, and glorified to them; but he seemeth a babler to them, and a setter forth of strange gods. Whence learn, That Christ and his doctrine, the gospel, was the grand stumbling block both to Jew and Gentile, learned and unlearned. St. Paul took most pains to convert Athens, yet here his success was least, though it was a learned university, where, no doubt, were many men of excellent natural accomplishments. Hence we may infer, that if moral dispositions, and improvement of natural abilities, had fitted men for grace, we might have expected the greatest number of converts at Athens, where many were mocking, but very few believing. Surely the apostles' plantations there were different, not so much from the nature of the soil, as from the different influences of the Spirit. 4. How wonderfully the overruling providence of God concerning itself for the apostles' preservation at Athens; they hauled them away to their high court of judicature, which sat upon Mars-hill (so called, because the temple of Mars stood upon it) where the most learned men assembled, to hear and determine what new God was to be worshipped. Here note, 1. How the Providence of God brought St. Paul to a public place to preach in, Mar's hill, where was a confluence of all the people, and a congregation of the most learned Gentile philosophers: This gave the apostle a mighty opportunity for the service of preaching. And, 2. How tenderly the apostle was treated in this cruel court; although this court had condemned Diogenes, Protagoras, and Socrates himself, for undervaluing their gods, and bringing in new deities; yet the apostle's life is not only spared by their judgements, but they speak kindly and candidly to the apostle, and court him to gratify their curiosity, by informing them of this novelty, which they were so inquisitive after, and desired to hear more of his divine discourse. Thus the Lord eminently shews, how the hearts of men are in his hand, and that without his permission all the bitter enemies of his church shall not move a tongue, nor lift up a finger against any of his ministers and members.

22 Then Paul stood in the midst of Mars-hill, and said, Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious. 23 For as I passed by, and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD. Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you.

As if the apostle had said, "Ye men of Athens have a great number of gods, whom ye ignorantly worship: The God therefore whom ye acknowledge not to know, and yet profess to worship, is he that I preach unto you: For as I passed up and down in your city, beholding your altars and images, I found an altar with this inscription, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD." Here note, 1. The light of nature discovered: The altar is inscribed TO A GOD. The true God of the Jews was an unknown and uncertain God to the wisest of the Gentiles. Learn That some discoveries of God may be made, even by the light of nature: These heathens, who had nothing but the dim light of nature to guide and direct them, yet they own a God, and acknowledge a worship due unto him, by the erection of an altar. Note, 2. The darkness of nature discovered; the altar, though erected to a God, yet it is to a God unknown. Thence learn, That natural light, in its most elevated and raised improvements, can make no full and saving discoveries of God: The true God was but an unknown God, even to the wisest of the Heathens, the men of Athens, who were the most famous, in their day, for the severest wisdom and gravity.

24 God that made the world, and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands, 25 Neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed any thing, seeing he giveth to all life and breath and all things; 26 And he hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation; 27 That they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him and find him, though he be not far from every one of us: 28 For in him we live and move, and have our being: as certain also of your own poets have said, For we are also his offspring.

Here begins St. Paul's famous sermon to the men of Athens; in which the first thing that occurs to our observation is, how the preacher doth adapt and accommodate his discourse to the capacities of his hearers, as also to their sentiments and opinions. His auditory consisted of philosophers, particularly of Epicureans and Stoics; the former instead of God and a wise providence to make and govern the world, brought in fortune or blind chance, to bear all the sway. The latter, though they acknowledged a God yet introduced a rigid fatality, as superior to the Deity, denying to man all freedom and liberty of choice. Accordingly, St. Paul addresses himself first, to prove a God and a providence, to the exclusion both of fate and fortune; And then, secondly, from the very nature and notion of God, he infers the folly and absurdity of their Pagan superstition. Observe, next, The apostle's arguments to prove the being of a God, and a providence: (1.) From the works of creation: He made the world and all things therein he giveth life and breath, and all things. The whole universe is his work, he planted the earth, and replenished it with inhabitants. The invisible God is made visible in his creatures, and the being of God demonstrated from the formation of a world of creatures; from the formation of man in particular, In whom we live and move, &c. Here are three great benefits enjoyed by human nature: life, motion, and being, all derived from God, and demonstrating the being of God. (1.) Life: This is valuable above all blessings. (2.) Motion: A great mercy, but little considered: How uncomfortable would life be without it? Were we staked down to the earth, as trees; or did not move by a constant law of nature, as the sun and moon do move, it had been a favour beyond our desert; but to move as we do at pleasure, with choice and ease to help ourselves, and to assist others, is at once a demonstration of God's being, and an evidence of his bounty. (3.) Being: This is essential and necessary to none but God. To us it is an act of divine favour; and this being is a mercy; then being what we are, is a double mercy, that we do not creep and crawl upon the earth, as worms and toads, but are built high upon the earth, with wonderful wisdom and care; and that a soul, which is an immortal and an eternal being, inhabits within us; a being which shall continue when heaven and earth shall be consumed. Next, observe, The apostle having proved the being of a God, next demonstrates the certainty of a divine providence; He hath determined the times that are fore appointed, and the bounds of their habitations. That is, God has, as it were, chalked out, and drawn a line, where the bounds and habitations, whither the dominions of men should be extended, and where they shall be confined. The common blessings of God are not dispensed without a special providence; and the special providence of God, in upholding disposing and governing the world, doth as much prove the being of a God, as the general creation of it: Every hour's preservation is virtually a new creation, and both of them sufficient demonstrations of the divine being and bounty. Observe, lastly, The duty which the apostle infers on man's part, from all the goodness and bounty demonstrated on God's part: That they shall seek the Lord, and find him, who is not far from every one of us. It is the duty duty of all men to follow after God; that God hath made man should draw man after God; inasmuch as we are his offspring, (ver. 29) our hearts should spring and rise up to him in love and thankfulness: As the rivers, because they come from the sea, go back thither; so we, being the offspring of God, and derived from him, should be always returning to him. And if it be the duty of all men to follow after God, because they have natural life, breath, and motion from him; how much more should the new creature, who had a spiritual life breathed into him, and bestowed upon him, follow hard after God, in the enjoyment of whom his present happiness and future felicity doth consist? To follow God in his way, and to propose God as our end, contains the sum of all in y.

29 Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the God-head is like unto gold or silver or stone, graven by art and man's device.

Note here, 1. How our apostle quotes one of the heathen poets in this his divine discourse. This poet was Aratus; what he attributes to Jupiter, St. Paul applies to the true God; We are his offspring. Where note, For the honour of human learning and the lawfulness of making use of it in our sermons, the Holy Ghost is pleased three several times in the New Testament to make mention of the heathen poets; of Aratus, Acts xvii. 28. of Menander, 1. Cor. xv. 33. of Epimenides, Tit. i. 12. Truth is God's wherever it is found; as a mine of gold is the king's, in whose ground soever it is discovered: 2. The force of the apostle's argument, seeing we are God's offspring; that is, seeing God is our Creator, we cannot suppose him to be the workmanship of our hands; as an image of gold, silver, or stone is; and consequently, how irrational it is for a man to adore an image made by his own hands, for, and instead of God. Learn, That there is a strong propensity and inclination in the heart of man to the sin of idolatry. Secondly, That the sin of idolatry is not only a very great sin, but a very unreasonable and absurd sin; it is not only sacrilegious, but silly, for a man to worship his own workmanship, and to fall down upon his knees to the work of his own hands.

30 And the times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men every where to repent.

That is, "Though God of his infinite patience hath long borne with the world lying in darkness and ignorance; yet now by causing his gospel to be preached to all nations, he calls and invites them to repentance, to forsake their idols, and serve the true God." Here observe, 1. The censure of the past times, they were times of ignorance, and God winked at them, or overlooked them; not that God did allow or approve of their idolatry, though he did not destroy and put them off for the same; nor afford them such helps and means as he now did, having brought his gospel among them. 2. The duty of the present time declared, to repent: This is a commanded duty, and an universally commanded duty; Now he commanded all men every where to repent. From the whole note, 1. That times of Paganism were times of ignorance. 2. That it is an unspeakable misery to be born and brought up in such times. 3. That to live impatiently in times of knowledge, is a sin that God will by no means wink at. 4. That the great purpose and design of the gospel: where soever it is sent and preached, is to invite men to repentance; Now he commandeth all men every where to repent.

31 Because he hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness, by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead.

These words are an argument or motive to enforce the foregoing duty of repentance; God requires every man, every where and that now immediately, to forsake their idol and sinful way; because he hath appointed a day wherein he will judge the world in righteousness by his Son Christ Jesus, of which he hath already given assurance by raising him from the dead. Where note, 1. A judgment day is appointed: He (that is, God) will judge the world; do that hath now an understanding eye, will hereafter have another opening: 2. That there is not only a judgment to come, but the day or time of it is determined and fixed; He hath appointed a day. As the precise time of Christ's first time was fixed by an unalterable, though an unknown decree, so is also the time of his second coming: that not knowing the hour, we may be upon our watch every hour.

3. That as the day of judgment is determined, so the person of the Judge is also constituted and ordained. He will judge the world whom he hath ordained. This is an act of justice to our Saviour, that he, having humbled himself to take our nature, should, as the reward of his humiliation, judge that world which he died to save. And an act of kindness towards us, that he should be our Judge, who took upon him our nature, and had so much love to us as die for us. Had we leave to chuse our own justice, what choice could we make better for ourselves than that man whom God hath ordained? 4. The assurance which God has given us of having Christ for our Judge; namely his raising him from the dead: But how doth that assure us of Christ being our judge? Ans. Our blessed Saviour, when he was in the world often declared that he was appointed by God to judge the quick and the dead, and appealed to his resurrection as the great proof of what he had said. Now when Almighty God did accordingly raise him in such a wonderful manner (as we know he did) what is it less than God's setting his seal to his commission and openly proclaiming him to be the Judge of all the world? 5. The manner of this judgment or the measures which this Judge will proceed by at the great day; and that is according to righteousness; He will judge the world in righteousness; Not in rigour and severity taking all the advantages that power can give him nor yet arbitrarily and upon prerogative but according to known laws; nor yet partially, with respect of persons, but every man's doom shall depend upon the holiness or unholiness of his heart and life. Farther, our Judge will candidly interpret men's actions, and make the very best of things that the case will bear; principally looking at the truth and sincerity of men's intentions, and making all favourable allowance for their failings and infirmities that can consist with justice; and will distribute his rewards of happiness and glory to good men in the other world, in proportion to the measures of their difficulties and sufferings which they meet with here in this world. Now, having this high and full assurance of a judgment to come, let us seriously believe it, daily expect it, and duly prepare for it; let neither profit tempt us, nor pleasure allure us, nor power embolden us, nor privacy encourage us to do that thing which we cannot answer at the great tribunal. When St. Paul preached of judgment, Felix, though a pagan, trembled at the sermon; Lord: what shall we say to those worse than pagan infidels amongst ourselves, who ridicule a judgment to come, and cry beforehand, God judge me! yea, God damn me, alas! unhappy men! he will judge you sure enough, and damn you soon enough, if a serious repentance prevent it not.

32 And when they heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked: and others said, we will hear thee again of this matter. 33 So Paul departed from among them. 34 ¶ Howbeit certain men clave unto him, and believed: among the which was Dionysius the Areopagite, and a woman named Damaris, and others with them;

Here we have the success of St. Paul's sermon declared; it was various and different, some of his hearers derided, others doubted, and a few believed: Those that derided and mocked, it is very probable, were the Epicurians, who denied that the world was either created or governed by God; as also that there were any rewards or punishments for men after death; therefore they ridiculed St. Paul's doctrine of the dead. The sublimest doctrines, and most comfortable truths of the gospel, are matter of derision and mockery to sensual minds. Those that doubted, probably were the Stoics, who did own the resurrection and a state of rewards and punishments in another world; and therefore, for obtaining better satisfaction to their doubts, desired to hear the apostle again discoursing farther of that matter. Those that believed are few indeed, if no more than are here mentioned, which are Dionysius and Damaris, with some others: Dionysius was a famous person, one of the great council, mentioned ver. 19. whose conversion probably might afterwards have a great influence upon many others and it was no small honour and advantage to the gospel, to be owned by such an honourable person as this Dionysius was; not many wise, not many noble are called: Blessed be God that any were, that any are, that any of the great ones of the world stoop to the sceptre of Jesus Christ, and pay homage and subjection to him.—Thus ends the apostle's divine sermon at the famous university of Athens, which yielded few, very few converts to St. Paul: For we read of no church founded here, as we did before at Philippi (and in the next chapter at Corinth): What reason can be assigned but this, That these grave philosophers, profound scholars, venerable senators and citizens, who had a name for wisdom throughout the world, were too wise to be saved by the foolishness of preaching? As the wisdom of the world is foolishness with God, so the wisdom of God in the gospel is accounted foolishness by the wise men of the world; according to that of the apostle, 1. Cor. i. 21, 22, 23, 24, 25. When the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased, &c.

C H A P. XVIII.

AFTER these things Paul departed from Athens and came to Corinth;

The foregoing chapter acquainted us with the small success which St. Paul found of his ministry at Athens; upon his preaching Jesus and the resurrection there, the philosophers and wise men mocked and derided him. If natural dispositions and abilities had fitted men for grace, we might have expected the greater number of converts at Athens, where many were mockers, but very few believers: Here upon St. Paul leaves Athens, and goes to Corinth, a famous city in Achaia; where he meets with more encouragement and better success; for here he gathers a famous church, unto which he writes two epistles, under the title of the first and second epistles to the Corinthians.

2 And found a certain Jew named Aquila, born in Pontus, lately come from Italy with his wife Priscilla, (Because that Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome) and came unto them.

3 And, because he was of the same craft, he abode with them, and wrought: for by their occupation they were tent-makers.

The apostle being now come to Corinth, where he was altogether a stranger, and wanting money for his subsistence, the providence of God directed him to the house of Aquila and Priscilla; who being of the same trade with himself, (tent-makers) he works with his own hands to maintain himself, that he might not be burdensome to others. Here note, 1. The occasion of Aquila's and Priscilla's coming to Corinth, with whom St. Paul lodged. The Roman emperor Claudius had banished them from Italy and Rome, ver. 2. Claudius commanded all the Jews to depart from Rome. Thence note, That a wicked world is soon weary of the saints of God, and longs to worm them out of their cities and societies, never considering that their own preservation from ruin is for the saints sake: As the alleys in the garden are watered for the sake of the flowers, which would otherwise lie dry. 2. That the apostle had learned a trade, tent-making, before he was called to the ministry, and he wrought upon it occasionally after he was a minister. The most learned among the Jews did always learn some handicraft trade, it being a tradition amongst them, "That he that does not learn his child a trade, teaches him to be a thief." So that although their children were designed for students, yet they did learn some trade. Accordingly St. Paul having learned to make tents (much used in those hot countries, by soldiers and others, to keep off the violence of the weather) he works at Corinth upon his trade for his own subsistence. Men separated to the ministry of the gospel; may, upon an exigency, labour for their living; not but that the apostle had power and sufficient warrant to challenge maintenance for his preaching as he often intimates in his epistles, but there was not yet any church at Corinth to maintain him : and when there was, they were mostly of the poorer and meaner sort of people, and he would give them a convincing demonstration, that he sought not theirs, but them ; he demands therefore no maintenance, lest it should hinder the success of his ministry ; but being of the same trade with Aquila and Priscilla, he takes up his lodging with them at Corinth and works at their trade.

4 And he reasoned in the synagogue every sabbath, and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks. 5 And when Silas and Timotheus were come from Macedonia, Paul was pressed in spirit, and testified to the Jews that Jesus was Christ. 6 And when they opposed themselves, and blasphemed, he shook his raiment, and said unto them, Your blood be upon your own heads ; I am clean : from henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles.

Note here, How vehemently desirous the holy apostle was to plant a christian church at Corinth, and to bring the Jews of Corinth to embrace the gospel ; He was pressed in spirit and testified ; that is, reasoned with them, with great vehemency and earnestness of affection ; as well as with great judgment, concerning the Messiah. 2. That the Jewish synagogue at Corinth was the preaching place that St. Paul made choice of, hoping to gather the beginnings of his christian church out of the converted Jews : He reasoned in the synagogues every Sabbath day. Still the apostle kept to his commission, to preach the gospel, first to the Jews, and after wards, upon their rejection to the Gentiles. 3. The blasphemous opposition which the Jews made to the doctrine of the gospel ; They opposed themselves and blasphemed ; that is, they opposed his doctrine, reviled his person, and blasphemed Christ, whom that apostle preached. 4. How the holy apostle clears himself of the blood of those Jews, whom he had now preached the gospel unto ; he said, Your blood be upon your own heads ; I am clean. The faithful ministers of Christ shall never have the blood of a perishing people laid to their charge ; they having warned them of their damnable state, and discovered the way of life and salvation to them, deliver their own souls ; whilst the people which they preached to, die in their sins, and for their sins.

7 And he departed thence, and entered into a certain man's house named Justus, one that worshipped God ; whose house joined hard to the synagogue. 8 And Crispus the chief ruler of the synagogue believed on the Lord, with all his house : and many of the Corinthians hearing, believed, and were baptized. 9 ¶ Then spake the Lord to Paul in the night by a vision, Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace : 10 For I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee : for I have much people in this city. 11 And he continued there a year and six months, teaching the word of God among them.

Note here, 1. That the opposition which St. Paul met with, while he lodged in the house of Aquila and Priscilla moved him to change his quarters, and betake himself to a new lodging ; he goes into the house of Justus by birth a Gentile, but a Jewish proselyte, whose house joined nigh to the synagogue where St. Paul's preaching work lay, to such as would be willing to hear him. 2. The good success the chief ruler of the synagogue, and his household, were brought to believe, and were baptized : After whose example, many of the people in Corinth believed also. Rulers and great men are like looking-glasses in the places where they live, by which many dress themselves. 3. That notwithstanding this good success which St. Paul had at Corinth, he seems through human frailty to be possessed with fear, and under an apprehension of danger from the Jews, and accordingly had thoughts of leaving the city ; against which fears God antidotes him with a gracious promise of his presence with him : Be not afraid, for I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee, to hurt thee. - Hence learn, 1. That the best and holiest of God's saints and servants are sometimes under sad and slavish fears, and prone to be discouraged, when they meet with difficulties in the way of their duty. 2. That the promise and assurance of God's gracious presence with them, will raise them up above all fears, and be a sufficient encouragement to them, for their abiding in any place, and amongst any people, let the difficulty or danger be what it will ; Be not afraid, for I am with thee, and none shall hurt thee. 4. A farther encouragement given by God to the apostle, to continue his ministry still at Corinth ; I have much people in this city : That is, Here are many souls whom I design effectually to call and bring home by thy ministry : Accordingly the apostle continued his ministry among them a year and six months. Learn hence, That although the ingratitude and perverseness of a people so sadly discourage their ministers and tempt them to remove from them, yet God encourages them to their duty ; that for the malice of some the salvation of others may be not neglected. 2. That no opposition must discourage the ministers of God in the way of their duty ; God's servants must not suffer themselves to be out-done by the devils slaves, but bear down all opposition made against them with patience and joyfulness : And notwithstanding, all the malicious opposition made by the Jews against the apostle, yet did he continue a year and six months to preach at Corinth : Christ had a great harvest, ripening, in that city, to be reaped by the apostle's ministry ; and being encouraged with the promise of his protecting presence, he committed himself to the divine care, and the Lord both preserved and succeeded him.

12 ¶ And when Gallio was the deputy of Achaia, the Jews made insurrection, with one accord, against Paul, and brought him to the judgment-seat. 13 Saying, This fellow persuadeth men to worship God contrary to the law. 14 And when Paul was now about to open his mouth Gallio said unto the Jews, If it were a matter of wrong or wicked lewdness, O ye Jews, reason would that I should bear with you :

15. But if it be a question of words and names, and of your law, look ye to it: for I will be no judge of such matters. 16 And he drave them from the judgment-seat. 17 Then all the Greeks took Sosthenes, the chief ruler of the synagogue, and beat him before the judgment-seat. And Gallio cared for none of those things.

Note here, 1. How St Paul taking heart from the foregoing promise made by God unto him goes on courageously in the work of his ministry at Corinth; but the unbelieving Jews were so enraged against him, that they combined to gether as one man, and with one accord, made insurrection against Paul. Where note, What great unity and unanimity there is amongst wicked men, the devil's friends; he well knows, that his kingdom could not long stand if it were divided. The unity of all societies is their strength. 2. They accuse the apostle before Gallio the deputy, for persuading men to worship God contrary to the law of Moses. Who would not think but that these men were truly pious, virtuous, and good, who were so zealous for the worship of God according to the law? And yet were they wicked men, and fiery persecutors. There is a noisy religion in the world; some men think, by crying, The church, The church, and by pleading loud for the worship of God, as established by law, to atone for all their immoralities: Praying is good, hearing and receiving the sacrament are good, if they be joined with holy walking; but if otherwise, the howling of wolves is as acceptable to Almighty God, as the prayers of those men who call Christ Master, and the church Mother, but do not the things which they have commanded; yea, the very dogs which follow them to the public assemblies, shall as soon find acceptance as themselves, if they do not obey him whom they pretend to adore. It is no matter what church a wicked man is of, for it is certain he can be saved in none. 3. What low and mean thoughts Gallio had and all persons prejudiced against religion and the power of godliness have, of sincere christianity: If it be a question of words and names, says Gallio. As if he had said, "Do not trouble me about the niceties of your religion, decide such questions among yourselves; for I will be no judge in such matters. The great men of the world little care to trouble their heads about the matters of religion; they look upon it only as a matter of notion and speculation: Whereas it is not a speculative science, but a practical art of holy living. And accordingly, like Gallio, they care for none of these things. Lastly, that although this Gallio had no kindness for Christianity, yet God made use of him as an instrument, at this time, to preserve and free St. Paul from the rage of his enemies insomuch, that he drove his accusers from the judgment-seat: Thus God performed his promise to Paul, suffering no man to hurt him; but causing Gallio the governor to defend him, who his enemies were in hopes would have destroyed him. Lord, how happy and wisest it for thy servants to commit the care of themselves to thee in well doing! If we, with a purity of intention, concern ourselves for thy glory, thou wilt certainly take care of our safety; or if any danger should come, danger itself shall do us no harm.

18 And Paul after this tarried there yet a good while, and then took his leave of the brethren, and sailed thence into Syria: and with him Priscilla and Aquila; having shorn his head in Cenchrea: for he had a vow. 19 And he came to Ephesus, and left them there; but he himself entered into the synagogue, and reasoned with the Jews. 20 When they desired him to tarry longer time with them, he consented not: 21 But bade them farewell, saying, I must by all means keep this feast that cometh in Jerusalem: but I will return again unto you, if God will. And he sailed from Ephesus. 22 And when he had landed at Cesarea, and gone up and saluted the church, he went down to Antioch. 23 And after he had spent some time there he departed, and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, strengthening all the disciples.

A farther account is here given of the laborious travels of the great apostle St. Paul; namely, from Corinth to Ephesus, from Ephesus to Cesarea, from Cesarea to Antioch, &c. Where note, 1. That St. Paul having continued a year and a half at Corinth, and planted a church there, which yet soon after sadly degenerated; he determines now to sail to Ephesus; and accordingly at Cenchrea, a haven near to that city, he shaved his head for he had a vow; that is, the vow of a Nazarite, which he, (that is, Aquila say some, St. Paul, say others,) had before taken upon him for a time, whereby he was obliged to abstain from wine, and shaving his head, and touching the dead. But having now accomplished his vow, he shorn his head, and returned to the common way of living: where the wisdom and moderation of this great apostle in complying in indifferent things is to be noted and imitated: To the Jews he became as a Jew, that he might gain the Jews: He willingly complied with their weakness, to shew that he was no con-temner of their law; for which reason he caused Timothy to be circumcised and purified himself in the temple at Jerusalem. And behold the success this his compliance; for, by gratifying the Jews in this condescension to the prescription of the law, he brought over very many of them to the faith of Christ. Let not any suspect this for a sinful compliance with the Jews, in observing a ceremony which the gospel had abolished, nor censure it for a low and mean stoop in so great a man, to the humour of the people: for though the ceremonial rites died with Christ, yet they were a long time in burying, and the Jews were indulged in the observation of them, till they came to a clearer sight of their Christian liberty: Accordingly, the apostle yielded to them for their present indifferent things, without dissimulation or blame. 2. The apostle being now come to Ephesus he taught in the synagogue of the Jews, and reasoned with them: Where we may note, Both how close the apostle kept his commission, in first preaching the word of life to the Jews, and also the fervent love which he bare to his own countrymen, whom, though he had suffered all manner of indignities from, yet doth he give them precept upon precept, line upon line; and with an unwearied diligence dispenses the word of life and salvation to them. 3. Our apostle stays not long at Ephesus, but hastens to Jerusalem to keep the feast there; namely, the feast of the passover; not that he thought himself obliged to observe the feasts, or any of the antiquated ceremonies; but because of the vast concourse which he knew would be at Jerusalem at the time of the feast from all quarters, and which would give him an opportunity to make Christ known to a great multitude. The ministers of the gospel, without the imputation of vain-glory, or seeking popular applause, may warrantably desire, and occasionally lay hold upon an opportunity of dispensing the word to a numerous auditory, in hope that casting the net among many, they may include some. Lastly, The incessant care, indefatigable diligence and unwearied pains of this great apostle in travelling from place to place, and at such great distance, to preach the everlasting gospel to lost sinners: from Ephesus he sails to Cesarea, from Cesarea to Jerusalem, from Jerusalem to Antioch, from Antioch to Galatia and Phrygia. See how the care of all the churches was upon him, and how he laboured more abundantly than they all. Lord, what a pattern is here of ministerial diligence and faithfulness! What pains did St. Paul take, what hazards did he run, in planting and propagating the gospel of Christ! In labours more abundant, in sufferings above measure! Well might he say, I am able to do all things through Christ that strengthens me. And blessed be God, the same power that assisted him, stands ready to succour us; and if ever he calls us to an extraordinary service, he will come in with more than an ordinary strength.

24 ¶ And a certain Jew, named Apollos, born at Alexandria, an eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures, came to Ephesus. 25 This man was instructed in the way of the Lord; and being fervent in the Spirit, he spake and taught diligently the things of the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John. 26 And he began to speak boldly in the synagogue: Whom when Aquila and Priscilla had heard, they took him unto them, and expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly. 27 And when he was disposed to pass into Achaia, the brethren wrote, exhorting the disciples to receive him; who, when he was come, helped them much which had believed through grace. 28 For he mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, shewing by the scriptures that Jesus was Christ.

The first thing here observable, is, How the wisdom of God provided for the several churches, that in the absence of one powerful preacher, they were supplied with another; when the providence of God called St. Paul from Ephesus and Corinth, it brought Apollos thither; so that what Paul planted, Apollos watered. The judicious Calvin, upon the place, piously admires the providence of God over his church, in not suffering it to be without a settled minister; but upon the removal of one, to raise up another. 2. How admirably qualified Apollos was for the work of the gospel, and excellently fitted and furnished for the places he was called to, Ephesus and Corinth, famous for philosophers and orators; accordingly he is a man of ravishing eloquence, who, by his profound knowledge in the sacred scriptures, was both apt to teach the truth, and able to maintain it. Learn hence, That scripture knowledge is the choicest qualification, and highest commendation of a gospel-minister; Apollos, an eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures: Without this, he can never truly and savingly make known and discover Jesus Christ; without this he can never rightly divide the word of truth; without this he can never convince gain-sayers, either gain-sayers in opinion, or gain-sayers in practice; without this, he can never instruct the people fully in their duty, nor declare to them the whole counsel of God, Observe, 3. The great humility of Apollos; although he was an eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures, yet he did not disdain farther instruction. Those that are most knowing, if humble, are most sensible of their ignorance. The knowledge of the best, while they are on this side heaven, is capable of improvements. Apollos knew much, yet Aquila and Priscilla farther enlightened him, so that he knew more. An humble man will be content to learn of the meanest woman. These poor rent-makers, Aquila and his wife Priscilla, catechize the great Apollos, and add something to the treasure of his knowledge. 4. The place where Apollos preached; in the Jewish synagogue, ver. 26. He began to speak boldly in the synagogue. It was a custom among the Jews to allow a liberty for learned men, though no priests, to teach in their synagogues. Thus Paul, though of the tribe of Benjamin, and not of the tribe of Levi, was permitted to preach in their synagogues; as we read through out this book of the acts. In like manner we find Apollos here preaching in the synagogue: Non ut habens auctoritatem sed scientiam, says Estius: Taking the advantage of that indulgence which the Jews gave him in their synagogues, to preach, and spread the doctrine of Christ. Note lastly, That this Apollos afterwards became an eminent authorized preacher in the church of Corinth, and is called St. Paul's helper and brother; and when he came to Corinth, was so eminent that he proved the head of a sect or faction: One said, I am of Paul, and I of Apollos: And here at Ephesus he mightily convinced the Jews, shewing by the scriptures that Jesus was the Christ.

C H A P. XIX.

AND it came to pass, that while Apollos was at Corinth, Paul having passed through the upper coasts, came to Ephesus; and finding certain disciples, 2 He said unto them, Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? And they said unto him, We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost. 3 And he said unto them, Unto what then were ye baptized? And they said, Unto John's baptism. 4 Then said Paul, John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people, That they should believe on him which should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus

Jesus. 5 When they heard this they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. 6 And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them, and they spake with tongues, and prophesied. 7 And all the men were about twelve.

The latter end of the foregoing chapter informed us how Apollos was employed at Corinth: The beginning of this acquaints us how St. Paul spent his time at Ephesus. He finds there twelve disciples, he catechizes them, lays his hands upon them, and God confers the gifts of the Holy Ghost. Here note, 1. The question put by St. Paul to the twelve disciples; Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? He doth not mean in its sanctifying operations, but in its miraculous gifts; as speaking with tongues, the gift of prophecy, and the gift of healing. 2. The disciples answer, We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost; not that they were ignorant of the essence or person of the Holy Ghost, but had not heard of the effusion of the extraordinary and miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost; for it was a received opinion among the Jews, that after the death of Haggai, Zachariah, and Malachi, the Holy Ghost, or the spirit of prophecy, departed from Israel: and they never heard that he was returned, or of his being given a-new with his miraculous gifts. 3. How the apostle sets them right: They tell him they were baptized unto John's baptism: The apostle tells them that John's baptism and Christ's were the same for substance, and had both the same end, though they differed in some circumstances. The disciples of John believed in Christ to come, the disciples of Jesus believed in Christ as already come, and were baptized in that faith; and the ordinance sealed unto both the remission of sins: Yet it being essential to Christian baptism, to baptize in the name of the Father, the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, thereby professing ourselves to be buried and risen with Christ; and John's baptism having not this, when the disciples heard that, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus; that is, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, which is of the essence of Christian baptism. 4. How the apostle lays his hands upon these disciples, to confirm them in the faith they were baptized into; whereupon the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost were immediately conferred on them, and they spake divers tongues, which before they understood not, and were endued with the gift of prophesying; that is, of declaring things to come, and interpreting the writings of the prophets, that they might be fit to teach and instruct others. Hence learn, That, at the first planting and propagating of the gospel, the wisdom of God thought fit to furnish the preachers and dispensers of it with extraordinary gifts and miraculous powers, to qualify them for, and to give them assurance of the success of their ministry; and also to assure those, whom they preached unto, that their doctrine was from heaven, Almighty God never setting the seal of his omnipotency to a lie. Such miraculous gifts are long since ceased in the church. the cause of them, and occasion for them, being long since ceased.

8 And he went into the synagogue, and spake boldly for the space of three months, disputing and persuading the things concerning the kingdom of God. 9 But when divers were hardened, and believed not, but spake evil of that way before the multitude, he departed from them, and separated the disciples, disputing daily in the school of one Tyrannus. 10 And all this continued by the space of two years; so that all they which dwelt in Asia, heard the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks. 11 And God wrought special miracles by the hands of Paul; 12 So that from his body were brought unto the sick, handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them.

St. Paul being now come to Ephesus with a design to stay there for some considerable time, as his manner was he enters into the synagogue, and preaches the gospel first to the Jews, and this for the space of three months, but when, instead of embracing the gospel, they opposed it, blaspheming Christ the author, and the apostle the dispenser of it, and vehemently contending with him for preaching the gospel, (which some conceive he calls his fighting with beasts at Ephesus, 1 Cor. xv. 32) he left the Jews and their synagogue, separating the Christians which were at Ephesus from them, whom he daily instructed in a certain place, called The school of Tyrannus, Here note, 1. The vehemency of St. Paul's affection to his own countrymen the people of the Jews, notwithstanding all the opposition they made against his doctrine, and the virulent reproaches which they cast upon his person; he continues to preach in their synagogue at Ephesus for three months without ceasing, thereby keeping close to his commission, which was to preach the gospel to the Jews, and, upon their rejection of it, to tender the word of life unto the Gentiles. 2. As great an apostle, and as faithful a minister as St. Paul was, yet he wanted to see the success of his labours: many of his hearers at Ephesus believed not his word, but were hardened under it. The same sun that softens the wax, hardens the clay: The same doctrine of the gospel becomes the savour of death unto some, which is the savour of life unto others. Wo be unto that people, who, by their habitual hardness, through their actual resisting the impressions of God's word, do provoke the Almighty to superadd judicial hardness of heart unto them, making their sin to become their punishment. 3. How, upon this opposition, which St. Paul met with in the Jewish synagogue, he leaves it, and retires to a more private place, the school of Tyrannus, where he had more freedom and less opposition. Learn hence, That such places of public worship, where nothing but contradiction to the pure christian doctrine can be met with, may be lawfully withdrawn from. The apostle separates himself and the disciples from the Jews synagogue, where he had preached three months; meeting only with contradiction to his doctrine, and blasphemy against his dear Redeemer. 4. How it pleased God to confirm St Paul's ministry at Ephesus by his working miracles; and the miracles he wrought were special, special, that is, very extraordinary, inasmuch that even handkerchiefs or aprons having but touched St. Paul's body, and being brought unto the diseased, became a miraculous means both to cure diseases, and cast out devils. Thus, according to our Saviour's promise, his apostles did greater miracles than himself, John xiv. 12. not greater in regard of the manner, but in regard of the matter of them: Christ wrought miracles in his own name, and by his own power: but the apostles wrought theirs in the name, and by the power of Christ; yet it ought to be observed and considered, that although it pleased God, at the first plantation of the gospel by the apostles, to confirm Christianity by many special miracles, (as new set plants are well watered, till they have taken fast-rooting) yet that church which wants miracles, may be a true church: Because, (1.) There is no promise made in the scriptures to the church for her perpetual enjoying the gift of miracles. That promise, Mark xvi. 17. These signs shall follow them that believe, &c. was only a temporary promise. (2.) We are forbidden to expect miracles, John iv. 48. and forbidden to trust to promises without scripture, or to regard such miracles as are wrought to confirm any doctrine that is contrary to scripture, Deut. xiii. 3. because the miracles of the last times are declared to be the signs of Antichrist, 2 Theff. ii. 9, 10. From all which, it follows, that miracles are no infallible note of the true church, as the papist's would make it; who also produce St. Paul's handkerchief here, and St. Peter's shadow, Acts v. 15. as a warrant for their superstitious relics; but the text assures us, it was God that wrought the special miracles, not St. Paul, nor his handkerchiefs, but God by his hand. The miracles in the church of Rome, pretended to be wrought by the relics of saints and martyrs, are no better than lying wonders.

13 Then certain of the vagabond Jews, exorcists took upon them to call over them which had evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus, saying, We adjure you by Jesus whom Paul preacheth. 14 And there were seven sons of one Sceva, a Jew, and chief of the priests, which did so. 15 And the evil spirit answered and said, Jesus I know, and Paul I know; but who are ye? 16 And the man in whom the evil spirit was, leapt on them, and overcame them and prevailed against them, so that they fled out of that house naked and wounded. 17 And this was known to all the Jews and Greeks also dwelling at Ephesus; and fear fell on them all, and the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified. 18 And many that believed came and confessed, and shewed their deeds. 19 Many also of them which used curious arts, brought their books together, and burned them before all men: and they counted the price of them and found it fifty thousand pieces of silver. 20 So mightily grew the word of God, and prevailed.

Here observe, 1. That we read not of any in the Old Testament, that were bodily possessed with devils and evil spirits: but in the new Testament, we meet with many, both in our Saviour's time, and also in the apostles, to the intent that the power of Christ might more signally appear in their ejection and casting out. 2. How some of the Jewish exorcists (like our jugglers) who made it their trade to wander up and down, to get a livelihood by pretending to cure diseases, and cast out devils, seeing what great miracles Paul had wrought in the name of Jesus attempted to cast a devil out of a possessed man, by using the same name, though in Jesus they believed not: But Satan was so far from obeying them, that he made the possessed man fall violently upon them, and wound them. Thence learn, 1. That Satan scorns all human attempts, as weak and impotent and that he is conquered only by a divine power. Jesus I know, but who are ye? Learn, 2. That the devil would be gladly God's ape: The Jewish jugglers would by all means imitate the apostles in casting out devils: accordingly, they use the name of Jesus as a charm; but saying the same words with the apostles, signified nothing with out exercising the same faith and grace. These exorcists soon found that words without faith would not work to cast out devils, and that Christ would not give power to his name, when used as a charm. 3. That the devil by God's permission, has power over those who profane the name of Christ: Satan here was too hard for these conjurers, he rushes upon them and masters them, tears their clothes, wounds their bodies, and had not God restrained him, had unavoidably destroyed them. Satan's malice is infinite, but his power is limited and bounded. Lord, abate his power, since his malice cannot be abated! Lastly, How this execution of divine vengeance wrought wonderfully for the conviction and conversion both of Jews and Greek, ver. 18. Many believed, and came and confessed their sinful deeds. And, as an evidence of their detestation of their former faults and follies, they make a bonfire of all their magical books; burning so many of them, as the learned say, the price amounted to eight hundred pounds. Thus these conjurers evinced themselves to be real converts, by plucking out their right eye, and cutting off their right hand; that is, sacrificing their bosom and best beloved lust and corruption. Thence learn, That there is no better evidence of the truth of a person's conversion, than cheerfully to part with a very profitable and pleasing lust.

21 After these things were ended, Paul purposed in the spirit, when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem, saying, After I have been there, I must also see Rome. 22 So he sent into Macedonia, two of them that ministered unto him, Timotheus and Erastus; but he himself staid in Asia for a season. 23 And the same time there arose no small stir about that way. 24 For a certain man named Demetrius, a silver-smith, which made silver shrines for Diana, brought no small gain to the craftsmen; 25 Whom he called together with the workmen of like occupation, and said, Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth: 26 Moreover, ye see and hear that not alone at Ephesus but almost throughout all Asia, this Paul hath persuaded and turned away much people, saying, That they be no gods which are made with hands: 27 So that not only this our craft is in danger to be set at nought, but also that the temple of the great goddess Diana should be despised, and her magnificence should be destroyed, whom all Asia and the world worshippeth. 28 And when they heard these sayings, they were full of wrath, and cried out, saying Great is Diana of the Ephesians. 29 And the whole city was filled with confusion: and having caught Gaius and Aristarchus, men of Macedonia, Paul's companions in travel, they rushed with one accord into the theatre.

Observe here, 1. How angry the devil grows at the success of the gospel, mentioned in the foregoing verses; there we read how the whole college of diabolical conjurers were brought over, by the apostle's preaching at Ephesus, to burn their books and leave their wicked course of life. Hereupon the devil bestirs him, and raises a persecution against the apostle. Those that will disturb Satan in the quiet and peaceable possession of his kingdom, shall be sure to meet with trouble and disquiet from him. Let not any of the saints of God in general, nor any of the faithful and zealous ministers of Christ in particular, expect any long continuance of their outward tranquility and peace in this world, where they are every day up in arms against Satan, and meditating the ruin of him and his kingdom; for which he will certainly seek revenge. 2. The instruments which the devil employs to raise the storm of persecution against the apostle, namely, Demetrius, the silver-smith, and his craftsmen; they looking upon St. Paul as one that impaired their profit, and spoiled their trade of making silver shrines for Diana's temple, by his crying down the worship of idols. "But what were these silver shrines made for Diana's temple?" The temple of Diana was at that time one of the seven famous structures of the world; and the silver shrines made by these silver-smiths, were certain models or images of this temple, wherein their idol goddess Diana was set forth; which shrines or portable temples, all the people of Asia carried about with them, to stir up their own devotions towards this idol: So that this shrine making must needs be a very gainful trade, when all Asia was addicted to this superstition. No wonder then that Demetrius, upon the sight of the loss of his gain made on horrible outcry, and set the city in an uproar: For carnal men, whose gain is their god and their godliness, account themselves undone when their god Mammon is in danger: If you take away their gods, what have they more? Learn hence. That gain-getting and maintaining of men's livelihood, are mighty temptations to carnal men, to use impious means for supporting superstition and idolatry. Observe 3. The arguments which Demetrius used to stir up the people against the apostle; and they are three: (1.) The plea of profit, By this craft we get our gain; If this man's doctrine obtain, our trade will quickly fall under disgrace, and die. This was the most cogent, the most pungent argument that could be used; for, though an argument drawn from our own interest is not the most weighty, yet it is the most persuasive. (2.) The pretence of piety; not only are we like to lose our livelihood, but our religion too: Our Goddess Diana will be despised, her temple profaned and her worshippers scorned. This easily heated the blood of the rabble, put the multitude into a ferment, and caused an hideous outcry for two hours together, Great is Diana of the Ephesians. (3.) The plea of the antiquity and universality, and the common consent of all worshippers; Diana, whom all Asia and the world worshipped, As if Demetrius had said, "What! shall we suffer the temple of Diana to be set at nought by the preachments of this babbler Paul; a place so magnificent for structure being, some say, one hundred, others two hundred and twenty years a-building; so renowned for the oracles of the god's so magnified for the image which fell down from Jupiter, so honoured by the oblations of the Asiatic potentates, and crowded devotions of the Ephesians, and admired throughout the whole world?" Lord! what danger was the life of the great apostle now in! how did this popular tumult threaten the present destruction of him and his companions Gaius and Aristarchus! Now is supposed to be the time when the apostle says, That after the manner of men he had fought with beasts at Ephesus; and this is probably the deliverance which he gratefully commemorates in 2 Cor. ii. 10: Who hath delivered us from so great a death, &c.

30 And when Paul would have entered in unto the people, the disciples suffered him not. 31 And certain of the chief of Asia, which were his friends sent unto him, desiring him, that he would not adventure himself into the theatre. 32 Some therefore cried one thing and some another; for the assembly was confused, and the more part new not wherefore they were come together. 33 And they drew Alexander out of the multitude, the Jews putting him forward. And Alexander beckoned with the hand and would have made his defence unto the people. 34 But when they knew that he was a Jew, all with one voice about the space of two hours cried out, Great is Diana of the Ephesians.

Note here, 1. The undaunted courage of St. Paul in the cause of Christ; he resolves to adventure his life, by going into the theatre, there to make an apology for himself and his companions, and in defence of the christian religion: He did not account his life dear unto him, but was willing not only to be bound, but to die for the name of Jesus. 2. How the divine providence is to be admired, and awfully adored, in directing to ways and means for the apostle's preservation in this time of imminent danger. God now made use of the advice, not only of the apostle's fast friends, the disciples, but of his foes, that is, certain of the people of Asia, who were now become his friends, to dissuade him from going into the theatre, lest he should have been torn in pieces by an outrageous rabble of insolent idolaters in this unaccountable uproar. It is all one with God to save by many or by few, by friends or by foes; for he can make enemies become benefactors at his pleasure, and command deliverance for his people, sometimes without means, sometimes by weak and contemptible means, sometimes by improbable and unlikely means, sometimes by opposite and contrary means: Lord, who would not trust in thee in a time of imminent or impending danger, who hast all created nature at thy beck, the hearts of all in thy hands, the tongues and hands of the most unruly and outrageous in thy power; and wilt deliver thine in six troubles, and in seven, and there shall no evil touch them? Thou canst and wilt deliver as often as thy children need deliverance, and save them from evil, even when they are in the midst of trouble. 3. How the rabble at Ephesus treated Alexander, being in the theatre; the place where they judged offenders, and cast them to the wild beasts: They would not suffer him to make any defence for himself, or the people of the Jews. This Alexander is supposed by many to be that Alexander, who St. Paul afterwards told Timothy did him much evil; if so, we find here, he was first a profelyte, then a professor, next a confessor, almost a martyr; yet, after all, an apostate, making shipwreck of the faith; for which he was excommunicated by the apostle, 1 Tim. i. 19, 20. Of whom is Hymeneus and Alexander, whom I have delivered unto Satan. This excommunication of the apostle probably was the provocation that occasioned him to do so much mischief to the apostle, of which he complains, 2 Tim. iv. 14. Alexander the coppersmith did me much evil; of whom be thou aware also. Learn thence, 1. That it was possible for a glorious professor to turn a furious persecutor. This Alexander did not only withstand the apostle's person, but his doctrine also; for which being excommunicated, he sought revenge. 2. That excommunication not only angers but enrages wicked and impenitent men; so that instead of being reformed, they seek revenge: Yet must the censures of the church be executed and inflicted, without either fear or favour.

35 And when the town clerk had appeased the people, he said, Ye men of Ephesus, what man is there that knoweth not how that the city of the Ephesians is a worshipper of the great goddess Diana, and of the image which fell down from Jupiter?

36 Seeing then that these things cannot be spoken against, ye ought to be quiet, and do nothing rashly, 37 For ye have brought hither these men, which are neither robbers of churches, nor yet blasphemers of your goddesses. 38 Wherefore if Demetrius and the craftsmen which are with him have a matter against any man, the law is open, and there are deputies; let them implead one another. 39 But if ye inquire any thing concerning other matters it shall be determined in a lawful assembly. 40 For we are in danger to be called in question for this day's uproar, there being no cause whereby we may give an account of this concourse. 41 And when he had thus spoken, he dismissed the assembly.

Note here, 1. The instrument which God stirs up to stem the tide and stop the stream of this hair brained assembly; and that is, the town clerk: who was always present at their public meetings, and registered all their city acts. His presence and eloquence God made use of, to appease this tumult, to preserve the apostle, and to dismiss the assembly. 2. The town-clerk's oration was full of craft and policy, fraud and fallacy; for he tells the multitude, that St. Paul and his friends are against images only that are made with hands; whereas theirs was not such, but one that fell down from Jupiter. It was his duty, by office, to appease the rabble's rage, with reason and authority; he ought not to have done it fallaciously. But we must consider he was a Pagan, and his design was only to still the people; accordingly, he encourages the credulous multitude to believe, what the crafty priests had insinuated into them, that the Image which they worshipped was not made with hands, but fell immediately down from heaven; hoping thereby to gain more veneration to their idols, and get more pounds into their own purses. Thus God made use of the worldly and (somewhat) wicked eloquence of this heathen to preserve St. Paul. 3. How God opens the mouth of this man to vindicate the apostle's innocency, and his companions also. These men, saith he, are neither robbers of churches, nor yet blasphemers of your goddesses. It is very likely, that the apostles and the christians in Ephesus had in wisdom asserted Christianity, without saying much against Diana, which would but have enraged the multitude: much less did they offer any violence, either to her temple or her image. Here note, That although the apostles were great enemies to these men's idolatry, yet did they offer no outward violence to their idol-temples, neither to demolish them, or deface any image in them: They well knew that such a work of public reformation was not their business, but the magistrates; therefore they endeavoured by preaching to cast idols out of the people's hearts, but not by violence to throw them out of the temple. Thus ends this chapter, with the account of St. Paul's marvellous if not miraculous preservation at the city of Ephesus, where being surrounded with difficulties and dangers on all hands, yet being found in the way of his duty, and in the work of his Master, he escapes all perils. Safety evermore accompanies duty: When we are in God's way, we are under God's wing; preservation and protection we shall have, if God may thereby be more glorified; but sometimes danger is better than safety; a storm more useful than a calm: And blessed be God for the assurance of his promise, that all things, be they mercies or afflictions, comforts or correction, dangers or deliverances, life or death, all shall work together for good to them that love God, and are found stedfast in their obedience to him, Rom. viii. 28.

CHAP. XX.

AND after the supper was ceased, Paul called unto him the disciples, and embraced them, and departed for to go into Macedonia. 2 And when he had gone over those parts, and had given them much exhortation, he came into Greece, 3 and there abode three months. And when the Jews laid laid wait for him as he was about to sail into Syria, he purposed to return through Macedonia. 4 And there accompanied him into Asia, Sopater of Berea; and of the Thessalonians, Aristarchus and Secundus and Gaius of Derbe, and Timotheus: and of Asia, Tychicus and Trophimus. 5 These going before tarried for us at Troas.

The foregoing chapter acquaints us with a very great and imminent danger, which the apostle escaped at Ephesus, where he had like to have been torn in pieces by those heathenish idolators; which gave him occasion to say, 1 Cor. xv. 31. That after the manner of men he had fought with beasts at Ephesus. In this chapter we find, that the apostle yielding to the fury of his persecutors, prudently withdraws from Ephesus into Macedonia; yet not so much for his own safety (for he was willing to die Christ's sacrifice, if he might live no longer Christ's servant) as for the church's future advantage, that the disciples in Ephesus might be no farther persecuted upon his account. Hence learn, That the ministers of the gospel may depart from a place and people, where their ministry has been very successful when driven from thence by the fury of persecution. Thus St. Paul here obeyed the command of Christ elsewhere: When they persecute you in one city flee to another, Matt. x. 23. Note, 1. Though St. Paul withdrew from Ephesus, to allay the fury of persecution there; yet he left Timothy behind, to confirm and comfort the disciples, as his substitute, and to strengthen them in the faith of the gospel, 1 Tim. i. 3. I besought thee to abide still at Ephesus &c. 3. The apostle no sooner escapes the fury of the heathens at Ephesus, but he is in danger of his life at Macedonia by his own countrymen the Jews, ver. 3. The Jews laid wait for him: Well might the apostle say, he was in deaths often, in perils of robbers, in perils in the city, &c. 2 Cor. xi. 26. The wicked Jews, when they could not prevail against St. Paul by open force, contrive his ruin by secret treachery; but God gave him knowledge of their designs, and he avoideth them, by turning another way. Thence learn, That it is high presumption, and a bold tempting of God to run headlong upon evident and imminent dangers; and not to improve all lawful means we can to prevent and decline them: To trust to means, is to neglect God; but to neglect the means for our own preservation, is to tempt God. Note, St. Paul would not tempt God by running into any probable dangers, though his cause was never so good. 4. The persons are mentioned by name, who accompanied the apostle, and administered unto him; to wit, Sopater, Aristarchus, and Secundus, Gaius and Timotheus, Tychicus and Trophimus; these accompanied the apostle, not out of state, but for necessary service: To which may be added St. Luke; but, being the penman of this book, he declines mentioning himself by name, though his praise will be for ever in the gospel, and ecclesiastical story.

6 ¶ And we sailed from Philippi after the days of unleavened bread, and came unto them to Troas in five days, where we abode seven days. 7

And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them, ready to depart on the morrow; and continued his speech until midnight. 8 And there were many lights in the upper chamber where they were gathered together. 9 And there sat in a window a certain young man named Eutychus, being fallen into a deep sleep: and as Paul was long preaching, he sunk down with sleep, and fell down from the third loft, and was taken up dead. 10 And Paul went down, and fell on him, and embracing him, said, Trouble not yourselves: for his life is in him. 11 When he therefore was come up again and had broken bread, and eaten, and talked a long while, even till break of day, so he departed: 12 And they brought the young man alive, and were not a little comforted.

The next journey of Paul is from Macedonia in Greece, to Troas in Asia, where he abode seven days. During his stay here, several things are to be remarked and observed. Note here, 1. How this great apostle became all things to all men, though he would not become sin to any man; To the Jews he became as a Jew, for he stayed his journey all the seven days of the Jewish passover's solemnity, and would not set forth to travel at that time, because he would not offend the weak Jews; accordingly he sailed not from Philippi till after the days of unleavened bread. Thus St. Paul did comply with the Jewish rites, which though dead by the death of Christ, yet were not buried: and therefore his compliance was not sinful, but managed with design to gain the Jews. 2. That the change of the sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week, was of apostolical observation now, as it was before of Christ's institution. On this day the Lord arose; on this day the apostles met, and Christ honoured them with his presence, John xx. on this day the collection for the poor saints was made, 1 Cor. xvi. 2. Now, this necessarily infers the abrogation of the Saturday sabbath: For six days they were commanded to labour; and if they rested the seventh day and first day too, they violated the law of God, which we cannot suppose they did: And consequently the apostles and primitive Christians observed the first day of the week in remembrance of the work of creation. Observe 3. The fervent zeal and unwearied diligence of the great apostle for the souls of men; and also the patience and complacency with which his auditors attended upon his sermon at this time; Paul preached till midnight, ver. 7. A very long sermon upon a particular occasion is neither unscriptural, nor unapostolical. We do not find that either the apostle was weary, or the auditory drowsy at the dead time of the night; their wakefulness at midnight under a sermon condemns our sleepiness at mid day. 4. The pious and prudential care which the apostle and his hearers took, that their night-meeting should not fall under any calumny, or their selves reproached; for doing any thing indecently in the dead of the night; to prevent this the eighth verse informs us, that there were many lights in the upper chamber, where they were gathered together; exposing themselves, and what they did, to the view of all. Religious meetings in the night season are not only lawful in times of persecution, but necessary: Yet a special care ought to be taken to avoid all occasion of calumny, that the least suspicion may not arise concerning the honesty and holiness of those that do assemble at such unseasonable times. 5. What a warning the Holy Ghost here leaves upon record, for such as sleep under the preaching of the word; Eutychus, when asleep under St. Paul's long sermon, falls down from the third loft, and is taken up dead. Here note, The time when he was overtaken with sleep; not at noon-day, but at midnight; and it was not a sermon of an hour long, that he fell asleep under; but after St. Paul had preached several hours: This is not the case of our common sermon-sleepers, who at noon-day sleep under the word; nay, scule and compose themselves to sleep, and do what they can to invite sleep to them. What if, with Eutychus, any of them fall down dead? Here is no Paul to raise them up, or, what if this wretched contempt of the word provoke God to say, Sleep on, till hell flames awake you? 6. Eutychus is raised to life by a miraculous power communicated to St. Paul, which was a matter of great consolation to the spirits, and great confirmation to the faith of the disciples, ver. 12. They brought the young man alive, and were not a little comforted; not only for the young man's sake, but especially for their own sakes; for hereby God gave a convincing testimony to the word of his grace; God did bear witness to it, and many were confirmed in the belief of it.

13 And he went before to ship: and sailed unto Assos, there intending to take in Paul: for so had he appointed, minding himself to go a-foot. 14 And when he met with us at Assos, we took him in, and came to Mitylene. 15 And we sailed thence, and came the next day over against Chios. And the next day we arrived at Samos, and tarried at Trogyllium: And the next day we came to Miletus. 16 For Paul had determined to sail by Ephesus, because he would not spend the time in Asia; for he hasted, if it were possible for him, to be at Jerusalem at the day of Pentecost.

Here an account is given of several travels of the apostle, namely, from Troas to Assos, from thence to Mitylene, next day to Samos, then to Trogyllium, and the day following to Miletus, passing by, and not touching at Ephesus; for the apostle having an earnest desire to be at Jerusalem at the feast of Pentecost, so that he might in that concourse have a larger opportunity of spreading the gospel, he would not now call at Ephesus, lest he should be detained too long by the brethren there. From the whole, note, 1. The indefatigable diligence of this great apostle, and his unwearied industry in the service of the gospel; how he travels from place to place, and here from Troas to Assos, on foot all alone by land: He did not affect to ride with a pompous train and retinue, but he goes on foot, expecting to meet with more opportunity of sowing the seed of the gospel as he passed through towns and villages by land, among those he conversed with: So intent was this holy man upon the work of winning souls; whereas had he travelled by sea, this opportunity had been lost. An happy example for all the ministers of Christ, to prefer an opportunity of doing good to the souls of others, before their own ease or profit. 2. The true reason why St. Paul was so very desirous to be at Jerusalem at the feast of Pentecost, not that he placed any religion in observing this abrogated feast, but because that vast concourse of people at such times would give him a fairer opportunity to glorify Christ, and to propagate the gospel: This made him so desirous to get to Jerusalem by the feast of Pentecost. Learn thence, That the ministers of Christ, without the imputation of vain-glory, or seeking popular applause, may warrantably desire, and occasionally lay hold upon an opportunity of dispersing the word to a numerous auditory, in hopes that, casting the net of the gospel among a many, they may inclose some.

17 ¶ And from Miletus he sent to Ephesus, and called the elders of the church. 18 And when they were come to him, he said unto them, Ye know, from the first day that I came into Asia, after what manner I have been with you at all seasons, 19 Serving the Lord with all humility of mind, and with many tears and temptations, which beset me by the lying in wait of the Jews: 20 And how I kept back nothing that was profitable unto you, but have shewed you, and have taught you publicly, and from house to house: 21 Testifying both to the Jews, and also to the Greeks, repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ.

The foregoing verses acquainted us, how very intent St. Paul was upon his journey to Jerusalem, at the feast of Pentecost, he hoping then and there to have a precious opportunity for preaching Jesus Christ, and him crucified, to his countrymen the Jews: Now lest he should be hindered in his expedition, he determines to ship by Ephesus, without touching there; but could not satisfy himself without seeing of, and speaking to, the ministers of Ephesus, whom for that purpose he sends for to Miletus, and there, in a grave and pious discourse, which warmed their hearts, and melted them into tears, he takes his farewell of them. Here note, 1. That St. Paul speaks much in his own vindication, but nothing by way of ostentation: A minister, when he is leaving a people, may modestly enough say something in his own vindication; for there are enough, as soon as his back is turned, will say more than is true by way of accusation. 2. That when the apostle here speaks much that looks like self-condemnation, it is rather to propound himself as a mirror for gospel-ministers, and a pattern for all pious pastors; that wherever they leave their people, they may go off with a clear conscience, and be able to appeal to the consciences of their people, as touching their carriage and conversation among them. 3. The several several particular instances of his ministerial faithfulness: 1. He instances in his own humility; though he was lofty in his ministry, yet was he lowly in his mind: He served the Lord with all humility of mind. The better any man is, the lower thoughts he has of himself. Almighty God renders that man most honourable, that minister most serviceable, whom he finds most humble. 2. In his affectionateness in preaching the gospel: he mingles tears with his exhortation, Serving the Lord with all humility of mind, and with many tears. 3. In his constancy in preaching and private inspection, publicly in the synagogues, and privately from house to house, like a good shepherd, labouring to understand the state of his whole flock, and of every lamb in it, that no soul might miscarry through his neglect, for which the great and good Shepherd died. 4. He acquaints them, not only with the manner, but also with the matter of his preaching; namely, Repentance towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ: Which two graces comprehend the sum of a christian's duty. Ministers must join these two together in their preaching, and our hearers must not separate them in their practice. They who repent without believing, or believe without repenting, do indeed do neither.

22 And now behold, I go bound in the Spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there: 23 Save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying, that bonds and afflictions abide me. 24 But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God. 25 And now behold, I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more. 26 Wherefore I take you to record this day, that I am pure from the blood of all men. 27 For I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God.

Here the apostle proceeds not to boast of himself, but to clear himself of any charge or surmise of ministerial miscarriages, and also to propound himself as a pattern of ministerial faithfulness to the elders of the church at Ephesus: And here again, (1.) Our apostle instances in his holy and heroic resolution and activity for God; I know that bonds and afflictions abide me: nevertheless, I go bound in the Spirit to Jerusalem, and nothing moves me. As if he had said, "I am fully resolved, by the grace of God enabling, that nothing shall divert me from my duty, neither deterring fear, nor deluding favour of men, shall ever affect me; but I will go out, and go on in the strength of Christ, running my race with patience, and finishing my course with joy." Hence learn, 1. That the apprehension of sufferings must not shake the resolution of a Christian, much less daunt the courage of a gospel-minister, ver. 24. None of these things move me. The true ministerial courage deliv'rs in the air of that danger where duty dwells, and will neither be beaten off from doing an incumbent duty, nor be beaten on to a compliance with any known sin. 2. That the ministers of Christ should endeavour, not only to finish their ministry and course of christianity with faithfulness, but with joy; and, that they may do so, let them see that they give up themselves wholly to the service of Christ, without restriction or reserve, and live daily by faith on the mediation of the Lord Jesus Christ. Here was such a masculine spirit in our apostle, as bid defiance to death and danger; and the argument that excited him was, that he might finish his course with joy. Next, the apostle declares his impartiality in preaching the gospel, ver. 27. I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God. Where note, He doth not say he had declared the whole counsel of God, for who but God himself can do that? But he had not shunned to declare the whole counsel of God; that is, he had not concealed from them any truth necessary to salvation; and this freed him from the blood of souls; if any perished, it was not long of him, but their blood was upon themselves. I take you to record this day, that I am pure from the blood of all men. It is happy when the ministers of God can appeal to the consciences of their people, and summon them in as witnesses to bear record for them at the bar of Christ. Lastly, the apostle tells them, they were never like to see his face again; a cunning, killing world! How would it fire the zeal of ministers, and inflame the affections of a people, did they remember that in a short time they must see the faces, and hear the voices of each other upon earth no more? Lord, what fervent prayer for, what yearning of bowels toward perishing sinners would be found with us! what zeal for their conversion, what endeavours for their salvation, did we believe that the grave was making ready to receive us! how should we louden our cry to God, and how fulfil our trust to man, did we consider our grave and coffin are at hand! Our glass has but a little sand; now we are preaching, but anon it will be said of us, we are gone; And now, behold, I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching, shall see my face no more.

28 Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood: 29 For I know this, that after my departing, shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock. 30 Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them. 31 Therefore watch, and remember that by the space of three years I ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears.

The blessed apostle having, in the former part of his farewell sermon to the elders of Ephesus, vindicated his own sincerity among them, both as to his doctrine and practice, and cleared himself by close addresses and smart appeals to their consciences: He now urges them in a rousing and heart-melting exhortation to the utmost care and diligence in the exercise of their pastoral charge; and to take heed to themselves and the flock, to the whole flock which Christ

Christ had purchased with his blood, and the Holy Ghost had committed to their care; ver. 28. Take heed to yourselves, and to all the flock, &c. Here note, A twofold duty, and a threefold motive to enforce that duty: The first duty is to take heed to themselves: the second is to take heed to all the flock. The first part of a minister's duty is to take heed to himself: Committee animam diligentibus suam, says St. Bernard: He that neglects his own soul, will never take a faithful care of the souls of others. We must first look to ourselves, that our judgments be sound, our hearts holy, and our lives exemplary: We must take heed to ourselves, that we be fit for the employment which we undertake; that is not a burden for a child's shoulder; he that is himself a babe in knowledge, is altogether unfit to teach men the mysteries of salvation. Take we heed that our example doth not contradict our doctrine, that our practice doth not give our profession the lie: That we do as well as teach: Not preach angelical sermons, and lead diabolical lives; but securing that grace to ourselves which we offer unto others, and shunning that sin ourselves which we condemn in others: And this, because we have a depraved nature and vicious inclinations in us, as well as others; because we have heaven to win, and a soul to be saved as well as others; yea when others have only their own souls to account for, we have not only our own, but others too; because our sins do more dishonour to God, discredit religion, more gratify the devil, more harden sinners, and have more of wilfulness in them, more perfidiousness in them, and more hypocrisy in them, than other men's: And we shall certainly be adjudged by God to a double damnation for them. Well therefore might the apostle say to the Ephesian Elders, Take heed unto yourselves: next he adds, and to the flock. That is, with a constant care and laborious diligence acquaint them with their duty, inform them of their danger, shew them where their happiness lies, and the way and means for attaining of it: And, in order to this, all the flock must be known, that it may be heeded, and we must labour to be acquainted with the state of all our people as fully as we can; we must, as the apostle did before us, visit our people from house to house, that we may know their persons, know their inclinations, and know the manner of their conversation; what sins they are most in danger of, what temptations most liable to, and what duties they neglect, either for the matter or manner of them; and give them the best encouragement, directions, and assistance we are able: This is the sum of the apostle's exhortation to the elders of Ephesus; Take heed unto yourselves and unto all the flock. The motives to enforce the duty, follow: and they are, 1. Drawn from their office, they are overseers of the flock; that is, officers appointed by solemn ordination to teach, to guide, to govern the churches committed to their care, and under their charge. 2. From the authority and excellency of him that called them to their office, the Holy Ghost. We read of some that were nominated by the special and immediate instinct of the Holy Ghost, as Acts i. 24. and xiii. 2. Others were ordained by the apostles, who were guided by the Holy Ghost then; and whoever is set apart to that office now, according to the rule of God's word, may truly be said to be made an overseer by the Holy Ghost; Almighty God concurring to own and bless his own institution. 3. From the dear purchase which Christ paid for, and the tender regard he bears to, this his flock: Feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his blood. Where observe, The divinity of Christ, he is expressly called God, in opposition to the Arians, and their unhappy spawn the Socinians, who will allow him to be only man: but then his blood could never have purchased the church, which it is here said to do; being God and man in one person; man, that he might have blood to shed; and God, that his blood might be of infinite value, and ineffimable preciousness when shed. Note also, the force of the apostle's argument; "If the church be thus dear to Christ, the Chief Shepherd, she ought to be very dear to all under shepherds: If Christ judged her salvation worth his blood, well may his ministers judge it worth their sweat." 4. From the danger which the church is in by seducers and false teachers, ver. 29. Grievous wolves will enter, not sparing the flock; and even from among yourselves shall arise heretics, who will vent their unsound doctrines to debauch men, first in their principles, and then in their practices: Therefore take heed to all the flock. Now from the whole, note, 1. The church is Christ's flock, consisting of sheep and lambs; Christ himself is the great and good Shepherd; his ministers under shepherds and overseers; bloody persecutors, heretical seducers, and false teachers, are wolves which worry and divide the flock. 2. That every flock should have its own pastor, and every pastor his own flock. 3. That the flock should be no greater ordinarily, than the overseers are capable of taking heed of. 4. That every overseer of Christ's flock ought to take great heed, both to himself and the whole flock, in all the parts of his pastoral work, particularly, public preaching, and private inspection.

32 And now, brethren, I commend you to God, and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified.

Here the apostle takes a very solemn farewell of the elders of the church at Ephesus, commending them to the guidance and protection of the grace of God, which was able to build them up in holiness here, and bring them to heaven hereafter. Where note, 1. His courteous compellation, and therein his great condescension. Although he was an apostle of the highest eminency, yet he disdains not to call these elders, who were both in office, and also in gifts and graces much inferior to him, by the name of brethren. And now brethren, says the apostle to the elders of Ephesus: But probably together with the elders of Ephesus, here were some of the church and people of Ephesus, who came to take their last leave of their departing apostle; and then we may remark, that there is a near relation, even that of brethren, between ministers and people, as well as between the ministers themselves, and this founded upon the account of religion and grace. 2. The apostle being now to take his last leave and farewell of the ministers and people at Ephesus, he commends them to God. It well becomes the faithful ministers of Christ at all times, when they are with their people, but especially then when they are about to leave their people, to commit and commend them unto God: that is, to recommend them to God's care and keeping, and to commit them them to his conduct and guidance; and this as a testimony of our faithfulness to God, whose our people are, and for whom we must become accountable to him; and also as a testimony of our love to our people, and of our fervent desires for their salvation. 3. As the apostle commends them to God, so likewise to the word of his grace. To God as the efficient cause, and to the word of his grace, as the instrumental cause of their building up; I commend you to God, and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up. Here note, The gospel is the word of God's grace, so called, because it is the effect, the fruit, and product of rich mercy and free grace; because it reveals the free grace of God in Christ to poor sinners; because it is carried on, and perfecteth the work of grace unto glory. 2. That believers, who are in a state of grace, have need of the word of God for their edification and building up. 3. That the word of God is able to build up believers; it is able to preserve and keep them from decaying in grace and holiness, and it is able to further their growth in grace, and to bring it to perfection. Well, and wisely therefore doth the apostle say, I commend you to God, and to the word of his grace; he doth not say, I commend you to God and the impulse of his Spirit; or, I commend you to God, and the light within; or, I commend you to God, and to the traditions of the church; but I commend you to God, and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up. 4. A superadded commendation, which is here given of the word of God's grace; it is not only able to build us up, but to give us an inheritance amongst them that are sanctified; that is, The word of God, if we follow the dictates and directions of it, will infallibly bring us to the glorious inheritance which God hath provided for all his saints, or sanctified ones. Here note, 1. That heaven is an inheritance not like an inheritance on earth; but it is the most sure, the most satisfying, the most durable, and the most delightful inheritance, an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away. 2. That heaven is the inheritance of saints, of all sanctified and holy persons, and only of such; it is purchased for them, it is promised to them, it is taken up in their names, and possession of it kept for them by their forerunner. In a word, heaven is prepared for them, and they are daily preparing for it; and it shall be adjudged to them at the great day. 3. That this inheritance of heaven is a gift, and a free gift. Luke xii. 32. It is your Father's pleasure to give you the kingdom. This inheritance is all of grace, our right and title to it is of grace, nothing of merit; all of God, nothing of ourselves; nothing in a way of meritorious causality, but only in the way of ministerial endeavor. Lastly, God gives this inheritance by his word. To the word of his grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance. The word reveals to us the notice and knowledge of this inheritance; and the word makes an offer of this inheritance to every one of us, yea, it calls us to the acceptance, and invites us to the participation of it. Finally, God by his word begets his people to a lively hope of this inheritance, 1 Pet. i. 3, 4. And also prepares and fits them by the word, for the participation and possession of it, Col. i. 12. Giving thanks to the Father, who has made us meet to be partakers of,

&c. And how doth the Father make us meet for this inheritance in glory, but by the word of his grace? I commend you therefore, brethren, says the apostle, to God, and to the word of his grace, which is able to give you an inheritance among them that are sanctified.

33 I have coveted no man's silver or gold, or apparel. 34 Yea, you yourselves know, that these hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me. 35 I have shewed you all things, how that so labouring ye ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive.

In the conclusion of St. Paul's discourse to the elders of the church at Ephesus, he vindicates himself from the sordid sin of covetousness, affirming, that he had coveted no man's silver or gold; but by the labour of his hands, had maintained himself, and them that were with him. Where note, That it is not simply unlawful for a minister of the gospel to labour with his hands, for his own, and his family's support, when the poverty of the members of the church is such, that they cannot maintain him without it. Farther He directs the elders to labour as he did, if the case required it with them, as it did with him, that they might, by labouring as he, be in a capacity to support the weak, and relieve the poor. Yet note, He doth not propose this his practice as a precept or precedent, or rule to all ministers; for though St. Paul laboured with his hands; in a case of necessity, and because false teachers were watching all advantages against him; yet he often declares a right and privilege which he had to be maintained by the church, without labouring with his hands for his own livelihood and subsistence; nay, asserts it to be the ordination and appointment of God himself, that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel. Lastly, A remarkable saying of our blessed Saviour, not recorded by the Evangelists, and undoubtedly spoken by him; namely, That it is more blessed to give than to receive: That is, the condition of the giver is more desirable than that of the receiver, and giving is more commendable than receiving. 1. The condition of the giver is more desirable than that of the receiver: because, (1.) Giving is a sign of sufficiency and power; he that gives to another is supposed to be well provided himself; he that gives, looks like a full being, and like a swelling river; whereas receiving implies want and weakness, emptiness, and unsatisfied desires. (2.) Because giving includes choice; for what a man parts with to another, he has a freedom to keep himself; but the receiver is not to be his own carver, but must depend upon the courtesy of his neighbours. 3. Because the condition of the giver implies an honourable trust committed to him by God Almighty. Givers are God's almoners and stewards, the poor's guardians and patrons. An honourable trust, that is, by which the lives and livelihood of the poor are in a manner committed to us. By all which it appears, that the condition of the giver is more desirable than that of the receiver. 4. That giving is more commendable than receiving; it is a clearer evidence of a noble and virtuous virtuous disposition of mind : For, (2.) It is a sign of our victory over the world, and that our conversation is in heaven ; that we have worthy apprehensions of God, and honourable thoughts of his providence ; and that we can trust him, and give him a part of his own whenever he calls for it. (2.) Giving is better than receiving ; because there is a more lasting pleasure in giving than in receiving : An alms taken is soon spent and forgotten, and the pleasure of it is over in two or three moments ; but the pleasure of giving bears us company all along in this world, and will keep us company in the next ; there is no satisfactory pleasure as in doing good. Let us then often remember ; and always put in practice, the words of our Lord Jesus, which he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive.

36 ¶ And when he had thus spoken, he kneeled down, and prayed with them all. 37 And they all wept sore, and fell on Paul's neck, and kissed him, 38 Sorrowing most of all for the words, which he spake, that they should see his face no more. And they accompanied him unto the ship.

Note here, 1. What a solemn and sacred farewell St. Paul and the elders of Ephesus take of each other: They kneeled down and prayed together: Instead of a parting cup, here is a parting prayer, and this accompanied with tears: They all wept sore. There is a sufficient occasion for sorrow and weeping, when the church loses a faithful pastor; it is a public loss: and many are concerned in it. 2. How loath, how very loath they were to part with the apostle, who had so exceedingly endeared himself unto them, by his holiness, humility, and universal usefulness: Accordingly, they accompany him unto the ship, and, when gone off to sea, send a long look after him; being more especially grieved at these words, That they should see his face no more. Learn thence, That a faithful minister of Christ is enjoyed with much love, and finally parted from with much sorrow, by those who believe and obey the gospel: Parting work is hard work: How hard is it for husband and wife, for parents and children to part? and perhaps it is as hard sometimes for ministers and people, who have lived in mutual endearments, to the glory of God and singular comfort of each other; when they are pulled one from another, alive by cruel persecutors, or when dying by the king of terrors: The parting is sad, but blessed be God, the next meeting will know no parting. When ministers and people meet together at the right hand of God in heaven, they shall never part more, but shall forever be with the Lord.

C H A P. XXI.

This chapter acquaints us with St. Paul's dangerous voyage to Jerusalem, the several places he passeth through in his journey, and his safe arrival at last at Jerusalem.

AND it came to pass, that after we were gotten from them, and had launched, we came with a straight course unto Coos, and the day following unto Rhodes, and from thence unto Patara. 2 And finding a ship sailing over unto Phenicia, we went aboard, and set forth.

The latter end of the foregoing chapter acquainted us with the sorrowful and heavy parting of the elders and Church of Ephesus from the holy apostle: Now the first verse of this chapter informs us, that it was not less sorrowful on the apostle's and his companions part: So much the word here imports, After we were gotten from them, pulled as it were limb from limb from each other; intimating the mutual endearments which were betwixt them whilst together, and that inexpressible sorrow which was found among them at their parting. Verily there is no stronger love, nor more endeared affections betwixt any relations upon the earth, than betwixt the ministers of Christ and such of their people as they have been instrumental to bring home to God. Spiritual affections are stronger than natural; the removing of a spiritual father by death, or otherwise, is like tearing limb from limb; yea, like rending the head from the body. Lord, with what great difficulty and deep reluctance did the holy apostle and the church of Ephesus here part from one another! They were pulled and torn from one another, as the word imports.

3 Now when we had discovered Cyprus, we left it on the left hand, and sailed into Syria, and landed at Tyre: for there the ship was to unlade her burden. 4 And finding disciples, we tarried there seven days: who said to Paul through the Spirit, that he should not go up to Jerusalem.

The providence of God is not more signally discovered in governing the motion of the clouds, than it is in ordering the spirits and motions of his ministers: The motions of the clouds is not spontaneous, and from themselves, but they move as they are moved by the winds; neither can the ministers of Christ chuse their own stations, and govern their own motions, but must go when and whither the Spirit of and providence of God directs and guides them; as evidently appears by St. Paul's present voyage to Jerusalem, though the journey was full of danger, yet his spirit was fully bent and set upon it: I go bound in the spirit unto Jerusalem. It was happy for the apostle, and his great advantage, that the will of God was so plainly revealed to him, touching this his journey to Jerusalem: For no sooner did he prepare himself to obey the call of God, and undertake the journey, but he is presently assaulted by many strong temptations to decline it. The first rub he met with in his way, was from the disciples at Tyre, who spake by the Spirit, that he should not go up to Jerusalem. But did not the Spirit of God then contradict itself, in bidding the apostle go, and then speaking to him by those disciples not to go? Not at all: St. Paul, by extraordinary revelation, was commanded to go up to Jerusalem: these disciples, by a spirit of prophecy, only foretold the difficulties and dangers that would attend him in his journey; and so, through kindness and human affection, they dissuaded him from undertaking it. We must distinguish between the prediction of trouble, and the council of safety: The prediction of trouble; so they said through the Spirit, that it would be dangerous for Paul to go to Jerusalem: The council of safety proceeded from their private love and affection to him; whereby they dissuaded him from going to Jerusalem. Learn from hence, 1. That divine precept, and not Providence, is to rule our way to duty. 2. That no discouragements or hindrances whatsoever will justify our neglect of a commanded duty: Whatsoever difficulties or discouragements lay in the way of the apostle's duty, he overcame them all with an heroic and truly christian resolution, saying, ver. 13. I am ready not only to be bound, &c.
3. S prediction

5 And when we had accomplished those days, we departed, and went our way: and they all brought us on our way, with wives and children, till we were out of the city: and we kneeled down on the shore, and prayed. 6 And when we had taken our leave one of another, we took ship; and they returned home again. 7 And when we had finished our course from Tyre, we came to Ptolemais and saluted the brethren, and abode with them one day. 8 And the next day we that were of Paul's company, departed, and came to Cesaria; and we entered into the house of Philip the evangelist, which was one of the seven, and abode with him. 9 And the same man had four daughters, virgins, which did prophesy.

Note here, 1. That nothing could divert the apostle from his intended journey to Jerusalem: The report of sufferings was no discouragement to him, nor could the persuasive intreaties of his friends prevail upon him: Seeing therefore he was resolved to go on, they all of them, with their wives and children, to testify their great respect and affection to him, accompany him out of the city; and he and they kneeling down on the shore, pray together, and take their farewell of each other. The loving communion of saints, and prayer, are the marks of Christ's true disciples. 2. The apostle's next remove towards Jerusalem was from Tyre to Cesarea, where he lodges with Philip the evangelist: that is, one of them who was sent forth as itineary preachers, here and there to dispense the gospel, and to confirm the churches, and one of the seven, that is, one of the seven deacons, Acts vi. Here note, That this Philip, in whose house St. Paul now lodged, was before driven out of his house by Paul's persecution. See acts viii. 1, &c. This Philip, who was driven out of his house by Paul when a persecutor, gladly received him into his house, being now Paul a convert; and this without any upbraiding, yea, without the least mention of what he had formerly been or done. It is an ill office to rake in filth which God has covered, and to reproach men with, or for their sins which God has pardoned: It argues some degree of envy at the grace of God, to upbraid them with the sins committed before conversion. Former miscarriages and injuries should be forgiven and forgotten upon true repentance, and we should receive them into our embraces, whom Christ has taken into his bosom; Paul went into the house of Philip the evangelist.

10 And as we tarried there many days, there came down from Judea a certain prophet named Agabus. 11 And when he was come unto us, he took Paul's girdle, and bound his own hands and feet, and said, Thus saith the Holy Ghost, So shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle, and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles.

Note here, 1. That during the apostle's stay at Cesaria in Philip's house, a certain prophet named Agabus comes thither, and prophesieth of St. Paul's bonds at Jerusalem: Where learn, That though Agabus was a prophet, yet by what appeareth to him in scripture, he was always a prophet of evil things and bad tidings: He foretold the famine before, Acts xi. and Paul's bonds now. Such messengers of God as give warnings of judgments to come, should and ought to be accepted, as well as they that bring us hopes of mercy and deliverance; that message may be true which is yet displeasing. 2. Agabus useth a sign, after the manner of the old prophets, who often prophesied by symbols, and significant expressions, that they might the better imprint their predictions on the hearts of men. Thus Isaiah went naked and barefoot, to shew what the people of Israel should meet with under the king of Assyria, Isa. xx. And Ezekiel was to pack up his stuff, and remove, to signify the people's removal into captivity, Ezek. xii. It pleased God to teach his people by visible signs, as well as by word of mouth, that what was received by both senses, seeing and hearing, might make the deeper impression upon their minds. In like manner here, Agabus uses a sign, he takes St. Paul's girdle, and binds his own hands and feet with it, signifying, that after that manner the Jews at Jerusalem should bind the apostle, and deliver him to the Gentiles; first to the Roman governor of Judea, and afterwards to Nero, the Roman emperor. From whence we may remark, The great goodness and condescension of God, in giving the apostle so many warnings of his bonds; the Holy Ghost first made it known to him, Acts xx. That bonds and afflictions did abide him. The disciples at Tyre prophesied the same, Acts xxi. 5. and here Agabus, by a sensible sign, makes it known to him, and all this; that he might thoroughly be prepared for a suffering condition. Paul therefore was not surprized, but had warning upon warning of his present danger. If a sudden and unexpected flood of miseries and calamities break in upon us, for afflictions seldom go single, it is not because we want warning, but because we are not so wise as to take warning. When we are well, and at ease, we will not think of death and the cross; and therefore, if we be surprized and unprovided, we may thank our own security: Our apostle here being forewarned, was forearmed.

12 And when we heard these things, both we and they of that place besought him not to go up to Jerusalem. 13 Then Paul answered, What mean ye to weep, and to break mine heart? for I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus. 14 And when he would would not be persuaded, we ceased, saying, The will of the Lord be done.

Note here, 1. The entire affection of the disciples to the holy apostle, Both we and they of the place besought him that he would not go up to Jerusalem. Learn, That the lives and liberties of those who are eminent instruments of God's glory, are very dear and precious to the faithful servants of God. Who can blame either St. Paul's companions or the disciples here, for desiring and endeavouring the preservation of so precious an instrument as the apostle was? and yet it is not improbable but Satan might have a hand in this matter, and endeavour by the apostle's friends persuasion to weaken his resolution; for the devil oft endeavoureth to take us off from our duty by the intreaties of our friends, who mean well in what they say. Thus when St. Peter lovingly advised our Saviour against his sufferings, Be it far from thee Lord, This shall not be unto thee: Matt. xvi. Get thee behind me, Satan, says Christ: It was Peter's tongue, but Satan tuned it: Who would have thought that Christ's disciples should have been Satan's instruments? We must not measure our friend's counsel by their good meaning, but by God's word: We must be deaf to all relations, that we may discharge our duty to God. Thus we find the apostle here, He would not be persuaded, but expostulates with them: What mean ye to weep, and to break mine heart? 2. St. Paul's entire affection to God, and his firm resolution for his duty: He would not be persuaded. But did the apostle do well in this, to withstand all the importunities, and reject the unanimous advice of all his friends? How doth this carriage agree with that character of heavenly wisdom, Jam, iii. 17. That it is easy to be intreated? I answer, To the practice of our duty, it is praise-worthy to be easy to be intreated, but not from our duty. St. Paul knew his duty, and understood the will of God, and therefore his friends might sooner break his heart, than break his purpose. Learn hence, That no persuasions of friends; no apprehensions of dangers should ever be able to turn us out of the way of our duty. When Peter dissuaded Christ from suffering, our Saviour rebuked him with the same indignation as he did the devil tempting him to idolatry. 3. How the apostle lovingly and gently rebukes their fond and inordinate sorrow for his departure: What mean ye to weep, and to break mine heart? As if he had said, What mean these passionate tears and intreaties? Alas! whether you think it so or not, they are but so many snares and temptations of Satan, to turn my feet out of the way of obedience; you do as much as in you lies to break my heart; but, by the grace of God, nothing shall break me off from my purpose, nor weaken my courage and resolution for God. When a saint is once satisfied in the call and command of God, to do any duty, he fears neither impending nor approaching dangers in the way of duty. 4. The apostles quieting and calming arguments, with which he labours to calm their unruly passions: I am ready both to be bound, and to die for Christ. I am ready, (1.) That is, God hath fitted me for suffering work, flesh and blood is over-ruled in me by the Spirit of God; I am prepared for whatever God pleaseth, be it a prison, be it a scallid, be it life, be it death, I am provided for both:

Liberty is dear, and life is dear, but Christ is dearer than either; therefore what mean you to work against the design of God, who hath fitted and prepared my heart for suffering service? I am ready, (2.) That is, my will and resolution stands in a full bent, my heart is fixed, my friends my heart is fixed; do not therefore disorder and discompose my spirits, by casting such temptations and stumbling blocks in my way; for I am come to a point, nothing shall divert me from this noble enterprize for God. I am ready, (3.) That is, fully determined to comply with the call and command of God, whatever befalls me; I am not solicitous about that; my captain that leads me on, I am sure, will bring me off safe, either dead or alive: Therefore all your tears and entreaties are but cast away upon me, ye had better be quiet, and cheerfully resign me up to the will of God; for I am ready both to be bound and to die. From whence learn, That it is a blessed and excellent frame of spirit, when the servants of God are prepared and ready for the hardest services, and sharpest sufferings to which the Lord may at any time call them: I am ready, not only to be bound, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus. 5. The disciples discretion: When he would not be persuaded, they ceased: that is, they gave over their importunities, and urged him no farther beyond his own inclinations and resolutions. It is the disposition of holy spirits to submit to those that are wiser than themselves, and not to be too stiff and preremptory in their own opinions and conceit; a lesson which most men have great need to learn. 6. The pious ground of this their discretion; namely, acquiescency in the divine will: The will of the Lord be done. They refer the event to God's determination, and submit all to his sovereign pleasure. Thence learn, That it is the duty and desire, and ought to be the care and endeavour of all the children of God, to be willing to submit themselves and theirs to the dispensation of God's providence in whatever befalls either them or theirs. For this we have Christ's example, Matt. xxvi. 39. Father, not as I will, but as thou wilt. The example of David, 2 Sam. xv. 26. Here am I, let him do what seemeth good in his sight: The example of Eli, 1 Sam. i. 18. It is the Lord, let him do what he pleaseth. Such is his justice and righteousness, that he can do his children no wrong: and such is his tender mercy and loving-kindness, that he will do them no harm. The absolute sovereignty of God over us, and the sight of God in all his providential dispensations towards us, influences at once our judgments, our wills, and our affections, our expressions and actions, that we neither dare to think, speak, or act any thing in contradiction to, or in opposition against the wisdom and will of God: That which is oft against our will, is not always against our interest; but if we belong to God, all affections upon us, are federal dispensations and covenant blessings to us, and either are good, or shall work for good; therefore it is both our duty and interest to submit to the wisdom of providence, and say with these disciples, The will of the Lord be done.

15 And after those days we took up our carriages, and went up to Jerusalem. 16 There went with us also certain of the disciples of Cesarea, and brought with them one Mnason of Cyprus, an old disciple, with whom we should lodge. 17 And, when we were come to Jerusalem, the brethren received us gladly. 18 ¶ And the day following, Paul went in with us unto James; and all the elders were present. 19 And when he had saluted them, he declared particularly what things God had wrought among the Gentiles by his ministry. 20 And when they heard it, they glorified the Lord,—

The apostle having holily resolved, that come life, or come death, he would be obedient to the call of God by his Spirit, and that nothing should divert him from his intended journey to Jerusalem, sets forward from Cæsaria to Jerusalem; accompanied with certain disciples of Cæsaria, who brought him to the house of one Mnason, an old disciple, who had long ago received the faith, and now lived at Jerusalem, in whose house the apostle lodged. Here note, What a badge of honour is put upon Mnason, even that of being an old disciple; to be an old man is an honour, but to be an old disciple is a double honour; it is a resemblance of him who is the Ancient of days: Where antiquity and piety, where agedness and holiness do concur, it renders a person as like the Divine Majesty as can be expected on this side glory: To be an old disciple, is a greater honour than to be a king or emperor. Note next, The apostle being come to Jerusalem; is kindly received of the church there, he enters the house of St. James; the bishop of Jerusalem, where the elders that were present, congratulate his arrival; and he relates to them what great things God had wrought by his ministry, and they all gave praise to God for the great and glorious success of the gospel: Learn hence, that all Christians in general, but the ministers of Christ in special, ought to make a particular declaration of the great and marvellous works which the Lord hath wrought for them, and by them. Thus did St. Paul here; he was very particular, no doubt, in relating the mighty works of God in the conversion of the Gentiles by his ministry from time to time, and from place to place: And all this, not to extol himself, but to exalt God for receiving the Gentiles into the faith and fellowship of the gospel:

—And said unto him, Thou seeest, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are which believe; and they are all zealous of the law. 21 And they are informed of thee, that thou teachest all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying, that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs. 22 What is it therefore? the multitude must needs come together: for they will hear that thou art come. 23 Do therefore this that we say to thee: we have four men which have a vow on them; 24 Them take and purify thyself with them, and be at charges with them, that they may shave their heads: and all may know that those things whereof they were informed concerning thee are nothing: but that thou thyself also walkest orderly, and keepest the law: 25 As touching the Gentiles which believe, we have written and concluded, that they may observe no such thing, save only that they keep themselves from things offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication.

We had St. Paul's report to the church of Jerusalem of the success which God had given him in his ministry amongst the Gentiles; this is related in the foregoing paragraph of the chapter: In these verses before us, we have the church's reply to the apostle's relation, They glorified God; First, For the great success given to the word of his grace among the Gentiles; and withal they acquaint him with the like success, which the preaching of the gospel had amongst the Jews: Thou seeest, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are which do believe; the original runs, how many tens of thousands do believe: which intimates the great and wonderful success to the gospel: Well might our Saviour compare it to a grain of mustard-seed, seeing it had spread itself far and near in so short a time: If we consider the smallness of its beginning, the despicableness of the instruments, the shortness of the time, the obstinacy and prejudices of the Jews, against the gospel, and yet remark the vast number of thousands and ten thousands of the Jews that did already believe, embrace and entertain it; we need not wonder that St. Paul, 1 Tim. iii. 16, reckons it as one of the greatest mysteries of godliness; that Jesus Christ was preached to the Gentiles, and believed on in the world: That is, that so many thousands both of Jews and Gentiles were brought to own him, and submit to him as Lord and Saviour. Note, next, The advice given by the church at Jerusalem to Paul, concerning the Jews which did believe in that place: It seems the Jews, though they had received the gospel, yet thought that the ceremonial law must still be observed; therefore, in condescension to their weakness, and to prevent their taking offence, they advise the apostle not as a thing necessary in itself, but as an expediency in reference to their weakness, to conform himself to some of the Jewish ceremonies and purifications; for though they were not then needful, yet were they not then unlawful; they might then be used, when the use of them would any ways conduce to the gaining and bringing over the Jews to a love of christianity. The synagogue was not hastily to be cast out of the church like the heathenish superstitions; but to die by degrees, and be decently interred. Here note, That the law of Moses, as to its moral part, Christ continued as his law: The ceremonial part, as to the use of the types and ceremonies signifying him that was to come, this was abrogated at Christ's coming: and the political part ceased, when the Jewish polity was dissolved; but the abrogation of the whole was not fully made known at the first, but by degrees; and the exercise of it long tolerated to the Jews. Lastly, The particular advice which they give the apostle, to go into the temple, and perform the legal ceremony of purification; We have four men which have a vow; them take, and purify thyself, that all may know that thou walkest orderly, and keepest the law: That is, "seeing we have four men here which have a Nazarite's vow upon them, the time of which vow is now expired expired, and they are to shew themselves ceremoniously in the temple; go thou with them, and perform the legal ceremony of purification there, that the people may know; that the report of thee is not true; but that thou, being a Jew, dost thyself keep the law." Here we may observe the truth of what St. Paul elsewhere declared, that to the Jews he became as a Jew, that he might gain the Jews; yea became all things to all men, that he might gain some. A noble pattern for the ministers of the gospel to write after in yielding, so far as we may without sin or scandal, to the weakness of others, in order to the furtherance of the great ends of our ministry among our people; To the Jew, I became as a Jew.

26 Then Paul took the men, and the next day purifying himself with them, entered into the temple, to signify the accomplishment of the days of purification, until that an offering should be offered for every one of them. 27 And when the seven days were almost ended, the Jews which were of Asia, when they saw him in the temple, stirred up all the people, and laid hands on him. 28 Crying out, Men of Israel, help. This is the man that teacheth all men every where against the people and the law, and this place; and farther, hath brought Greeks also into the temple; and hath polluted this holy place. 29 (For they had seen before with him in the city, Trophimus an Ephesian, whom they supposed that Paul had brought into the temple.) 30 And all the city was moved; and the people ran together: And they took Paul, and drew him out of the temple. And forthwith the doors were shut.

Note here, 1. That at the instance and importunity of his friends, St. Paul is persuaded to purify himself in the temple, partly to gain upon the affections of the believing Jews, who were still zealous for the law; and partly to confute the false aspersions of them that reported him to be above all ceremonial observances. If any had grudged, that, after the coming of the gospel, so much cost should be bestowed on the law, and say, with murmuring Judas, To what purpose was this waste? The law might truly answer with our Saviour, and say, "He did it for my burial, and for the more solemn interment of me." 2. How blind was the zeal, and how furious the rage of the unbelieving Jews against the apostle! They seek, and because they could not find, they take an occasion to vent their malice upon him; accordingly, they put the whole city of Jerusalem into an uproar, upon a pretence, that he had brought Trophimus, a Gentile, into the temple, to profane and pollute it; and in their blind rage, they dragged the apostle out of the temple, as a profaner of it. Well might the apostle say, he was in deaths often; 2 Cor. xi. 23. He was now in danger to be pulled in pieces by this tumult and of being made a sacrifice to the fury of the rabble: But God who never wants ways and means for the seasonable succour and relief of his faithful servants, in an unexpected manner, and by unthought of means, rescued the apostle from the jaws of death and danger, as the next verses inform us

31 ¶ And as they went about to kill him, tidings came unto the chief captain of the band, that all Jerusalem was in an uproar; 32 Who immediately took soldiers and centurions, and ran down unto them. And when they saw the chief captain and the soldiers, they left beating of Paul. 33 Then the chief captain came near and took him, and commanded him to be bound with two chains; and demanded who he was, and what he had done. 34 And some cried one thing, and some another, among the multitude: And when he could not know the certainty for the tumult, he commanded him to be carried into the castle. 35 And when he came upon the stairs so it was that he was borne of the soldiers, for the violence of the people. 36 For the multitude of the people followed after, crying, Away with him.

Note here, 1. How the great and gracious God provideth seasonable relieves for his persecuted and perplexed saints and servants; When they went about to kill Paul, God raises him up a deliverer. 2. The unexpected instrument of the apostle's deliverance, and that was an heathen governor. The Romans never durst trust such vast multitudes at Jewish festivals without a strong garrison to be a check upon them; accordingly, the governor, having tidings of the tumult, brings down a band of soldiers to see the peace kept, he rescues the injured apostle out of their hands, commands him to be bound with two chains, as Agabus had foretold, and the soldiers bear him up in their arms from the violence of the people. Hence we learn, 1. That a bad government, even a heathen government, is better than anarchy. Under a tyrannical government, many may be uneasy, but under popular rage none can be long at rest. 2. That heathens are oftentimes the protectors of christians against the blind rage of those that profess to worship the same God. St. Paul and these unbelieving Jews worshipped the same God; and yet the heathen soldiers were fain by force to carry and guard the apostle from the fury of the bloody unbelieving Jews. Thus God raiseth up what instrument he pleaseth to preserve his own gracious ends and designs in the preservation of his people. The barbarous heathen soldiers protect St. Paul and keep him from being torn in pieces by the Jews, who worshipped the same God with him.

37 And as Paul was to be led into the castle, he said unto the chief captain, May I speak unto thee? Who said, Canst thou speak Greek! 38 Art not thou that Egyptian that before these days madest an uproar, and leddest out into the wilderness four thousand men that were murderers? 39 But Paul said, I am a man which am a Jew of Tarsus, a city in Cilicia, a citizen in no mean city: and I beseech thee, suffer me to speak unto the people. 40 And when he had given him licence, Paul stood on the stairs, and beckoned, with the hand unto the people: and when there was made a great silence, he spake unto them in the Hebrew tongue, saying,

Observe here, 1. The justice which the chief captain, though an heathen soldier, did St. Paul: He demands what he had done before he punishes him; an heathen would hear the cause, before he condemns the person; a piece of justice which the law of nature requires and obliges to. 2. The unjust suspicion which the chief captain had of St. Paul's being a very bad man. Art not thou the Egyptian that madest an uproar, and leddest out four thousand men that were murderers? Here St. Paul, without cause, is suspected for a rebel, a seducer and a murderer, by the chief captain. It is not in the power of the most unspotted innocency, to protect from jealousy and suspicion from censure and calumny, from slander and false accusation. The peaceable apostle is suspected for a turbulent incendiary; Art not thou the Egyptian that madest an uproar? 3. The just and necessary apology Paul makes for himself, I am a Jew of Tarsus, a citizen of no mean city. Where note, 1. He describes his original; I am a Jew, not that wicked Egyptian which you suspected me to be; but a Jew of religious and noble extraction. Learn, That to be descended from religious and noble ancestors is a desirable privilege, and singular prerogative. St. Paul was a Jew, descended from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and the holy patriarchs. 2. He describes the country where he was born; he was born in Cilicia, a rich and fruitful country in Asia. Learn thence, That to be born in a rich and fruitful country (if godly and religious) is a very considerable favour and privilege; it was not blind chance and fortune, but a wise and merciful providence of God, which appointed both the place of our births and determineth the bounds of our habitation. What mercy is it that we were born, not in Spain, nor in Turkey, not in a land of darkness, but in a valley of vision! If the Spaniards have the golden mines, we have the golden treasures of the scriptures, more to be desired than gold, yea than much fine gold. Psal. xix. 3. He describes not only his country, but his native city, and the dignity of it: He was born in Tarsus, a citizen of no mean city, it being the metropolis or chief city of all Cilicia; in this famous city was the apostle born. Note hence, That to be born in a noble, free, and famous city, especially if religious, is a desirable favour and privilege. St. Paul was born in the noble city of Tarsus; But how could he then say as he did, Acts xxii. that he was a Roman? Ans. So he was; but not by birth, but by immunity and privilege. Tarsus was invested with the Roman privileges, and made free of Rome by M. Antonius: Thus Paul was free born, and declared that they ought not to scourge a Roman citizen. Note lastly, That though the forementioned privileges are considerable privileges, namely, to be descended from noble ancestors, to be born in a famous country, and in a free city, passages of divine providence not to be overlooked or disregarded, but very highly valued, and thankfully acknowledged: yet must it be remembered, that all these are but outward and temporal privileges, common to the worst, as well as the best of men; such privileges as a man may enjoy, and yet be under the wrath of God, and the guilt of eternal damnation. Let us labour to be nobly minded, as well as nobly descended: By regeneration born from above, otherwise we are low born, mean born, be our parents never so high. Thus the chapter concludes with an account of the apostle's eminent preservation in a time of imminent danger; when likely to have been torn in pieces by the riotous rabble, God stirs up the chief captain, an heathen, belonging to the bloody trade of war, to rescue oppressed innocency; and the guard of soldiers, who had no manner of affection for Paul, God sets as a life guard about his person, they bear him upon their arms, give him liberty to speak for himself; and his apology, or defensive plea, we have recorded in the following chapter.

CHAP XXII.

In the close of the foregoing chapter, we have the apostle craving leave of the chief captain to speak unto the people, they having made a violent assault upon him, and attempted to take away his life. Liberty of speech being granted him, he stands upon the stairs, near the gate of the castle, in which he was a prisoner, makes a sign to the people to hold their peace, and when they gave audience, in the Hebrew tongue, he thus speaks:

MEN, brethren, and fathers, hear ye my defence which I make now unto you. 2 (And when they heard that he spake in the Hebrew tongue to them, they kept the more silence; and he saith.) 3 I am verily a man which am a Jew, born in Tarsus a city of Cilicia, yet brought up in this city at the feet of Gamaliel, and taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers, and was zealous towards God; as ye are at this day. 4 And I persecuted this way unto the death, binding and delivering into prisons both men and women. 5 As also the high priests doth bear me witness, and all the estate of the elders: from whom also I received letters unto the brethren, and went to Damascus, to bring them which were there bound unto Jerusalem, for to be punished.

Here begins the apostle's apology, or defensive plea, which he makes for himself before the people at Jerusalem who, in the foregoing chapter, had so injuriously treated him: In which apologetical narration, we have these particulars observable. First observe, With what lenity and mildness he bespeaks his cruel and peevish persecutors the people of the Jews; he accosts them with titles of respect and honour: Men, brethren, and fathers. not with opprobrious invectives: he doth not render evil for evil, or railing for reviling; he had not so learned Christ, he knew how to suffer reproach for the gospel; but to persecute his persecutors with hard names and characters of reproach, was a piece of zeal which St. Paul and the holy sufferers of those times, were little acquainted with. 2. How the apostle insinuates himself into his auditors, that so he might gain their attention to what was spoken; Men, brethren, and fathers, hear ye I pray, my defence which I make unto you: There is a lawful and pious insinuation for gaining the attention of our auditors, which the ministers of Christ may and ought to make use of, as the workman that would drive his nail, dips it in oil. We gain our auditors attention by our courteous and loving compellations; Men, brethren, and fathers, hearken. 3. The apology or plea itself, in which he sets before them, 1. His extraction, I am a Jew, born in Tarsus: 2. His education, brought up at the feet of Gamaliel: 3. His profession, He was zealous towards God: That is, he was one of that sect among the Jews which were called Zealots, and were strict and exact in the observation of the law, a bitter enemy of Christianity, and a bloody persecutor of all that owned themselves the disciples of Jesus, as the high priest very well knows, says he, from whom I received a commission That if I found any of this way, whether men or women, I should bring them bound to Jerusalem. Note, That Damascus was five or six days journey from Jerusalem; yet Paul, when a persecutor, sticks not at it; but spurs on through fire and water to glut his malice and revenge on the poor members of Jesus Christ. Learn thence, That persecutors will spare neither purl nor pains, they will stick and stop at nothing, though never so toilsome and hazardous, so they may but satisfy their revenge upon the poor disciples of Jesus Christ: ver. 4. I persecuted this way unto the death, &c

6 And it came to pass, that as I made my journey and was come nigh unto Damascus about noon, suddenly there shone from heaven a great light round about me. 7 And I fell unto the ground, and heard a voice saying unto me, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? 8 And I answered, Who art thou Lord? And he said unto me, I am Jesus of Nazareth, whom thou persecutest. 9 And they that were with me saw indeed the light, and were afraid; but they heard not the voice of him that spake to me.

Our apostle having related what he was before his conversion, in the foregoing verses, in these and the following verses he declares the manner of his conversion; namely, That, when he was travelling to Damascus to pursue his persecuting design, a great light shined round about him, upon which he fell to the ground, and heard these words articulately spoken to him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? Where observe, That Christ takes the opposition made against his gospel, and the persecution carried on against his members, as done unto himself, it being against his friends, his cause and interest: As the honour done unto the head, redounds unto the members, so the wrongs and injuries offered unto the members, are resented by the head: Christ said not thus, (when upon earth) unto his murderers Why bind ye me? Why buffet ye me? Why scourge ye me, and crucify me? But now when his members suffered, he cries out from heaven, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? Lord, thou art more tender of thy body mytical, than thou wast of thy body natural; more sensible of thy members sufferings, than of thy own. Observe next, How ready the apostle was to understand and know, and how desirous to execute and do the will of God. Why art thou, Lord? and what wilt thou have me to do? We may sooner find fire without hear, than a true convert without operative grace. Farther, Christ's answer to Paul's inquiry. Who art thou, Lord? says Paul: I am Jesus of Nazareth, whom thou persecutest, saith Christ. Where note, That contemned, though not contemptible name, Jesus of Nazareth, is owned by Christ from heaven. Mark, He said not, I am Jesus the Son of God, I am Jesus the heir of the world, and Lord over all; but Jesus of Nazareth; he gloried in that reproach which his enemies call upon him, Jesus of Nazareth; he owned his name from heaven, to teach his members not to be ashamed of it when reproached by it here on earth. Lastly, The witnesses of Paul's conversion, The men were with him who saw the light, but heard not the voice. It is very probable that he had a considerable number of officers with him, to bring both men and women that professed christianity bound to Jerusalem. These saw the light shining, and heard a confused noise like thunder, but they heard not the articulate, much less the efficacious voice of Christ, which spake so convincingly to his soul. Lord, how many are there who come under the preaching of the gospel, that, with Paul's companions, hear only a confused noise, an empty sound? they do not hear the efficacious voice of Christ, speaking to their hearts with a strong hand, and so remain shut up under the power of unbelief.

10 And I said, What shall I do Lord? And the Lord said unto me, Arise, and go into Damascus; and there it shall be told thee of all things which are appointed for thee to do. 11 And when I could not see for the glory of that light being led by the hand of them that were with me, I came into Damascus. 12 And one Ananias, a devout man according to the law, having a good report of all the Jews which dwelt there, 13 Came unto me, and stood, and said unto me, Brother Saul, receive thy sight. And the same hour I looked up upon him. 14 And he said, The God of our fathers hath chosen thee, that thou shouldest know his will, and see that just One, and shouldest hear the voice of his mouth. 15 For thou shalt be as his witness unto all men of what thou hast seen and heard. 16 And now why tarriest thou? arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord.

Here note, 1. That although Christ converted Paul himself, yet Ananias as his minister must instruct him; by Christ is grace infused, but by his ministers increased. Such an honour doth Christ put upon the ministers of the gospel, that he makes use of their endeavours (ordinarily) both for the production and augmentation of grace in the hearts of his people. O the necessity and usefulness of a standing ministry! It is a singular favour to have the mind of God made known to us by men like unto ourselves: And behold behold the honour which God puts upon his ministers, in using them as conduit-pipes for conveying the water of life unto us, which is not ordinarily communicated immediately from himself nor immediately received by us! 2. The title given by Ananias to Saul; Brother Saul: They were now brethren by faith and profession, owning the God, united to the same Saviour, animated by the same spirit, encouraged by the same promises, partakers of the same hope, and heirs of the same glory: As the scripture speaks of a brother-hood betwixt Christ and believers, He is not ashamed to call them brethren; so it speaks of a brother-hood betwixt believers themselves, Love the brotherhood; that is, the whole fraternity of christians, who are Sanguine Christi conglutinati: Cemented by the blood of Christ, and united by the bond of love. 3. Ananias acquaints Saul with the special favours which God intended for him; the God of our fathers hath chosen thee, or taken thee by the hand; as the word signifies, that thou shouldst know his will, and see that just One, (so he calls the blessed Jesus) to convince them of their sin in putting him to death: And be a witness unto all men of what thou hast seen and heard. The work of the ministers of the gospel is now to witness for, hereafter to witness against; now they witness for God and his truth, and persuade sinners to believe it; hereafter they will witness against sinners for not believing and obeying the truth of God. Lord, what a sad consideration is this, that the ministers of Christ must be brought in as witnesses against the souls of their neighbours and friends, and be forced to testify to their faces for their condemnation! Ah, Lord, with what a heart must a poor minister study; when he considereth, that every sermon that he preaches must be brought in for a witness against many, if not most of his hearers? Doubtless this sad reflection makes very faithful ministers of Christ study hard, pray hard, intreat hard, be earnest and instant in season and out of season, that they may not be contemners of their people's souls. 4. The advice which Ananias gave to this new convert to take upon him the badge of christianity, to wit, baptism; Arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins. Here note, That sacraments are not empty, insignificant signs; but God by his grace and blessing renders his own ordinances effectual for those great ends for which his wisdom has appointed them; be baptized, and wash away thy sins: As water cleanseth the body, so the blood of Christ signified by water, wathes away the guilt of the soul. Where the faith, together with the profession of it by baptism, there is salvation promised, Mark xvi. 6. He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved.

17. And it came to pass, that when I was come again to Jerusalem, even while I prayed in the temple, I was in a trance: 18 And saw him saying unto me, Make haste, and get thee quickly out of Jerusalem: for they will not receive thy testimony concerning me. 19 And I said, Lord, they know that I imprisoned and beat in every synagogue them that believed on thee. 20 And when the blood of thy martyr Stephen was shed, I also was standing by, and consenting unto his death, and kept the raiment of them that slew him. 21 And he said unto me, Depart: for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles,

St. Paul having thus declared to the Jews his wonderful manner of conversion, proceeds next to acquaint them how desirous he was to have preached to the Jews rather than to the Gentiles, if the will of God had seen fit; but it proved otherwise; for, as he was praying in the temple he had a vision, in which he was commanded to hasten out of the city; because his former zeal in opposing the gospel would hinder his present preaching of it from being successful: Against this he humbly argued, that his former zeal against christianity might, he hoped be an argument to persuade the Jews his countrymen to embrace christianity: But this argument did not prevail for his staying at Jerusalem; but he was commanded to depart from thence to preach the gospel to the despised Gentiles who had not such strong exceptions against him, but would with more readiness embrace his doctrine. Learn hence, 1. That carnal reasonings are very apt to arise in the heart of God's own servants, and cause them to object something against their obedience to the divine commands: Here the apostle objects, that according to his reason he saw greater probability of doing good by his ministry among the Jews, than of him, as Ananias was; but Christ repeats his command; Depart, and get thee hence, for I will send thee to the Gentiles. And now the apostle doth no longer dispute but dispatch. This teaches us, 2. To lay by all our carnal reasonings and vain pretences, when once the call and command of God is clear, and no longer cavil, but comply; no longer object, but instantly obey. We may safely follow God blindfold, when once we have assurance that he goes before us, obey every command without hesitation or limitation.

22 And they gave him audience unto this word, and then lifted up their voices, and said, Away with such a fellow from the earth; for it is not fit that he should live. 23 And as they cried out, and cast off their clothes, and threw dust into the air, 24 The chief captain commanded him to be brought into the castle, and bade that he should be examined by scourging that he might know wherefore they cried so against him. 25 And as they bound him with thongs Paul said unto the centurion that stood by, Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman and uncondemned? 26 When the centurion heard that, he went and told the chief captain, saying Take heed what thou doest: for this man is a Roman. 27 Then the chief captain came, and said unto him, Tell me, art thou a Roman? He said Yea. 28 And the chief captain answered, With a great sum obtained I this freedom. And Paul said But I was free born: 29 Then straightway they departed from him, which should have examined him: and the chief captain also was afraid after he knew knew that he was a Roman, and because he had bound him: 30 On the morrow, because he would have known the certainty wherefore he was accused of the Jews, he loosed him from his bonds, and commanded the chief priests and all their council to appear, and brought Paul down and set him before them.

Note here, 1. With what patience the Jews heard the apostle's discourse, until he made mention of the Gentiles, and that he was appointed to preach to them; Upon which they brake forth into fury and passion, and expressed their fury by throwing dust into the air, and casting off their clothes, as if they would presently stone him, whom they looked upon as the worst of villains, and unworthy to live: Where we may remark at once, both what a vile opinion the Jews had of the Gentiles, whom they called and accounted dogs; and what an high esteem they had of themselves, and a proud conceit of their own deservings, as if the favours of heaven belonged to none but themselves, who yet trampled upon them, when they were tendered to them. 2. What a vile esteem these wicked Jews had of the holy and innocent apostle, who desired above all things to preach the glad tidings of the gospel to them, and longed most affectionately for the conversion and salvation of them: They account him the greatest villain upon earth, and unworthy to live upon it: But the good man had learnt (and let all the faithful ministers of Christ learn it after him) to take pleasure in reproaches, in persecutions, in necessities and distresses for Christ's sake: Away with such a fellow, from the earth, it is not meet that he should live. 3. The pious prudence and innocent policy which the apostle uses for his own preservation; when they were about to bind him to a post, in order to the scourging of him, the apostle declares himself a free denizen of Rome, by being born in one of the cities which the Roman emperor had made free; accordingly St. Paul pleads for himself the privilege of a Roman citizen, who neither ought to be bound nor beaten. Though we may not render evil for evil, yet we may right ourselves by all lawful means. Christ allows as much of the serpent as the dove, in his servants, provided the subtlety of the one doth not destroy the simplicity of the other: The head of the serpent, and the heart of the dove, do best together; for as policy without piety is too subtle to be good, so piety without policy is too simple to be safe. 4. How the chief captain fearing he had done more than he could answer, because it was death for any one in authority to violate the Roman privileges; therefore more out of fear than love, or more out of love to himself than the apostle, he looses St. Paul's bonds. Thence note, That when at any time the persecutors of the saints do desist from their bloody purposes, it is not out of love to them, but love to themselves. Lastly, The saints deliverances from affliction and persecution whilst on this side heaven, are not total or final, but momentary and partial. The apostle was delivered from his chains, not from his confinement; though unbound, not set at liberty: Next day we find him before the great council or sanhedrim, and fresh bonds and afflictions abide him. Little rest is to be expected by the members, and less rest by the faithful ministers of Jesus Christ in this world. Blessed be God for the believing hopes of an eternal rest; where the fury of the persecutor, the injuries of the oppressor shall cease for ever; where no sin shall affect us, no sorrow afflict us, no danger affright us; but we shall be perfectly like unto God, as well in purity as immortality. In the mean time, may we, the ministers of God, who are set for the defence of the gospel, bear the burden and heat of the day, with patience and courage, resolution and constancy; may we gird up the loins of our minds, not accounting either our labours or our lives dear unto us, so we may finish our course with joy, and fulfil the ministry which we have received of the Lord, glorying in our reproaches for well doing; yea, though we be accounted the filth of the world, and the off-scouring of all things: For when the chief shepherd shall appear, we shall receive a crown of glory, which fadeth not away.

C H A P. XXIII.

In this chapter we find St. Paul before the sanhedrim, or great council at Jerusalem, professing his own innocency; but instead of setting him at liberty, the Jews conspire his destruction, but the providence of God interposes for his deliverance, as this chapter fully informs us.

AND Paul earnestly beholding the council, said Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day. 2 And the high priest Ananias commanded them that stood by him to smite him on the mouth. 3 Then said Paul unto him, God shall smite thee, thou whited wall: for sittest thou to judge me after the law, and commandest me to be smitten contrary to the law?

Here we have observable the apostle's sober and ingenuous profession and protestation, Ananias's insolent and injurious injunction, St. Paul's zealous answer and contestation. Note, 1. The apostle's sober and ingenious profession and protestation, ver. 1. I have lived in all good conscience unto this day; that is, during his continuance in the Jewish religion, and since his conversion to the christian religion, he had walked uprightly, and according to his knowledge, and the light of his conscience. But had Paul a good conscience, when he persecuted the Christians? Ans. He went according to his conscience when he persecuted; he verily thought he did God service in so doing, and it was not any selfish or finisler end he proposed to himself: but zeal for his religion provoked him to persecution, Phil. iii. 6. Concerning zeal persecuting the church: It is certainly a man's duty to follow his conscience; but then, it is as much his duty to inform his conscience, as it is to follow it; I have lived in all good conscience until this day. Here note, The apostle sets forth the goodness of his conscience these four ways: (1.) From the goodness of his conversation; I have lived; A good conversation is the best evidence of a good conscience. God doth not measure man's sincerity by the tides of their affections, but by the constant bent of their their resolutions, and the general course and tenor of their conversations. Every man's conscience is as his life is.

(2.) From the generality of his care and obedience; I have lived in all good conscience; if it be not a conscience all good, it is no good conscience at all. Herod had some good conscience, he did many things; but the apostle went farther, he lived not in some, but in all good conscience.

(3.) The apostle sets forth the goodness of his conscience from the integrity of it towards God: I have lived in all good conscience before God: Many a man's conscience passeth for a good conscience before men, and perhaps before himself, which yet are not good before God, the judge of conscience.

(4.) From his continuance and constancy, Until this day: It is not sufficient to begin a good life, and to have a good conscience; but we must keep it too, and that all our days, even to our last day. Happy man! that can truly say at his dying day, I have lived in all good conscience until this day. 2. As the apostle's solemn protestation, so the high priests injurious injunction: Ananias commanded them that stood by him to smite him on the mouth. Here note, What is the reward of a good conscience from the world; to be smitten, either on the mouth, or with the mouth; either with the fist or with the tongue. There is nothing so enrageth men of wicked consciences, as the profession and practice of a good conscience doth: But better ten blows on the face than one on the heart; better a thousand blows for a good conscience, than one from it. 3. St. Paul's zealous answer and contestation, God shall smite thee thou whited wall. Where note, 1. That although the apostle doth not smite again as he was smitten, though he did not smite Ananias on the cheek, as he smote him on the mouth, yet he gives him a check and a sharp reproof for his violence and injustice. Thence learn, That christian patience, though it binds a man's hands, yet it doth not always bind his tongue; though it lays a law upon a man to forbear violence, yet it lays not a law upon him to enjoin him to silence. St. Paul, though he did not strike, yet he durst speak; though he held his hands, yet he did not hold his peace: Though religion pinions a man's arms from striking, yet it doth not seal up a man's lips from speaking; but we may declare both our own innocency, and others injustice. 2. St. Paul doth not say, "God shall judge thee, or God shall plague thee;" but God shall smite thee: denoting, That as there is always equity, so sometimes a retaliation in the executions of divine justice, or a recompensing like for like: God sometimes returns smiting for smiting, so that the sinner is forced to cry out, As I have done, so God hath requited me. God punishes sometimes in the same kind, sometimes in the same manner, sometimes in the same place; that sinners are forced to cry out, Righteous art thou, Lord! and just are thy judgments.

4. And they that stood by, said, Revilest thou God's high priest?

Observe here, That Ananias the high priest having commanded the apostle, unheard and uncondemned, to be smitten, the apostle denounces the just judgments of God upon him for the same; yet not in a way of imprecation, but prediction; not in a way of revenge, or recompensing evil for evil; but in a way of ministerial reproof, which the standers by called reviling, Revilest thou God's high priest? Thence learn, That profane sinners look upon the faithful reproofs, which the ministers of God give them for their lewdness, to be no better than revilings; they think we revile them, if we do but rebuke them; whereas though we chasten sinners with the rod of reproof, we dare not sting them with the scorpion of reproach.

5 Then said Paul, I wist not, brethren, that he was the high priest. For it is written, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people.

Several interpretations are given by the expositors of these words, I wist not, brethren, that he was the high priest. 1. Some think that St. Paul did not really know the high priest, having been gone so long from Jerusalem; and the high priest being made yearly. Others say, 2. That there being a great throng about him, the apostle could not distinctly hear who it was that spake to him. 3. Some understand it of absolute denial, that any such office as that of high priest then to be in being. As if the apostle had said, "I do not own any man to be a lawful high priest now, that function being abolished and disannulled at the coming of the Messias." Again, 4. Others understand the words, as if the apostle denied him to be the lawful high priest, one of God's appointing, he being one of man's making, having purchased the place with money; for the power and covetousness of the Romans put a new high priest every year to officiate; accordingly St. Paul knowing this man to be none of the posterity of Aaron, but brought in by fordid gold, might justly disown him to be the high priest. Lastly, there are who affirm, That the apostle did certainly see and know the high priest; and that his meaning is, "That having received such unjust usage in the court, as to be openly smitten in the time of hearing, he did not know, that is, he did not consider who it was that spake to him, and therefore spake hastily and unadvisedly." The scripture will not bear us out to use ill words to magistrates, should we be, as St. Paul here was, ill used by them: yet are magistrates no more to be flattered than they are to be reproached: The greatest may be reproved, and with a gracious severity told of their faults. and St. Paul did no more. It is no sin to tell the judgments of God, which will certainly come upon injurious and unjust oppressors.

6 But when Paul perceived that the one part were Sadducees, and the other Pharisees, he cried out in the council, Men and brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee: of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question.

Observe here, The innocent policy which the apostle uses for his own preservation: He perceiving that the council before whom he stood, were not all of a piece, but patched up of Pharisees and Sadducees, he publicly professes himself a Pharisee by education, and of that persuasion now in point of the resurrection. Thus at once he cast in a bone of contention both on the Sadducees who denied the resurrection, and the Pharisees who owned it; and obliged the Pharisees to take his part, to take his part, and thereby to turn their opposition against him upon the Sadducees, not by setting them at variance he might the better escape. Learn hence, That an innocent and prudent policy may warrantably be made use of by the members and ministers of Jesus Christ, without any blemish to their holy profession: in order to our preservation from the hands of persecutors, a serpentine subtlety may be made use of, together with a dove-like innocency. Thus he St. Paul here, when he perceived that one part were Sadducees, and the other Pharisees, he cried out, &c.

7 ¶ And when he had so said, there arose a dissention between the Pharisees and the Sadducees: and the multitude was divided. 8 For the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit but the Pharisees confess both. 9 And there arose a great cry. And the scribes that were of the Pharisees part, arose and strove, saying, We find no evil in this man: but if a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him, let us not fight against God.

.. Observe here, 1. How sad a state, and how bad a condition was the Jewish church now in, when in the sanhedrim or great council, men had power and authority, who believed no life but this; and what hypocrites were the Pharisees, who could thus incorporate and embody with damnable heretics, the Sadducees; and yet at the same time hated and persecuted the Christians. The Sadducees were so far from believing that there was any spirit, that they blasphemously maintained, that God himself was no spiritual, but only a corporeal Being. When men sin with obstinacy against supernatural light, God justly withdraws from them even natural light, and suffers them to fall from one degree of error to another. 2. How partially will change men's judgments, according to the interest of a party or faction. The Pharisees were bitter enemies to the apostle; but, because he owned himself of their sect, they instantly take part with him, and cry, We find no fault with him. The feuds about religion are commonly the sharpest feuds; men are more fond of the notions of their brains, than they are of the issue of their bodies: Odia religiosorum sunt acerbissim; "Religious hates are hottest." 3. How the dissensions of God's advisers oft-times become the deliverance of God's servants. Thus here, the Pharisees and Sadducees quarrel about the resurrection: The Pharisees justify St. Paul, and tell them that oppose him, "They are in danger, of fighting against God." Thus God, when he pleaseth, can find or make patrons of his people, and raise up friends from among his very enemies, to defend his cause.

10 And when there arose a great dissention; the chief captain, fearing lest Paul should have been pulled in pieces of them commanded the soldiers to go down, and to take him by force from among them, and to bring him into the castle. 11 And the night following, the Lord stood by him, and said, Be of good cheer, Paul: for as thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome.

St. Paul was now in the midst of difficulty and danger; but observe, how seasonably God steps in for his succour and deliverance: First, he stirs up that heathen tribune, the chief captain Lysias, who was present at the trial, to see his prisoner fair play; the Lord stirs up this man to rescue the apostle from the hands of violence, by which he was in danger of being pulled to pieces, and he is returned safe into the castle again. O how do God's encouragements evermore accompany his commands? His faithful servants, when they suffer for him, shall certainly be delivered by him, either in trouble or out of trouble. Secondly, God comforts the suffering apostle with his own presence, and with the gracious manifestations of his special favour, The Lord stood by him, and said, Be of good cheer, Paul. Where note, That if the Lord stand by, and be graciously present with his servants, in a suffering hour, it is no matter how mighty they be that do withstand them, and appear against them. No doubt, these words, Be of good cheer, Paul, turned the apostle's prison into a palace, yea, into a paradise, and enabled him to bid a bold defiance to all the devilish designs of all the Jews in Jerusalem against him; having got such good security for his safety, even from God himself, in the faith of which our apostle holily triumphs, saying, If God be for us, who can be against us! Rom. viii. 31. That is, None can be against us, either safely or successfully. The presence of God with his suffering servants outweighs all their dispartments.

12 And when it was day, certain of the Jews banded together, and bound themselves under a curse, saying, They would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul. 13 And they were more than forty which had made this conspiracy. 14 And they came to the chief priests and elders, and said, We have bound ourselves under a great curse, that we will eat nothing until we have slain Paul. 15 Now, therefore, ye with the council signify to the chief captain, that he bring him down unto you tomorrow, as though ye would inquire something more perfectly concerning him: and we, or ever he come near, are ready to kill him.

Observe here, 1. A barbarous and bloody plot, a cursed combination and conspiracy against the life of the innocent and useful apostle: No sooner was it day-light, but the wicked Jews bind themselves by an oath, never to eat or drink more, until they eat the apostle's flesh, and drink his blood. Thus the wicked plotteth against the just, and gnaweth upon him with his teeth, Psalm xxxvii. 12. 2. The numbers which were engaged in conspiracy, more than forty, they all agreed as one man. Lord, how numerous, how unanimous, how resolute and outrageous are the enemies of thy holy religion, to carry on their cursed contrivances for the extirpation of it! Thus was it here, these enemies were numerous, more than forty. The devil's designs never miscarry for want of fit instruments; he has a party ever ready to oppose the gospel in every place. And as they were unanimous, as well as numerous, they combined together in one cursed band; Here was unity, but not an unity in the truth, but a conspiracy against it: Here was the agreement and friendship, but it was like that of Herod and Pilate against Christ, and not for him: And they

they were resolute and outrageous, They bound themselves, under a curse, under a bloody vow, to pursue their purpose of murdering the apostle. It has been the old policy of the enemies of the church to oblige and bind themselves by oaths and execrations, by leagues and associations, to carry on their wicked and bloody designs against the church: They were more than forty, which made this conspiracy. 3. The quality of the persons which were engaged in this bloody purpose; they were the Sadducees, who denied the immortality of the soul, and a life after death. And they apply themselves to the high priest, and sanhedrim or great council, not doubting of his and their readiness to join with them. O what a low ebb was the Jewish religion now at! What an high priest and priesthood was there that must head a confederacy of murdering Sadducees! How great was the degeneracy of the Jewish church, when their chief priests were thus ready to comply with, and contribute their best assistance to such a cruel crew of cut-throats and bloody assassins! But they had almost filled up the measure of their sins and their final destruction was near approaching. Lastly, What craft and cruelty, what fraud and force are here found combined together in the church's enemies. The council must court the captain, that he bring down his prisoner, as though they would inquire something more perfectly concerning him. Thus was the plot against the apostle's life laid craftily as well as cruelly; under a pretence of having the prisoner re-examined, they contrive to have him brought down from the castle, and in his way to the council they combined together for his destruction. Lord, abate the power of the church's enemies, since their malice cannot be abated.

16 And when Paul's sister's son heard of their lying in wait, he went and entered into the castle, and told Paul. 17 Then Paul called one of the centurions unto him, and said, Bring this young man unto the chief captain; for he hath a certain thing to tell him. 18 So he took him and brought him to the chief captain, and said, Paul the prisoner called me unto him, and prayed me to bring this young man unto thee, who hath something to say unto thee. 19 Then the chief captain took him by the hand, and went with him aside privately, and asked him. What is it that thou hast to tell me? 20 And he said, The Jews have agreed to desire thee that thou wouldest bring down Paul to-morrow into the council, as though they would inquire somewhat of him more perfectly. 21 But do not thou yield unto them: for there lie in wait for him of them more than forty men, which have bound themselves with an oath that they will neither eat nor drink till they have killed him: and now are they ready looking for a promise from thee.

Note here, 1. That no conspiracies are or can be kept secret from God, who can both detect them, and defeat them at his pleasure, 2. The remarkable providence of God in bringing this conspiracy to the knowledge of St Paul's sister's son: He was perhaps by, when the conspirators were contriving the mischief, and overheard them. It is happy for the innocent, that the malicious cannot keep their own counsel. God oftentimes causeth the tongues of his people's enemies to fall upon themselves, and they discover the wicked purposes of their hearts, which none but themselves were privy to. 3. How the hearts of all men are in the hand of the Lord, and how he turneth them as he pleaseth. This is evident from the chief captain's great humanity towards St. Paul, and his courteous humility towards his sister's son, taking the youth by the hand, and as readily giving him both audience and dispatch; such a sovereignty and dominion has God over the hearts of men that he can instantly incline them as he pleaseth, and make very enemies become benefactors at his pleasure.

22 So the chief captain then let the young man depart, and charged him, See thou tell no man that thou hast shewed these things to me. 23 And he called unto him two centurions, saying: Make ready two hundred soldiers to go to Cesarea, and horsemen threescore and ten, and spearmen two hundred, at the third hour of the night. 24 And provide them beasts, that they may set Paul on, and bring him safe unto Felix the governor:

Observe here, 1. How wonderfully God over-ruled the heart of the chief captain, in that he took care both of St. Paul, and the young man also; he bids the young man depart; for had it been known that he had discovered the conspiracy, they had conspired against his life; and had not the chief captain conveyed away the apostle, his enemies who had been disappointed in this, would have made further attempts against his life. Thus wonderfully doth the good providence of God work for his servants preservation. 2. What a strong guard does God raise and set round the apostle for his defence and safety, even a guard of heathen soldiers to secure him from the Jewish rage; two hundred soldiers, three score and ten horsemen, and spearmen two hundred. What a royal life-guard was here raised for the apostle's safe conduct to Cesarea! None of all these soldiers intended him any good; but God made use of them as effectually, as if they had had the greatest good will for him. God can make bad persons shew kindness to his good servants, and do his will by them, who know nothing of his mind and will. When God has work to do, he will find instruments to do it by. And though we see them not, yet are they never the farther off.

25 And he wrote a letter after this manner: 26 Claudius Lyfias, unto the most excellent governor Felix, sendeth greeting. 27 This man was taken of the Jews, and should have been killed of them: then came I with an army, and rescued him, having understood that he was a Roman. 28 And when I would have known the cause wherefore they accused him, I brought him forth into their council; 29 Whom I perceived to be accused of questions of their law, but to have nothing laid to his charge worthy worthy of death or of bonds, 30 And when it was told me how that the Jews laid wait for the man, I sent straightway to thee, and gave commandment to his accusers also, to say before thee what they had against him. Farewel.

The chief captain Lysias having sent Paul under a strong guard to Cæsarea by night, where Felix the Roman governor resided, he writes a letter to acquaint Felix with the accusation laid to the prisoner's charge. In which letter, note, 1. The title given to the Roman governor, Most excellent: Claudius Lysias, to the most excellent governor Felix sendeth greeting, Titles of civil honor and respect given to persons in place and power are agreeable to the mind and will of God. There is an honor which belongs to men, with respect to their external degree and place, when none is due to them with respect to their internal qualifications. He that is very honourable as to his place, may not deserve any honor as to his worth; yet ought he to be honoured so far as his place requireth. 2. How God over-ruled the heart and pen of this captain Lysias, to do the apostle right, in representing his case fairly and indifferently: That he found nothing brought against him that was punishable, either with deaths or bonds, by the Roman law. 3. How triflingly he speaks of the great things in question concerning our blessed Redeemer's death and resurrection, as also of the whole gospel; he calls them undervaluing Questions of their lute. As the wisdom of the world is foolishness with God, so the manifold wisdom of God is accounted and esteemed folly by the ignorant and blind world. Yet, 4. How God over ruled his very slighting of these controversies in dispute, for the apostle's advantage; he being by that means preserved from the rage of the Jews; ver. 27. When this man was taken of the Jews, and should, &c. Behold how God accomplishes his own designs for the preservation of his servants, by the hand of those from whom destruction could rather have been expected. Thus here, God made use of an heathen captain to rescue and defend the apostle from the enraged Jews, who sends him under a strong guard with a friendly letter in favour of him, to Felix the governor at Cæsarea, where he gives notice to his accusers to implead him face to face. Blessed be God, that our times are in his hands, not in our enemies hands, nor yet in our own; until we have finished the work, which God designed us, neither men nor devils can take us off.

31 Then the soldiers, as it was commanded them; took Paul and brought him by night to Antipatris. 32 On the morrow they left the horsemen to go with him, and returned to the castle. 33 Who when they came to Cæsarea, and delivered the epistle to the governor, presented Paul also before him. 34 And when the governor had read the letter, he asked of what province he was? And when he understood that he was of Cilicia; 35 I will hear thee, said he, when thine accusers are also come. And he commanded him to be kept in Herod's judgment-hall.

The apostle being brought before Felix the Roman governor, although he was an heathen, yet he shewed the apostle far more favour than his own countrymen the Jews: For, observe, 1. His affability to St. Paul in asking him of his country. 2. His justice, he would not judge him till he had his accusers face to face: I will hear thee when thine accusers are come. If it be enough to accuse, who can be innocent? And if it be sufficient to deny, who would he found guilty? Magistrates must know a cause, before they give sentence or judgment about it; otherwise, though they pronounce a right sentence, it is not in judgment, but by accident. Magistrates must be stars, as well as ministers; they must do nothing blindfold, or blindly. 3. His great favour towards the apostle, in committing him a prisoner, not to the common jail, but to Herod's palace: A fair prison, if a place of confinement may be so called. The sanhedrim at Jerusalem, though of his own country, and of his own religion, yet were not so kind to him as Felix the heathen governor.— Thus the chapter concludes with an account of the apostle's wonderful deliverance from the Jews at Jerusalem, who conspired his destruction; together with the instrumental means and manner of it. In the next chapter we find him brought to Cæsarea, tried before Felix, making a defence for himself, and so reasoning that Felix trembled: Behold a prisoner at liberty, and his judge in bonds.

CHAP. XXIV.

In the beginning of this chapter we find St. Paul brought to his trial before Felix the Roman governor; a famous trial, at which the plaintiff was Ananias the high priest, and several members of the sanhedrim; the defendant, St. Paul; the judge, Felix; the emperor's attorney-general, Tertullus; and the indictment drawn up against the prisoner, heresy and sedition: From which imputation the apostle clears himself; and in the end of the chapter makes a declaration of his faith, and gives an account of the holiness and innocency of his life.

AND after five days, Ananias the high priest descended with the elders, and with a certain orator named Tertullus, who informed the governor against Paul.

Note here, How Ananias the high priest, with the elders or heads of the Jewish council at Jerusalem, travel from thence to Cæsarea, a great many miles, to inform the government against St. Paul; after five days Ananias descended, &c. The devil's drudges stick at no pains, spare for no cost, in doing his drudgery. A persecuting spirit claps wings to a person, it makes him swift in his motion, and zealous in his application and endeavours. 2. How the high priest carrieth with him one of their most eminent and eloquent advocates to implead the innocent apostle. Satan never miscarries in any of his enterprizes and wicked designs, for want of fit tools to carry them on. He hath his Tertullus, an eloquent orator, ready, who could tune his tongue any way for a large fee.

2 And when he was called forth, Tertullus began to accuse him, saying, Seeing that by thee we enjoy great quietness, and that very worthy deeds are done unto this nation by thy providence. 3 We accept it always, and in all places, most noble Felix, with all thankfulness. 4 Notwithstanding, that I be not farther tedious unto thee, I pray thee that thou wouldest hear us of thy clemency a few words.

Note here, St. Paul the prisoner being called forth, Tertullus the orator began to shew his art by a flattering insinuation, which mightily prevails with men of mean and corrupt minds. There is no cause so foul and bad, but some will be found to plead it; yea, to justify and defend it. And if so, judges had need be wise, as the angels of God, discerning between truth and falsehood. Farther, How Tertullus seeks to gain the judge's favour by flattery and falsehood: To win judges by flattery, hath ever by false accusers been taken for the surest way of success; but after all, flattery is a very provoking and wrath-procuring sin: and it is hard to say, which is most dangerous, to receive flattery, or to give it. When men give much glory to man, it is hard for man to give that glory back again to God. It is hell and death to flatter sinners, or suffer ourselves to be flattered by them. Lastly, That bad government is better than no government; tyranny itself is better than anarchy. The Jews were not now their own masters, but tributaries to the Romans. Yet Tertullus acknowledges, Many worthy deeds were done unto their nation by the prudence of the Roman governor: ver. 2, 3. Seeing that by thee we enjoy great quietness, &c.

5 For we have found this man a pestilential fellow, and a mover of sedition among all the Jews throughout the world, and a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes: 6 Who also hath gone about to profane the temple; whom we took, and would have judged according to our law. But the chief captain Lyfias came upon us, and with great violence took him away out of our hands, 7 Commanding his accusers to come unto thee: by examining of whom thyself mayest take knowledge of all these things whereof we accuse him. 8 And the Jews also assented, saying, That these things were so.

Tertullus having prepared the judge, presently falls upon the matter, and charges St. Paul with being a pestilent fellow, a seditious person, a disturber of the nation, a profaner of the temple, a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes. And adds, That out of mere zeal to the Jewish religion, they had themselves before now dispatched him out of the way, but that he was violently rescued out of their hands by Lisius the chief captain, and brought thither to be tried. Concluding, That these things which he had spoken, were the sense of all those that came down with him as witnesses. Ver. 9. The Jews also assented, and said that these things were so. Here note, 1. What an heavy load of reproaches and false accusations, our innocent apostle laboured under;

he is accounted, and called, a walking pestilence. Thus the holy and faithful servants of God are esteemed by the world, the plague and bane of the nation where they live; although it is really for their sakes that God stays off plagues and judgments from falling upon the world: We have found this man a pestilent fellow. It is not the greatest holiness towards God, nor righteousness towards men that can sufficiently shield and defend a saint from censure and slander, from calumny and false accusation. 2. Besides the general charge, that the apostle was the very pest and plague of mankind; we have a threefold accusation brought against him, That he was a mover of sedition, a profaner of the temple, and a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes. Lord, how should thy faithful ministers and ambassadors prepare themselves for, and comfort themselves under the most hellish reproaches, when we find the great apostle (whom St. Chrysostom honours with his character, "That the earth never bare a better man since it bare our Redeemer;") yet thus mis-called and accounted a pest, a plague, the filth of the world, and the off-scouring of all things! O why should such worthless worms as we, murmur, when we meet with much less reproaches! Lord, help us, in imitation of thy example, for the joy that is set before us, to despise the shame, as well as to endure the cross. The best men that ever the world had, have fallen under the lashes of envenomed tongues. What foul aspersions hath malice cast upon innocency itself? Our blessed Saviour in the clearest act of innocency, his casting out of devils, suffered the most horrid imputation, even of casting out devils through Beelzebub the prince of devils, Matt. ix. 34. Now the servant must not expect to be above his master; if Christ thus suffered, needs must Christianity, needs must Chrillians, needs must ministers and ambassadors.

10 ¶ Then Paul, after that the governor had beckoned unto him to speak, answered, Forasmuch as I know that thou hast been many years a judge unto this nation, I do the more cheerfully answer for myself: 11 Because that thou mayest understand that there are yet but twelve days since I went up to Jerusalem for to worship. 12 And they neither found me in the temple disputing with any man, neither raising up the people, neither in the synagogues, nor in the city: 13 Neither can they prove the things whereof they now accuse me.

Our apostle, being accused of three notorious crimes, namely, sedition, heresy, and profanation of the temple, answers distinctly to every one of them. Where note, 1. How undaunted innocency is in a good person, and in a good cause; St. Paul was so far from being daunted by the greatness of his enemies, or by the vehemency of their accusation, that he tells the governor, he did with all cheerfulness undertake his defence. 2. How the apostle answers distinctly to the particulars of his accusation. And, first, As to the crime of sedition charged upon his person. Secondly, As to the crime of heresy, charged upon his religion. As to the former, the crime of sedition, this is a very infamous charge : What schism is in matters ecclesiastical, this is sedition in matters temporal and civil. As the one violates the peace of the church, so doth the other the commonwealth. Seditious is committed three ways : by the head, by the tongue, and by the hand. A seditious head plots and contrives mischief, a seditious tongue vents it, and a seditious hand executes it. None of these ways was the apostle guilty of sedition : He never employed his heart to contrive, nor his tongue to utter, nor his hand to practise any thing that tended that way ; yet he is charged with it ; We have found this fellow a mover of sedition. Learn thence, It is no new stratagem, to represent the faithful servants of God, as enemies to states and kingdoms, as disturbers of the peace, as troublers of Israel, as trumpets of rebellion, as movers of sedition, on purpose to bring them into hatred with princes, that they may fall under the sword of the magistrat as malefactors, and be looked upon as persons unworthy to live. But how does St. Paul free himself from the charge of imputation and sedition ? Thus, 1. By demonstrating the improbability of it ; how unlike it was, that he who came up to the temple to worship God, and to bring alms to the poor, and was in Jerusalem but a very few days, and did not so much as dispute either in the temple, or in the synagogues, should yet stir up the people to sedition. He puts his adversaries upon proof of their articles, ver. 13. Neither can they prove the things whereof they now accuse me. From the apostle's practice in clearing his own innocency, we learn, That it is a piece of justice which every man owes to himself, to vindicate and clear his reputation from all guilt falsely imputed to him, and especially from that of sedition.

14 But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and the prophets :

Here the apostle answers the second part of the charge brought against him : namely, the charge of heresy, and being the ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes. Where note, That although the apostle would not out of his great modesty take upon himself to be one of the heads or chiefs among them, a ringleader, as they styled him ; yet as to the owning of that way, notwithstanding all the imputations they had cast upon it, he doth it with the greatest freedom and courage, in the presence of his judge and accusers ; This I confess, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I, &c. Here note, 1. The false imputation which christianity suffered under, in its first appearance ; After the way which they call heresy. It is no new thing to nickname the worshippers of the true God, to call them heretics, and their way of worship heresy. 2. The way taken by St. Paul to remove this false imputation ; namely, by an appeal to scripture and antiquity ; So worship I the God of my fathers, believing, &c. Where observe, How he appeals to scripture as the ground and rule of his faith, the law and the prophets ; and then he appeals to the best and purest antiquity for the object of his worship ; So worship I the God of my fathers. Note, 3. The freedom and courage of the apostle in owning his religion, notwithstanding these false imputations, even in the presence of his greatest enemies, and when they were in hopes to destroy him for it ; This I confess unto thee. The apostle abhorred that mean and base-spirited principle which makes it lawful for men to deny their religion, when it brings them into danger : No, he valued his above, and preferred it before, his personal safety. God Almighty inspire us with the same courage and holy resolution, that when our adversaries of the church of Rome pronounce us heretics, and call our religion heresy, we may answer them as our apostle answered their forefathers, the subtle Pharisees, After the way which ye call heresy, so worship we the God of our fathers, &c.

14 And I have hope towards God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust. 15 And herein do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence toward God and toward men.

Our apostle had made a free and open profession of his religion in the foregoing verse, After the way called heresy do I worship the God of my fathers ; here, at the 15th verse, he asserts the doctrine of the resurrection, which was a principal article both of the Jewish and the Christian religion ; I have hope towards God, that there shall be a resurrection both of the just and unjust. And having made a declaration of his faith, ver. 14, 15. he next gives an account of his life, at ver. 16. Herein do I exercise myself, &c. Observe here, 1. What is the principle and guide of a good man's actions, and that is conscience. The word and law of God is the rule of our actions, but conscience is the immediate guide and director of them. 2. The extent of a good man's pious practice, To keep a conscience void of offence toward God and man : To exercise a faithful care in performing the duties of both tables, is both an argument of our sincerity, and an ornament to our profession. 3. The apostle's constancy and perseverance in this course, To have always a conscience void of offence. We must not make conscience of our duty by fits and starts, but in the whole course and tenor of our lives and actions. Religion should be a constant frame and temper of mind. 4. The apostle's earnest care and endeavour to this purpose, Herein do I exercise myself : The original word is of an intense signification, and denotes the apostle's applying his mind in good earnest, to be thoroughly instructed in all the parts and points of his duty, and his being very careful and conscientious in the discharge and performance of it. 5. What was the apostle's great motive and encouragement to do all this ; namely, the belief of the resurrection, and the future state of rewards and punishments consequent upon it ; Because I hope for a resurrection both of the just and unjust. Therefore do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence. If we believe the resurrection of the dead, and the judgment to come, we shall be very careful to discharge a good conscience now, in order to the rendering a good account of ourselves then. Happy man, who, when he goes into another world, carries with him thither a conscience clear of all guilt, either by innocency or by repentance ! For verily, at the hour of death, to be free from stings and upbraidings, from the terrors and tortures, from the confusion and amazement of a guilty conscience, is a happiness so desirable, that it is well worth the care and best endeavours of our whole life. May the apostle's exercise be our daily practice, namely, To keep a conscience void of offence toward God, and toward all men!

17 Now after many years I came to bring alms to my nation and offerings. 18 Whereupon certain Jews from Asia found me purified in the temple, neither with multitude, nor with tumult. 19 Who ought to have been here before thee, and object if they had ought against me. 20 Or else let these same here say if they have found any evil doing in me, while I stood before the council. 21 Except it be for this one voice, that I cried standing among them, Touching the resurrection of the dead, I am called in question by you this day.

The apostle had vindicated himself from the charge and imputation of sedition and heresy before, he comes now to clear himself of the third charge, namely, the profanation of the temple; in order whereunto, he declares that he had not been a long time at Jerusalem before this journey, and that he now came to bring alms to the poor Jews that were converted to christianity: He acknowledges, that at this time he went indeed into the temple, yet not to profane it, but to perform those rites in it, which the law of Jews required of such as had the vow of Nazarites upon them. Thus the apostle cleared himself of all that was objected against him, and made it evidently appear to the face of his enemies, that all the accusations brought against him were false and clamorous. Learn thence, That generally the accusations laid by the malicious to the charge of the innocent, are nothing but empty noise and clamour. Having thus vindicated himself to their faces, he next makes an appeal to the consciences of his accusers, whether there was any thing of moment charged upon him more than this. That he professed and believed the resurrection of the dead. Thus bravely did the apostle plead his own cause here, or rather the spirit of God that spake in him, though Satan had got the high-priest and Ananias his eloquent orator Terrullus, to implead and impeach St. Paul; Yet behold with what a flood of truth and eloquence doth the apostle vindicate his own innocence. Magna est veritas, et prevalebit; "Great is the truth, and will finally prevail."

22 And when Felix heard these things, having more perfect knowledge of that way, he deferred them, and said, When Lyfius the chief captain shall come down, I will know the uttermost of your matter. 23 And he commanded a centurion to keep Paul, and to let him have liberty, and that he should forbid none of his acquaintance to minister, or come unto him.

The sense of this is: "When Felix understood and discerned how things went, he would not cast sentence in the case at present; but put them off, saying, When I have got a more perfect knowledge of this way of Christianity; and when I have spoken with Lyfias, and understand the truth concerning the tumult, I will then determine the difference between you: In the mean time the captain of the guard shall have the prisoner in custody to gratify the Jews.' Where observe, Both the equity and clemency of Felix the judge: His equity, in that he would not pronounce sentence before he had thoroughly and fully understood the matter of fact; His clemency, in suffering the apostle to be a prisoner at large, and allowing his friends and acquaintance liberty to come and visit him. Behold the former rigour towards the apostle mercifully relaxed; he is no more confined to a close dungeon, but goes abroad with a chain and a keeper, and none of his friends are forbidden either to visit him, or relieve him. Thus God, in an unexpected hour, casts such outward comforts to his suffering saints and servants, as he sees will do them most good; yea, and can cause his and their enemies to become contributors thereunto.

24 And after certain days, when Felix came with his wife Drusilla, which was a Jewess, he sent for Paul, and heard him concerning the faith in Christ. 25 And as he reasoned of righteousness, temperance and judgment to come, Felix trembled, and answered, Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee.

This chapter now concludes with the apostle's famous sermon before Felix his judge, in which we have considerable, the preacher, the hearers, the text or subject preached upon, and the successful effect of the sermon. Observe 1. The preacher, St. Paul, As Paul reasoned: The apostle now was in bonds, yet had liberty to preach, and he preached with liberty, with great boldness and freedom of speech, though under great disadvantages; his person imprisoned, his reputation blotted and defamed, loaded with calumnies and odious imputations; yet under all these disadvantages the apostle preaches. 2. His hearers, Felix and his wife Drusilla; Felix, a bad man, guilty of bribery, &c. Drusilla, a vile woman, left her own husband, and lived in adultery with Felix; as Josephus says; Here was a pair of hopeful hearers; yet St. Paul boggles not to preach to them, as bad as they were, hoping to make them better. Learn thence, That the gospel must be preached by us, when we are lawfully called thereunto, whatever the persons be that make up the auditory; we know not what persons, or in what hour God may call. Observe, 3. The text or subject matter preached upon, righteousness, temperance; and judgment to come: where the wisdom of the preacher appears by the suitability of the subject; the apostle chose a very proper subject for them both. Felix was guilty of bribery, or at least was ready to commit it; the next verse tells us, He hoped to have money given him by Paul, to release him; therefore to him he preached of righteousness Drusilla was guilty of incontinency and adultery, to her he preaches of temperance, and to both of a judgment to come: Happy were it, if great offenders had such wise admonishers near them; but too often they meet with flattering parasites instead of faithful preachers. 4. The success successor effect of this sermon, Felix trembled. He trembled but not believed; he trembled at the guilt of sin, and at the apprehensions of the wrath of God due unto sin; but his trembling did not arise from a holy dread and reverence of the Majesty of God speaking to him in and by his word: The word of God can make the proudest and stoutest sinner in the world to quake and tremble. Lastly, How Felix's trembling fit or sick qualm of conscience soon went over; he dismisses the preacher for that time, and tells him he will call for him at a more convenient season. But we never read of any such opportunity taken afterwards for that purpose; so dangerous it is to stop our ear at the present cull and command of God; if to day we will not, to-morrow, God may say, you shall not hear my voice.

26 He hoped also that money should have been given him of Paul that he might loose him: wherefore he sent for him the oftner, and communed with him. 27 ¶ And after two years Porcius Festus came into Felix's room; and Felix willing to shew the Jews a pleasure, left Paul bound.

Observe here, What small success the apostle's preaching had, it found and left him a bad man; covetousness and bribery were his sins before, and they are so still: He hoped that money should be given him of Paul. That is, he expected a bribe for setting the apostle at liberty; contrary to the law both of God and man. To this covetousness he added cruelty; for though he had nothing to charge Paul with, yet to gratify the Jews, he left Paul bound; minding the pleasing of men more than the displeasing of God. An hypocrite can become all things to all men, that he may gain by all; but behold the hand of God upon Felix; he that had so unjustly kept Paul bound for two years; and cruelly left him bound at last, to please and gratify the Jews is sent a prisoner in bonds himself to Rome, to answer before Nero, for his misdemeanors in managing of his government. A just reward for him who regards the pleasing of men more than the displeasing of God.

C H A P. XXV.

In this chapter we find St. Paul, brought upon his trial before Festus, who succeeded Felix in the government. And although Festus could find the apostle guilty of no misdemeanor, yet he had neither the courage nor honesty to set him at liberty; but sends him bound from Cesarea to Rome, as related in this and the following chapters.

NOW when Festus was come into the province, after three days he ascended from Cesarea to Jerusalem. 2 Then the high priest and the chief of the Jews informed him against Paul, and besought him, 3 And desired favour, against him, that he would send for him to Jerusalem, lying wait in the way to kill him. 4 But Festus answered, that Paul should be kept at Cesarea, and that he himself would depart shortly thither. 5 Let them therefore, said he, which among you are able, go down with me, and accuse this man, if there be any wickedness in him.

St. Luke here informs us, that Festus being come to the government, and going up to Jerusalem, the high priest and rulers of the Jews quickly began to inform him against Paul, and besought him that he would send for him to Jerusalem, resolving to lay some villains by the way to kill him as he came; but the divine providence so over-ruled this matter, that Festus would not consent to it, but ordered his accusers to come to Cesarea, and implead him there. Here note, 1. How restless is the rage, and unwearied the malice and enmity, which the persecutors of the truth have against the professors and preachers of it. The high priest, and chief of the Sanhedrim or ecclesiastical court, continue their murderous designs against the innocent apostle; and are sorry they could not get an heathen governor as cruel as themselves, to join with them. Heathens have sometimes blushed at the mention of those crimes, which the professors of religion have committed without either shame or remorse. 2. How deplorably corrupt and degenerate the Jewish church at this time was! Lord, what priests and church governors were here, who call it a favour to have an opportunity granted them to murder an innocent man in cold blood, contrary to the law of nature, and of nations! But behold the justice of God upon them; they were now given up to a reprobate sense, and are hurried headlong by a diabolical spirit, a little before their final destruction: O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, who killst the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee. 3. What an over-ruling providence was here seen, in that Festus, by no flatteries, nor persuasions, would be prevailed with to remove the apostle from Cesarea to Jerusalem: this broke the high priest's measures, who designed to have killed him by the way. "No saith Festus, the prisoner shall not come to you, but you shall go to him." This was a marvellous providence for the apostle's preservation. O how easy is it for the most wise God to baffle and blast the most cunning contrivances of the devil, to befool the enemies of his church and people, by making the counsels of the wicked to be of no effect! God looks and laughs at all the plots of wicked men against the righteous: Frustration and disappointment attends all their designs, and perdition and destruction doth awe their persons; Psal. iii. 5. He that sitteth in heaven laughs them to scorn, the Lord hath thent in derision.

6 And when he had tarried among them more than ten days, he went down unto Cesarea; and the next day sitting in the judgment seat, commanded Paul to be brought. 7 And when he was come, the Jews which came down from Jerusalem stood round about, and laid many and grievous complaints against Paul, which they could not prove; 8 While he answered for himself, Neither against the law of the Jews, neither against the temple, nor yet against Cesar, have I offended any thing at all:

Note here, 1. The equity and justice of Festus, an heathen judge, in his proceedings at St. Paul's trial; he will have the high priest and elders that accused him speak to his face; he will have the prisoner brought forth, and he will have the matter examined by, and before himself. When the malicious bring the innocent upon their trial, God will provide a judge for their turn. 2. The indictment or charge which the Jews brought in against the apostle. That he had offended against the law, profaned the temple and raised sedition against the Roman government. Here we find the devil at his old trade: Namely stirring up the rage and malice of the world against the saints of God, under pretence of their being enemies to the state, and subverters of civil government. 3. That to be loaded with calumnies and reproaches, has been the common lot, and constant portion of the faithful friends and servants of Christ, from the beginning of Christianity; The Jews laid many and grievous things against Paul which they could not prove. Reproach has been the reward of religion and righteousness; but St. Paul easily wipes off the several reproaches cast upon him, affirming himself to have always been a religious observer of the law, that he went into the temple upon a religious account, that he had never taught nor practiced any rebellion against Cæsar. The servants of Christ are happy in their own innocency, and their adversaries render themselves odious by belying them, and laying that to their charge which every one can disprove.

9 But Festus, willing to do the Jews a pleasure, answered Paul, and said, Wilt thou go up to Jerusalem, and there be judged of these things before me?

10 Then said Paul, I stand at Cæsar's judgment-seat, where I ought to be judged. To the Jews have I done no wrong, as thou very well knowest.

11 For if I be an offender, or have committed any thing worthy of death, I refuse not to die: but if there be none of these things whercof these accuse me, no man may deliver me unto them, I appeal unto Cæsar. 12 Then Festus, when he had conferred with the council, answered, Hast thou appealed unto Cæsar? unto Cæsar shalt thou go.

Observe here, How Festus, being willing to gratify the Jews, asks St. Paul if he would go to Jerusalem, and be tried there, in the Jewish court, about those matters? The apostle replied, That he was his prisoner, and that he was proper judge under the Roman emperor, and not the Jews; and that being a Roman, he might claim the privilege of a Roman, which accordingly he did by appealing unto Cæsar. Festus hearing that, not only admitted his appeal, but was glad of it, to get rid of him without peril on the one hand, or ill-will on the other. Here we remark, 1. That carnal politicians do not so much consider what is just and right in its own nature, as what is of use and advantage to themselves, be it right or wrong. The apostle had cleared himself from all slanderous accusations; and yet, Festus, willing to do the Jews a pleasure, would not set him at liberty. It is too often the practice of corrupt judges, that they may please the people, to deliver up truth to be injuriously crucified; considering more their own interest, than the prisoner's innocency. 2. How the apostle appeals from Jerusalem to Rome, from his own countrymen to Heathens; from the high priest to the emperor Nero; expecting to find more justice at the hands of infidels, than from the Jewish sanhedrim: And to this the apostle was in some sort divinely admonished by Christ himself, to make his appeal to Rome, Acts xxiii. 11. Be of good cheer, Paul, thou shalt bear witness to me at Rome. Doubtless, this was a mighty support, and strong consolation to him, to know that he appealed and desired to go to Rome, where God had appointed to have him go.

13 And after certain days, king Agrippa, and Bernice came unto Cæsarea, to salute Festus. 14 And when they had been there many days, Festus declared Paul's cause unto the king, saying, There is a certain man left in bonds by Felix: 15 About whom when I was at Jerusalem, the chief priests and the elders of the Jews informed me, desiring to have judgment against him. 16 To whom I answered, It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die; before that he which is accused have the accusers face to face, and have licence to answer for himself concerning the crime laid against him, 17 Therefore when they were come hither, without any delay on the morrow I sat on the judgment-seat, and I commanded the man to be brought forth: 18 Against whom, when the accusers stood up, they brought none accusation of such things as I supposed; 19 But had certain questions against him of their own superstition, and of one Jesus, which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive. 20 And because I doubted of such manner of questions, I asked him whether he would go to Jerusalem, and there be judged of these matters, 21 But when Paul had appealed to be reserved unto the hearing of Augustus, I commanded him to be kept till I might send him to Cæsar.

Note here, 1. How God will not be wanting to his servants in their greatest wants and sufferings, but will providentially dispose of all matters in order to their deliverance, when it may most conduce to his own glory and their good. Thus here, king Agrippa comes to congratulate Festus; Festus declares the cause of God's oppressed servant to the king, and God makes use of both Festus and Agrippa to screen the apostle from the violence of his enemies. In the mount will the Lord be seen, his people's extremities are the seasons of his succour. 2. How the very light of nature in and amongst the Heathens condemns it as an act of manifest and notorious injustice in a judge to pass sentence upon a person unheard, and unallowed to make his defence. This baseness was below the Roman gallantry whilst Pagans; Festus demands the accusers and the accused to appear face to face; and yet such a diabolical spirit of malice had so blinded the Jews, that contrary to the law of nature, and the law of nations, they would have had St. Paul here condemned, without knowing the cause or hearing his defence. 3. What base and vile, what low and undervaluing thoughts and apprehensions have carnal men of the high and holy things of God. Festus here calls the religion and worship, which was of God's own institution, most profanely and contemptuously by the name of superstition; They had certain questions against him of their own superstition: And how slightly doth he also speak of our glorified Redeemer, styling him one Jesus! but no wonder that the dunghill-cocks of the world know not the worth of the pearl of price.

22 Then Agrippa said unto Festus. I would also hear the man myself, To-morrow said he; thou shalt hear him. 23 And on the morrow, when Agrippa was come, and Bernice, with great pomp; and was entered into the place of hearing with the chief captains and principal men of the city, at Festus's commandment Paul was brought forth.

24 And Festus said, King Agrippa, and all men which are here present with us, ye see this man, about whom all the multitude of the Jews have dealt with me both at Jerusalem and also here, crying that he ought not to live any longer. 25 But when I found that he had committed nothing worthy of death, and that he himself hath appealed to Augustus, I have determined to send him. 26 Of whom I have no certain thing to write to my Lord. Wherefore I have brought him forth before you, and especially before thee, O king Agrippa, that after examination had, I might have somewhat to write. 27 For it seemeth to me unreasonable to send a prisoner, and notwithal to signify the crimes laid against him.

Observe here, 1. King Agrippa's curiosity to see and hear St. Paul; he was born and bred up among the Jews, and probably understood something of the christian religion; possibly had heard much of Paul, and therefore desired to see him, as Herod desired to see Christ, and to hear John the Baptist, only to gratify his curiosity, not to be advantaged by his ministry. 2. How contemptuously the Holy Ghost speaks of all the pomp, retinue and state, which Festus, Agrippa, and Bernice appeared in, at the time and place of hearing; he calls it fancy, so the original word signifies, intimating, That all the pomp, gaiety, and glory of the world, is nothing but fancy, a dream and a shadow, having no real existence, but a being in imagination only. Observe, 3. That truth and innocence shine forth the more splendidly by the greater opposition that is raised against them. The more malicious the Jews were in accusing Paul, the more did his innocency appear; and the more was he acquitted and discharged by his judges. Thus we see the providence of God wrought all matters for Paul's justification, and for the Jews reprehension: Festus had nothing to write to Caesar, no crime to inform him of against the apostle. Thence learn, That although God sometimes permits his servants to be laden with slanders and reproaches, yet he will find a time to clear their innocency, and cause their very judges, if not their accusers to proclaim them guiltless. I find, saith Festus, that he hath committed nothing worthy of death. It is no small mercy, to have our innocency vindicated, for God to clear up our righteousness as the light, and our just dealings as the noon-day, and to free our reputation from those blemishes which the uncharitable suspicions, or rash censures of men have cast upon us. There is no spot so unbeautiful, as that upon our credit, saving only upon our consciences. God made the apostle's enemies here do him right, and his name was clothed with honour in the estimation of his very adversaries.

C H A P. XXVI.

This chapter brings St. Paul to his third trial, namely, before King Agrippa: In it we have the apostle's apology or definitive plea, which he makes for himself against those blind Jews; who did so maliciously persecute him.

THEN Agrippa said unto Paul, Thou art permitted to speak for thyself: Then Paul stretched forth the hand, and answered for himself: 2 I think myself happy, king Agrippa, because I shall answer for myself this day before thee touching all the things whereof I am accused of the Jews: 3 Especially, because I know thee to be expert in all customs and questions which are among the Jews: Wherefore, I beseech thee to hear me patiently.

Note here, 1. The person whom the apostle makes his defence before, Agrippa, Agrippa a king, of whom he begs the favour patiently to hear him: It is a great favour for great men so much as to hear an innocent good man plead for himself: Agrippa, who, by reason of his birth and breeding among the Jews was acquainted with the scriptures, the law and the prophets. 2. How the providence of God wonderfully procures St. Paul a liberty to speak for himself: Hereby he had an opportunity at once to make known his case, and to publish the gospel. But note, farther; That as the providence of God procured him liberty, so the good Spirit of God gave him ability to speak so efficaciously and effectually, with such evidences and demonstration, that he not only took the ears, but captivated the consciences of the whole court, and almost persuaded the king himself to turn christian.

4 My manner of life, from my youth, which was at the first among mine own nation at Jerusalem, know all the Jews, 5 Which know me from the beginning (if they would testify) that after the most straitest sect of our religion, I lived a Pharisee.

Here the apostle begins his defence, with a relation of the innocency and strictness of his life before his conversion; he did and could appeal to all that knew him, concerning the unblameableness of his conversation. Thence note, That an innocent and blameless life, from our youth upwards, is a singular support and encouragement to us in a suffering hour, especially when we are called forth to suffer for religion and righteousness sake. Farther, The inference which the apostle gives of his strictness in religion. After the most straightest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee. Of all the sects among the Jews, there was none that took up such an extraordinary strict way of religion as the Pharisees; of this sect was St. Paul, before converted to Christianity, and in this he rested for salvation. Thence learn, 1. That an extraordinary strict way taken up in religion, is thought by many a sure and sufficient foundation for their eternal salvation. 2. That many may rest upon a strict way of religion, which yet cometh not up to, but is oft-times besides, the appointment of the word of God: The Pharisees, for their unusual and supererogating way of exactness, concluded that they should really go to heaven, if any did; when, alas! many things which they practised with extraordinary zeal and strictness, were never required by God at their hands.

6 And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers: 7 Unto which promise our twelve tribes instantly serving God day and night hope to come. For which hope's sake, king Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews.

Our apostle had vindicated his life before, his doctrine now: He tells Agrippa, that for believing, expecting and preaching the doctrine of the resurrection, he was questioned of the Jews: This he calls the hope of the promise made of God unto the fathers: Others understood it of the promise of the Messiah, which was made unto the fathers, and was generally depended upon by the most pious among the twelve tribes scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth; and in the faith and expectation whereof, they fervently served God night and day: Learn thence, 1. That the pious and Godly among the Jews, lived in hopes of the Messiah's appearing, of a glorious resurrection by him, and of an eternal life and salvation with him. 2. That their hope of this promised mercy, did cause them to serve God instantly day and night. Hope is the great exciter of industry and endeavour; expectation puts it upon action: hope of obtaining, is the motive to every undertaking; the Christians hope, or thing hoped for, is great and excellent in his esteem, namely, eternal life; and where the esteem is high, the endeavour will be strong, that christian who has well grounded belief and hope of a life to come, will serve with an unwearied diligence and industry; if by any means he may attain the fruition and enjoyment of it, ver. 7. Unto which promise, &c.

8 Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?

As if the apostle had said; "The great point in controversy between me and you is this, whether the dead in general shall arise? and whether Christ in particular be risen from the dead? Now, why should either seem incredible to you? Is it too hard for God, who made the world, and upholds the world, and gives life to all living; is it too hard or difficult for him to raise the dead? If not, why should it be thought incredible or impossible?—Learn hence, That the doctrine of resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust, is neither incredible nor impossible, neither against right reason or true faith.

9 I verily thought with myself, that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth. 10 Which thing I also did in Jerusalem: and many of the saints did I shut up in prison, having received authority from the chief priests; and when they were put to death, I gave my voice against them. 11 And I punished them oft in every synagogue, and compelled them to blaspheme: and being exceedingly mad against them, I persecuted them even unto strange cities.

Here the apostle frankly declares, that he was once as sharp and bitter an enemy to Christ, and to all that believed in him, as any one whatever; and thought himself bound in conscience to persecute all that owned him; and, with threatenings and tortures, compelled them to deny Christ, and, being exceedingly fierce, he forced them to fly to heathen cities to escape his fury. Where note, 1. That we ought to be upon very good and sure grounds, before we oppose and persecute any. 2. That some persecute others, and at the same time think they do well in so doing; I verily thought, says the apostle, that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus. He spake as if his conscience would have troubled him, unless he had troubled others, for that which was indeed their conscience. 3. That Paul, being a blasphemer himself, compelled the professors of the gospel to blaspheme. This he probably did two ways. First, by his example, they imitated him in blaspheming, or speaking evil of the ways of Christ. Or secondly, by his cruelty; vexing them so in the profession of Christ, that some who were unfeared, probably fell away, and blasphemed the name of Christ, which they had professed. He compelled them to blaspheme: There is a compelling power and constraining force in example, especially in the example of persons in power and authority. Men sin with a kind of authority: Paul's blasphemous example compelled others to blaspheme.

12 Whereupon as I went to Damascus, with authority and commission from the chief priests, 13 At mid-day, O king, I saw in the way a light from heaven, above the brightness of the sun, shining round about me, and them which journeyed with me. 14 And when we were all fallen to the earth, I heard a voice speaking unto me, and saying in the Hebrew tongue, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks. 15 And I said, Who art thou, Lord? And he said, I am Jesus whom thou persecutest.

Our apostle having declared his manner of life before conversion, proceeds next to declare the extraordinary manner of his conversion: He tells Agrippa, that as he went with a persecuting purpose towards Damascus, at mid-day mid-day, a light from heaven, above the brightness of the sun, shined round about him, and when they were all fallen prostrate on the earth, he heard a voice speaking to him in the Hebrew tongue, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? &c. Here note, 1. How restless and unwearied persecutors are in the execution of their bloody designs and purposes: Paul as he thought, had swept and cleansed Jerusalem of saints before: After which he resolves to ransack Damascus, and undertakes a long journey, of five or six days, in order to that end: The worst journey that ever he intended but the best that ever he undertook; a journey most maliciously purposed by him, but most mercifully disposed by God; and accordingly, he is met with in the way: Christ appears to him, a sudden beam of light shines round about him, and a voice is heard by him, saying, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? that is, Me in my members. Such as persecute saints for their sanctity, persecute Christ himself and he can no more endure to see them wronged than himself; as the honour of the head redounds to the members, so the sorrows of the members are resented by the head: Christ said not thus to his murderers on earth, "Why bind ye me? Why buffet ye me? Why scourge ye and crucify me?" But here, when his members suffer, he cries out from heaven, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thoume? Lord, thou art more tender of thy body mystical, than thou wert of thy body natural; more sensible of thy members sufferings than thine own!

16 But rise and stand upon thy feet: for I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee; 17 Delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee, 18 To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith that is in me.

St. Paul had given king Agrippa an account of his miraculous conversion in the former verses; in these he declares to him his extraordinary commission to preach the gospel; that Christ, who appeared to him from heaven, chose him to be a preacher, as well as a professor of the gospel; assuring him that he would stand by him, and deliver him from the persecutions both of Jews and Gentiles to whom he should send him, and would bless his endeavours, to the opening the eyes of their understanding and to the turning of them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they might receive, by faith in Christ, and remission of sins, and a portion of the heavenly inheritance among such as are regenerated by his Holy Spirit. Here note, 1. The honour which God is pleased to put upon the ministry of the word, his own ordinance: The apostle, who was the only instrument, is said to open the eyes of the blind, and turn sinners from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God; all which is properly and principally the work of the Spirit of Christ; yet he is pleased to put this honour upon his instruments the ministers, by whom he worketh all this, and for which reason they are called co-workers, or workers together with Christ. 2. The apostle's mission; I send thee. Great is the dignity of gospel ministers they are God's messengers; their commission is sealed by the whole Trinity, and intimates both their dignity and duty: To intimate their holiness, they are called men of God; for their vigilancy, watchmen; for their courage, they are called soldiers; for their painfulness, harvest labourers; for their care of the flock, shepherds; for their wisdom, overseers; for their industry, husbandmen; for their patience, fishermen; for their tenderness, nurses; for their affectionateness, fathers and mothers; for their faithfulness, stewards. A very high and honourable calling; the Son of God despised it not. 3. St. Paul's commission in the several branches of it. To open their eyes, that is, to enlighten their understandings, that they may know God and their duty to him. In order to which there is required (1.) Ability in the preachers: How can they open the eyes of others who are blind and ignorant themselves? Ought not they that undertake to be guides and leaders, very well to know the way themselves? (2.) Perspicuity in the sermon: What hope can there be of opening men's understanding, when the matter delivered is closed up from them? It was St. Paul's aim to speak words easy to be understood, and it should be ours: it is the same thing to preach in an unknown tongue as in an unknown style, above the reach of our hearers. Painted glass is more costly, but the plainer glass is the clearer and more useful. But we must take care, that, though we come in plainness, yet not in rudeness of speech. The second part of St. Paul's commission, was to turn men from darkness unto light, and from the power of Satan unto God; in order to which, he was turned from these himself. He has little reason to expect, that God will honour his ministry for the conversion of others from sin and Satan, who is under the dominion of both himself. The ministers life is the people's looking-glass, by which they usually dress themselves. 4. The happy fruit of St. Paul's mission and commission both, That they may receive forgiveness of sins, and an inheritance among them that are sanctified. Where-soever true repentance is wrought by the ministry of the word, there is forgiveness attained, and title to the inheritance of heaven attained with it. Lastly, a threefold metaphorical description of the state of grace after conversion. The state of nature is a state of blindness, To open their eyes: A state of darkness, To turn them from darkness to light: A state of slavery, And from the power of Satan unto God. The state of grace after conversion is set forth by light, light, and liberty. All this is Christ's work originally, but his minister's work instrumentally: I have sent thee to open their eyes; to turn them from darkness to light, &c.

19 Whereupon, O king Agrippa, I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision: 20 But shewed I first unto them of Damascus, and at Jerusalem, and throughout all the coasts of Judea, and then to the Gentiles, that they should repent and turn to God.

and

and do works meet for repentance. 21 For these causes the Jews caught me in the temple, and went about to kill me. 22 Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue unto this day, witnessing both to small and great, saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come; 23 That Christ should suffer, and that he should be the first that should rise from the dead, and should shew light unto the people, and to the Gentiles.

Note here, 1. How obedient the apostle was to the call of Christ; having had so glorious a vision, he did not, he durst not rebel at the light of it; but immediately went forth and preached, first at Damascus, then at Jerusalem, then throughout all Judea, and at last among the Gentiles, the doctrine of repentance, and the necessity of good works. 2. The ill requital which the good man met with for his diligence and faithfulness in preaching the glad tidings of the gospel; for this he had like to have been killed by the Jews in the temple: Evangelium predicare est furorem mundi in se derivare; "To preach the gospel is the ready way to bring the wrath and fury of the world upon ourselves." 3. With what thankfulness the apostle owns and acknowledges the merciful providence of God in preserving him both from the fraud and force of his enemies, Having obtained help of God, I continue unto this day. And how did the sense of divine goodness upon his soul, provoke him to go on with his work, declaring no other thing concerning Christ, but what Moses and the prophets did of old foretel of him; namely, That he should be put to death, and should be the first that should rise again by his own power, and be the author of our resurrection. Note here, That the sufferings of Christ were taught by Moses, in all the commands given about sacrifices; and not by Moses only, but by the prophets also, particularly the prophet Isaiah, chap. liii. the evangelical prophet, and prophetic evangelist, who wrote as clearly of Christ's coming, as if he had then been come: From whence the apostle argues, how black the wickedness of the Jews was, who went abroad to kill him for preaching the same doctrine which Moses and the prophets had taught before him.

24. And as he thus spake for himself, Festus said with a loud voice, Paul, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad. 25 But he said, I am not mad, most noble Festus: but speak forth the words of truth and soberness. 26 For the king knoweth of these things, before whom also I speak freely. For I am persuaded, that none of these things are hidden from him: for this thing was not done in a corner.

Hitherto Festus had heard the apostle with great patience, but now he interrupts him, and tells him, he talks like a man that was crazed. Carnal minds pass very uncharitable censures upon spiritual persons and spiritual things. Christ's Lord said, He was beside himself, Mark iii. 21. Festus here judged Paul to be mad, thinking that he had over-studied himself; by meddling with matters too high for his capacity, and too deep for his understanding, he had brought himself into a deep melancholy: Paul thou art beside thyself, much learning hath made thee mad. But observe with what meekness and due terms of respect the apostle replied to this reviling governor, I am not mad most noble Festus. Here note, 1. The title of honour given to Festus, not so much to his person, for that was unworthy, as to his office, which was truly honourable, Most noble Festus. Titles of respect and honour given to persons in place and power, are agreeable to the mind of God, and countenanced by Christianity. 2. What an happy victory and conquest the apostle had over his own passions he waves the reflections Festus had made upon him, and had learned of his Master, who, when he was reviled, reviled not again. It is an happy attainment for a man to be master of himself under a provocation, to be regulated by right reason, and not hurried by blind passion.

27 King Agrippa, believest thou the prophets? I know that thou believest.

The apostle, knowing that Agrippa was educated among the Jews, tells him that he could not but hear of the life, doctrine, miracles, death and resurrection of Christ; all which were done openly, and not in corners; and he could not but believe the prophets, and what they had foretold concerning the Messiah; and if the power of worldly interest did not overcome him, his life and praise would be answerable to his faith and belief. Thence learn, That a right belief of the holy scriptures is of great efficacy and force to conform a person's life to the practise of real and universal holiness.

28 Then Agrippa said unto Paul, Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian. 29 And Paul said, I would to God that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day, were both almost, and altogether such as I am, except these bonds.

Note here, 1. What an efficacy St. Paul's doctrine had upon Agrippa; though he would not be converted, yet he could not but be convinced; his conscience was touched, though his heart was not renewed. Learn thence, That there is certainly that in religion which carries its own evidence along with it, even to the consciences of ungodly men. 2. How sad it is, when persons have enjoyed the scriptures, the preaching of the word, and all means of salvation, and yet are but almost Christians, and shall never enjoy the least salvation; they are within sight of heaven, and yet shall never have a sight of God. 3. That such as will be Christians indeed, must not only be almost, but altogether Christians: I would that you and all that hear me, says the apostle, were altogether such as I am, except these bonds. Where note, The extraordinary charity and Christian compassion of St. Paul: He wished them his graces, not his chains; he did not wish them his bonds and imprisonments, but he wished them the same liberty and enlargement by Jesus Christ, which he enjoyed; he would keep his sorrows and outward troubles to himself; but wishes they were acquainted with his inward consolations, solutions and comforts. A good man wishes others as well as he wishes himself; and if at any time he wishes that which is penally evil to the worst of his enemies, he doth it with an eye to their spiritual and eternal good: A good man dares not wish ill to those that have actually done ill to him; but wishes, prays, and endeavours the best good for them.

30 And when he had thus spoken, the king rose up, and the governor, and Bernice, and they that sat with them. 31 And when they were gone aside, they talked between themselves, saying, This man doeth nothing worthy of death, or of bonds. 32 Then said Agrippa unto Festus, This man might have been set at liberty, if he had not appealed unto Cæsar.

Note here, How Agrippa, Festus, and the whole company, acquit the innocent apostle in their judgments and consciences, yea, with their tongues declare that he deserved neither death nor bonds; yet at the same time that they acquit him, they discharged him not, but he is left in his enemies hands and at last put to death by the Gentiles. But how, may it be said, was God's promise fulfilled then, verse 16, 17. I have appeared unto thee, to make thee a minister and a witness, and will deliver thee, &c. How did God deliver him from the Gentiles, when he was at last delivered into their hands, and put to death by the Gentiles; Ans. As long as the wisdom of God saw it fit and convenient, for the purposes of his glory, and as a real mercy conducing to the apostle's good; as long as it was a true and beneficial deliverance, so long God wrought deliverance for him; nay, rather than fail, in a miraculous manner, no chains could bind him, no iron-gates, nor prison-walls confine him: But when he had finished his course, run his race, fought the good fight of faith, and done the work which God set him about, it would not then have been a deliverance, but a real detriment to have been kept longer from his reward: Now might the apostle say, Give me my robes and my crown. God now made his word good to the apostle, to deliver him from the people and the Gentiles, by making death his deliverer and deliverance. Thus faithful is God in his promises to his people. He will deliver them in six troubles and in seven; in every danger, in every difficulty; but when death is the best deliverance: they shall have it as a covenant mercy and blessing; for all things are ours, if we be Christ's, whether life or death, 1 Cor. iii. 22.

C H A P. XXVII.

This chapter gives us an account of St. Paul's voyage by sea from Cæsarea to Rome: and though it proved a very dangerous voyage, yet the divine care preserved him, and all that were with him, for his sake. A full relation, both of the danger and deliverance, is recorded in this chapter.

AND when it was determined that we should sail into Italy, they delivered Paul and certain other prisoners unto one named Julius, a centurion of Augustus' band. 2 And entering into a ship of Adramyttium, we launched, meaning to sail by the coasts of Asia, one Aristarchus a Macedonian of Thessalonica being with us. 3 And the next day we touched at Sidon. And Julius courteously entreated Paul, and gave him liberty to go unto his friends to refresh himself.

The time being now come for the fulfilling of God's purpose and determinate counsel concerning Paul, recorded Acts xxiii. 11. Be of good cheer, Paul, as thou hast testified of me at Jerusalem, so shalt thou bear witness also at Rome. Pursuant to this purpose of God, Festus the Roman governor delivers the apostle and his associates, Luke, Timothy, and Aristarchus, to Julius, in order to their sending, with several other prisoners, who probably were great malefactors, to the city and court of Rome, where all appeals made to the Roman emperor were heard and determined before himself. Now here we have observable, 1. The person whom the apostle was delivered to, Julius, a very civil person to the apostle, who suffered him to see and receive the civilities of his friends. Thus God raises up his people friends in the midst of their sufferings, and when persecutors send his saints to prison, he will provide keepers for their turn. Julius, an heathen soldier, was kinder to him than his own countrymen the Jews. 2. The villainous company of malefactors and prisoners that the innocent apostle was packed with: They delivered Paul and certain other prisoners to Julius. Saints and sinners, good and bad, innocent and nocent, share together in the same outward miseries; but though they be thus jumbled together in this world (where all things come alike to all) yet the righteous Judge will make a difference between them in the other world, according to their works. 3. Though the apostle was thus yoked with malefactors and criminals in the ship yet God favoured him with some companions which were according to his heart's desire; namely, his dear associates St. Luke, Timothy, and Aristarchus. It is a great comfort to the afflicted, to have good companions in their afflictions, Optimum solatium est sodalium: But above all, it was the happiness of the apostle, that he enjoyed the presence of God with him in so comfortable a manner, in and under all his sufferings, according to his promise, chap. xviii. 10. I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee. The gracious special presence of God with his children and people, is a sure and sufficient support unto them in and under all the difficulties and trials which his wisdom sees fit to exercise and try them with. 4. What an additional favour it was from God, that St. Paul found friends in Sidon, such saints as he could comfortably converse with, and receive refreshments from, even needful accommodations for his tedious voyage. Learn hence, That God's care of, his compassion towards, and provision for, his children and people, is universal and perpetual, at all times, and in all places.

4 And when we had launched from thence, we sailed under Cyprus, because the winds were contrary. 5 And when we had sailed over the sea of Cilicia and Pamphylia, we came to Myra, a city of Lycia. 6 And here the centurion found a ship of Alexandria sailing into Italy; and he put us therein. 7 And when he had sailed slowly many days, and feared we were come over against Cnidus, the wind not suffering us, we sailed under Crete, over against Salmone; 8 And hardly passing it, came unto a place which is called, The fair haven; nigh whereunto was the city of Iafea. 9 Now when much time was spent, and when sailing was now dangerous, because the fast was now already past, Paul admonished them, 10 And said unto them, Sirs, I perceive that this voyage will be with hurt and much damage, not only of the lading and ship, but also of our lives. 11 Nevertheless, the centurion believed the master and the owner of the ship more than those things which were spoken by Paul.

An account is here given of the very hazardous voyage which the apostle had from Cesarea towards Rome. He sails from Cesarea to Cyprus; from Cyprus to Cilicia; from Cilicia to Crete: And having been long at sea, and the summer wearing away, and the great fast being past; that is, the anniversary fast of expiation, which was on the tenth day of September; after which the sea growing tempestuous, the ancients left off sailing until March, because of the shortness of the days; St. Paul, foreseeing the danger of the season, and being also inspired by the Spirit of God, admonished them of the great hazard of the voyage both to the ship and also to the lives of those that were in it, and advised them to venture no further till the sea was calmer; but the owner and governor of the ship (who was supposed to be better skilled in his own art) advising otherwise, the captain of the guard prefers his judgment before Paul, and so sets forward, but with great hazard and greater loss, as the event declared. From the whole we gather, That the fittest seasons ought to be observed and taken for every enterprise, both sacred and secular: Winter journeys by land, or voyages by sea, are unsafe, as well as uncomfortable. A season is beautiful for all things, and has a lustre upon it above all other parts of time. This winter voyage, about our October, was very hazardous and unseasonable, for the winds were boisterous and contrary the days very short, the light little, the night long, the clouds thick, the weather dark the storms raging; therefore the apostle advised to winter in the Fair haven, knowing that the season for sailing was now past.

12 And because the haven was not commodious to winter in, the most part advised to depart thence also, if by any means they might attain to Phenice, and there to winter; which is an haven of Crete, and lieth towards the south-west and north-west. 13 And when the south wind blew softly, supposing that they had obtained their purpose, loosing thence they sailed close by Crete. 14 But not long after, there arose against it a tempestuous wind, called Euroclydon.

15 And when the ship was caught, and could not bear up into the wind, we let her drive. 16 And running under a certain island that is called Claudia, we had much work to come by the boat; 17 Which when they had taken up, they used helps, undergirding the ship; and fearing lest they should fall into the quick sands, strake sail, and so were driven. 18 And we being exceedingly tossed with a tempest, the next day they lightened the ship; 19 And the third day we cast out with our own hands, the tackling of the ship.

The farther difficulties and dangers which the apostle met with, in this winter voyage, are here described and declared and the properest lessons of instruction which can, I think, be gathered from them, will be by way of allusion: Thus, 1. The ship in which he sailed is an emblem of the church, in her militant state here on earth; she is afflicted, tossed with tempests, and in danger of being shipwrecked every moment; many tempestuous Euroclydons arise suddenly; and threaten her fatally; but her wise Pilot sits at the helm, steers her with a fixed eye and steady hand between rocks and shelves, under-girding her by his everlasting arms of power and love which are underneath her; and when in our apprehensions, she is brought to a hopeless and helpless state, without the light of sun or stars to comfort her; then doth the Lord enlighten her darkness, and at midnight there shall be light. Again, 2. This voyage neglected in the summer, and undertaken in the winter season, to the peril of the passengers, and loss of the ship, lively represents unto us both the folly and danger of persons who suffer the spring of youth and the summer of ripe-age to slip and slide away from them; and when the winter of old age comes upon them, then they think of sailing forth towards the fair-haven of eternal happiness, and not before. Set we forth never so soon the winds will be contrary, the weather tempestuous, the rocks many, the difficulties great: And yet, Lord! how is our precious time spent and spilt? When age comes upon us, we complain we want time, whereas we foolishly waste it; how are miserable souls that set out late for heaven (when they can serve sin no longer) benighted, bewildered, shipwrecked, eternally and irrecoverably lost? Behold, now only is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation.

20 And when neither sun nor stars in many days appeared, and no small tempest lay on us, all hope that we should be saved was then taken away. 21 But after long, abstinence Paul stood forth in the midst of them, and said, Sirs, ye should have hearkened unto me, and not have loosed from Crete, and to have gained this harm and loss. 22 And now I exhort you to be of good cheer; for there shall be no loss of any man's life among you, but of the ship. 23 For there stood by me this night the angel of God, whose I am, and whom I serve, 24 Saying, Fear not, Paul; Thou must be brought before before Cæsar: and lo, God hath given thee all them that sail with thee. 25 Wherefore, sirs, be of good cheer: for I believe God, that it shall be even as it was told me, 26 Howbeit we must be cast upon a certain island.

Note here, 1. The hopeless, helpless, comfortless state, which St. Paul, and those in the ship with him, were now reduced to; neither sun nor stars appeared, and the weather proved very tempestuous; and when they utterly despaired of life, then God gives Paul, and the rest, a comfortable assurance, that nothing should be lost, but the vessel only. O how does God delight to deliver those that are forsaken of their hopes? what a present help is he to the helpless? He reserves his holy hand for a dead lift; our extremities are the seasons of his succour. 2. The great and special favour with which God indulged the holy apostle, even to send an angel to him to comfort him: The angel of God, whose I am, and whom I serve, said, Fear not. O what an encouragement is it to us, to enter upon, and be faithful in the service of God, when he causes his holy angels, upon all occasions, to serve us? when visible dangers are before us, God has invisible servants round about us, both to succour and secure us. Lord, help me in sincerity to say, Thine I am, and thee I serve: let me be found faithful in all the instances of my duty to thee, and then I shall find (as the apostle here) that safety evermore accompanies duty. 3. How God was pleased, for St. Paul's sake, to save all that were with him in the ship; sinners are spared and saved for the saints' sake, whom yet they hate and seek to destroy. The wicked are oft-times delivered from temporary destruction, for the sake of the godly who live among them, and intercede with God for them; there were two hundred threescore and sixteen persons, all heathens, except three or four, saved for Paul's sake, who no doubt begged their lives of God. Lord, what fools and madmen are the wicked, who seek the destruction of those for whose sake it is that they are not themselves destroyed? The breaches which wicked men make by sinning, they make up by praying. 4. How steady and stedfast the apostle was in the faith and belief of God's promise and providence, for his own and the company's preservation. I believe God, that it shall be even as it was told me. We honour God exceedingly, when we depend upon his promise, rely upon his power, believe his word, though what he says be very improbable, and unlikely to come to pass.

27 But when the fourteenth night was come, as we were driven up and down in Adria, about midnight, the shipmen deemed that they drew near to some country: 28 And sounded, and found it twenty fathoms: and when they had gone a little further, they sounded again, and found it fifteen fathoms. 29 Then fearing lest we should have fallen upon rocks, they cast four anchors out of the stern, and wished for the day. 30 And as the shipmen were about to flee out of the ship, when they had let down the boat into the sea, under colour, as though they would have cast anchors out of the foreship. 31 Paul said to the centurion and to the soldiers, Except these abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved. 32 Then the soldiers cut off the ropes of the boat, and let her fall off.

A farther account is here given, both of the apostle's imminent danger and extraordinary deliverance; for fourteen days together, the ship was continually tossed in the sea; at last, the mariners cast four anchors out of the ship, and by the help of a boat, intended to make their escape, leaving the passengers to shift for themselves: St. Paul perceiving this, told the centurion and the soldiers, that though Almighty God had promised to preserve them, yet they must not expect it without using the means for their own preservation, which was to stay the mariners in the ship; whose help and diligence, direction and care, would be especially needful to them on such an occasion. Hereupon the soldiers, to prevent the mariners' design, cut the ropes of the boat and let it fall into the sea. Learn hence, That the end and the means are always joined together in the purpose and decree of God. The same God that ordained the end, ordained the means in order to that end: therefore, as to trust to means, is to neglect God: so to neglect the means is to tempt God. As here, That God who decreed that they should not perish with the ship, decreed that the skilful seamen should abide in the ship. Almighty God likes not to be tied to means himself; but it is his pleasure to tie us: Sometimes, to shew his sovereignty, he is pleased to work without means; sometimes to shew his omnipotency he works without means. The fire shall not burn, the water shall not drown, the iron shall swim, the sun shall stand still, nay, go several degrees backwards: The First Cause can suspend the power and operation of second causes, when he pleases. But as the care of the end belongs to God, so the care of the means belongs to us, and must be used when they may, and where they can be used. Accordingly, here, the mariners, in order to their own and others preservation, stay in the ship, lighten the ship, undergird her, cast out their anchors, hoist up the main-sail, loose the rudder-bands, and do every thing to their preservation which was needful. The purpose of God to prolong our lives, must not lessen our care for the preservation of our lives: When God has ordained and appointed means, we cannot expect to find safety in the neglect of that means.

33 And while the day was coming on, Paul besought them all to take meat, saying, This day is the fourteenth day ye have tarried, and continued fasting, having taken nothing. 34 Wherefore I pray you to take some meat; for this is for your health: for there shall not an hair fall from the head of any of you. 35 And when he had thus spoken, he took bread, and gave thanks to God in presence of them all; and when he had broken it, he began to eat. 36 Then were they all of good cheer, and they also took some meat. 37 And we were in all in the ship, two hundred threescore and sixteen souls.

Note here, 1. What honor God put upon the holy apostle; although he was a poor prisoner in chains, yet God made him the only counsellor and comforter unto all that were in the ship. First he adviseth them to eat, because that through consternation of mind, and horror of death, they had made no set meal for fourteen days; not that they subsisted miraculously without any nourishment at all; but eat so little, that it was in a manner continual fasting. Next he becomes the chaplain of the ship: He gave thanks to God in the presence of them all; that is, he desired God's blessing upon what they eat, and praised him for it: Thanks should be returned when benefits are received from the hand of man, much more from the hand of God: What shall we think of those that sit down to a full table as a beast to his forage, without taking any notice of the bountiful hand that feeds them! St. Paul having thus refreshed himself, and by his example and words encouraged all the rest to do the like; an account is taken of the exact number of persons which were in the ship, and it was found to be two hundred three score and sixteen souls: Probably, this was done at the motion of St. Paul, that so, after their deliverance, it might appear how exactly his prediction, mentioned ver. 22. That there shall be no loss of any man's life, nor an hair fall from the head of any, was verified and fulfilled. Whatever God speaks by the mouth of his holy servants, be it by way of prediction or denunciation, shall certainly be accomplished and come to pass: God is honoured in his truth, when his promises are fulfilled towards his people, and threatenings inflicted on his enemies, 38 And when they had eaten enough, they lightened the ship, and cast out the wheat into the sea. 39 And when it was day, they knew not the land: but they discovered a certain creek with a shore into which they were minded, if it were possible, to thrust in the ship. 40 And when they had taken up the anchors, they committed themselves unto the sea, and loosed the rudder bands, and hoisted up the main sail to the wind, and made towards shore. 41 And falling into a place where two seas met, they ran the ship aground: and the fore part stuck fast and remained unmoveable, but the hinder part was broken with the violence of the waves. 42 And the soldiers counsel was to kill the prisoners, lest any of them should swim out and escape. 43 But the centurion, willing to save Paul, kept them from their purpose, and commanded that they which could swim, should cast themselves first into the sea, and get to land; 44 And the rest, some on boards, and some on broken pieces of the ship. And so it came to pass, that they escaped all safe to land.

Here note, 1. How willing men in distress are to part with all things for the preservation of lives, these sea-faring men are here found three times lightening their ship of her lading and burden; First, the merchandize was cast over-board ver. 18. next all the ship's furniture was heaved over, ver. 19. and now ver. 38, goes over the very wheat, which they had provided for their daily bread; future provision is cast away, to save life at present: Life is the most precious treasure, the most excellent thing in nature; a man will part with all the comforts and supports of life, rather than with life itself. 2. What a wonderful work of God was here upon the hearts of these poor Pagans, thus to venture their lives, by parting with their food which they had to live upon, barely upon St. Paul's word, that they should want wheat no more in the ship. Such an influence has God upon the hearts and minds of men, when he pleases to make use of it. 3. How God's delivering power is most gloriously manifest in the most deplorable extremities of his people. Now, when the ship was fallen into a place where two seas met, when she ran aground, and was broken with the violence of the waves, this extremity was God's opportunity; and this strait was the season of his succour. 4. What horrid and cruel ingratitude was found with these wretched soldiers towards the apostle: they design to take away his life, who had taken such care of them, and for whose sake all their lives were preserved! It is no new thing for an unkind world to return evil for good, and hatred for good-will; but to do good, and to suffer evil, is the Christian's exercise at present. They consulted to kill the prisoners (of whom the apostle was chief,) lest any of them should swim out and escape. 5. How God put into the centurion's heart to defeat that barbarity and bloody counsel, and to save the apostle, for whose sake the centurion and all in the ship were saved. Many are the wicked devices in the heart of man; but the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand. 6. How God performed his promise to the apostle to a very tittle: They were all saved, not a man drowned, no, not any one of the bloody soldiers who gave counsel to kill Paul. O how good is God to the unthankful and unholy! his tender mercies are over all his works; and how well do sinners fare sometimes for the saints' sake! Thus, after a long and dangerous voyage, the providence of God brought St. Paul, with the rest of the passengers, at last safe to shore. O how punctual is God to what he promises! What he foretels, he will fulfil. He had foretold by Paul, that they should suffer shipwreck, and at last be cast upon a certain island: and, accordingly, here, they escaped to an island, called Melita; where, what signal instances of humanity they received from the hands of barbarous heathens, the following chapter fully informs us.

CHAP. XXVIII.

AND when they were escaped, then they knew that the island was called Melita. 2 And the barbarous people shewed us no little kindness: for they kindled a fire, and received us every one because of the present rain, and because of the cold. 3. And when Paul had gathered a bundle of sticks, and laid them on the fire, there came a viper out of the heat, and fastened on his hand. 4 And when the barbarians saw the venomous beast hang on his hand, they said among themselves, No doubt this man man is a murderer, whom, though he hath escaped the sea, yet vengeance suffereth not to live. 5 And he shook off the beast into the fire, and felt no harm. 6 Howbeit they looked when he should have swollen, or fallen down dead suddenly. But after they had looked a great while, and saw no harm come to him, they changed their minds, and said that he was a god.

After a long and dangerous voyage, recorded in the foregoing chapter, the providence of God brought St. Paul and the rest of the prisoners to an island called Melita, where they were all courteously received by the islanders; who, finding them wet and cold, made them a fire to warm and refresh them; when behold a viper that was in the wood, feeling the heat of the fire leaped out upon St. Paul, and fastened on his hand; which the islanders seeing, instantly concluded that the apostle was some notorious malefactor, whom the divine vengeance followed: But the apostle (according to our Saviour's promise, Mark xvi. 18. If ye touch any deadly thing, it shall not hurt you) shaking off the venomous beast into the fire, without harm, the people presently changed their opinion, and took him for a god that was come to them in the shape of a man. Here note, 1. How it pleased God, by a new miracle, to confirm the apostle's authority, and thereby to prepare the hearts of those barbarous people for the receiving of the gospel. God will honour his gospel, and the faithful dispensers of it, wherever they go, by preparing the hearts of the people to receive and entertain it. 2. That great and manifold dangers and distresses may, and oft-times do, befall gracious persons. No sooner is one affliction passed over and gone from them, but presently another comes on with a fresh assault. Thus here, St. Paul had no sooner escaped the shipwreck, and gets to shore, but a viper fastens upon his hand; Many are the afflictions of the righteous: 3. That the very light of nature suggests even to the most barbarous heathens, that wickedness shall not go unpunished; No doubt this man is a murderer, whom vengeance suffereth not to live. 4. That natural agents cannot act or exert their natural powers, without the concurrence and concurrence of supernatural providence: This viper, according to its nature, did not, and could not, sting the apostle, being restrained by the over-ruling providence and power of God. 5. That the humanity of these barbarous heathens towards those that suffered shipwreck, may justly condemn the inhumanity of them that are called Christians, towards those which are shipwrecked: How do some that live near the sea-coasts rejoice at a wreck at sea, in hopes of enriching themselves with the spoils of others? The barbarous were humane here, but the humane are now barbarous. 6. How prone and ready men are to draw sinful inferences from sorrowful premises; to conclude that such a man, or such a people are wicked, because they are wretched; great sinners, because they are great sufferers. This was the barbarous logic of these islanders: It had been well that it had been confined to that island; When the barbarians saw the venomous beast on the apostle's hand, they said, No doubt this man is a murderer. 7. How mutable is the mind of man, and he inconstant are men in their esteem and opinions of men; the apostle had no sooner shook off the viper into the fire, but the barbarians change their opinion, into another extreme; he whom they accounted a murderer before, they called a god now: They changed their minds, and said that he was a god. They are light and lavish in their applauding, as before they were rash and severe in censuring. Thus, upon changes of providence, many change their opinions of men, sometimes for the better, but commonly for the worse. Lord, help me to esteem myself only by the esteem which I have with thee. Let me never be lifted up with the applaudings, nor cast down by the despisings of men; neither praise nor reproach are much to be accounted of, whilst we are innocent, and make thee our friend. Quest. But why did not St. Paul, that shook off the viper from his hand, shake off the chain from his arm, and set himself at liberty? Ans. St. Paul was not the author, but a minister or instrument in this miracle; it was not St. Paul himself, but God by him, that wrought this miracle, Acts xix. 12. God wrought special miracles by the hand of Paul. Now, when the deliverance of the apostle from his bonds made most for the glory of God, he was delivered; but, when his bonds would more advance the gospel, God kept him in bonds.

7. In the same quarters were possessions of the chief man of the island whose name was Publius: who received us, and lodged us three days courteously. 8 ¶ And it came to pass, that the father of Publius lay sick of a fever, and of a bloody flux: to whom Paul entered in and prayed, and laid his hands on him, and healed him. 9 So when this was done, others also which had diseases in the island came, and were healed: 10 Who also honoured us with many honours; and when we departed, they laded us with such things as were necessary.

Observe here, How God goes on still to honour the person and ministry of St. Paul, in the eyes and hearts of this barbarous people, by enabling him further to work miracles in this island; First, on Publius the governor's father, and then on others that were diseased in the island. Here note, 1. How great the civility of the governor of the island was towards St. Paul, in entertaining him and all the company with him, even more than two hundred persons, at his own charge. And, 2. How well the governor was rewarded for his hospitable charity; his father lying sick of a fever and a bloody flux, is miraculously cured by God. As there is no duty more certainly rewarded in another world than that of charity; so is it frequently rewarded in this world; Publius was well paid by his Father's recovery, for what he did for St. Paul and his company. 3. The means which the apostle used for the recovery of the sick person, prayer and imposition of hands, verse 8. Paul prayed, and laid his hands on him, and healed him. Now hereby the apostle shewed that he could do nothing of himself; accordingly he applies by prayer to that God who killeth and maketh alive, and the Lord heard him. St. Paul had honoured God, and now God honours him: How grieved was the holy apostle when God's honour was sacrilegiously given to him? I doubt not but it grieved the good good man more when they called him a God, than when they accounted him a murderer: Here, therefore, he returns the honour to God by prayer, ascribing all to him: And God honours him by making him the instrument of the miraculous cure. 4. How the infinitely-wise God made all things work together for his own glory; that the apostle should suffer shipwreck; that he should be cast upon an island; that he should be cast upon a barbarous island, where the name of God was not known; that a viper should fasten upon him, and not hurt him; that the governor of the island's father, and other inhabitants of the island should at this time be sick, and miraculously cured by St. Paul: All these tended towards the promoting of God's glory, by opening an effectual door for the conversion of many souls; for, during the three months that the apostle stayed there, he planted a christian church in the island, which became famous for its steadfastness in the truth. 5. The proof and evidence which the islanders gave of the truth of their conversion by the apostle's ministry among them; namely, that those new converts loaded St. Paul's ship with necessaries for their voyage when he went away from them: This was a real fruit of their effectual faith, as also their honouring him with many honours. The best evidence of sincere faith, is an holy fruitfulness in good works, in works of piety towards God, and works of charity towards man; They honoured us with many honours, &c.

11 I And after three months, we departed in a ship of Alexandria, which had wintered in the isle, whose sign was Castor and Pollux. 12 And landing at Syracuse, we tarried there three days. 13 And from thence we fetched a compass, and came to Rhegium: and after one day the south wind blew and we came the next day to Puteoli; 14 Where we found brethren, and were desired to tarry with them seven days. And so we went toward Rome. 15 And from thence, when the brethren heard of us, they came to meet us, as far as Appii-forum and the Three taverns: whom when Paul saw, he thanked God and took courage.

Observe here, 1. That St. Paul at the command of God, though shipwrecked before, yet puts forth to sea again. A clear call from God will carry on a christian cheerfully to grapple with all imaginable difficulties and dangers, without either dispute or delay. Thus did the apostle here; he enters a ship of Alexandria, sails from Malta to Syracuse in Sicily, from thence to Rhegium in Italy, from thence to Puteoli; where they found some christians, with whom they abode seven days. Here note, How wonderfully the christian religion was spread abroad in the Italian country; yea, in and about Rome, before St. Paul's coming thither. From Puteoli the apostle passes to Rome the chief city in Italy, the empress of the world, the seat of the Roman emperor: Behold how God bears witness to, and puts honour upon his suffering servant; he passes to Rome, more like a conqueror than a prisoner: He is met upon the road by many eminent persons, as conquerors used to be, to congratulate their great victories;

even by christians, who are called brethren, ver. 15. who are not ashamed of St. Paul's chain, but left their houses, and came forth to meet him, some fifty miles, others thirty, some one day's journey, others two, to congratulate his coming, and pay their respects unto him; for which favour the apostle thanks God, and took courage; That is, he owned it as an encouragement sent from God unto him, and was greatly refreshed by their company. But how came christians so early to be found at Rome? Who converted them? St. Paul had never been there till now; and we read not of St. Peter's or any of the apostles having been there thus early; yet St. Paul finds many christians at and about Rome? Answer, These brethren are thought to be converted by such as were present at Jerusalem, at the feast of Pentecost, Acts ii. 10. where it is expressly said, There were strangers of Rome then present, when those mighty miracles were wrought there; and we may suppose that they, becoming true converts at that time, did propagate the gospel in and about Rome, according to their ability; and the blessing of God so accompanied and succeeded their endeavours, that the apostle now found some saints even in Nero's house. Thus mightily grew the word of God and prevailed.

16 And when we came to Rome, the centurion delivered the prisoners to the captain of the guard: but Paul was suffered to dwell by himself, with a soldier that kept him. 17 And it came to pass, that after three days, Paul called the chief of the Jews together. And when they were come together, he said unto them, Men and brethren, though I have committed nothing against the people, or customs of our fathers, yet was I delivered prisoner from Jerusalem into the hands of the Romans. 18 Who when they had examined me, would have let me go because there was no cause of death in me. 19 But when the Jews spake against it, I was constrained to appeal unto Cæsar; not that I had ought to accuse my nation of. 20 For this cause therefore have I called for you, to see you, and to speak with you: because that for the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain.

Now is the great apostle landed and lodged a prisoner, at Rome, according to the divine prediction, Acts xxiii. 11. Be of good cheer, Paul, &c. Yet observe, 1. The favour which God gave him in the sight of his enemies; he is not clapped up in the common goal, but a sort of a prisoner at large: he dwells by himself in his own hired house, with his keeper with him: This liberty was highly valued by the apostle, we may believe; not so much for his own comfort, as for the benefit and advantage of the gospel; for by this means he had an opportunity of going abroad and preaching the word of God in every place, as the providence of God gave him opportunity. 2. St. Paul is no sooner come to Rome with desire and design, no doubt, to preach the gospel there to his countrymen the Jews, in the first place; but he sends for the Jews to come to him, states his his case to them, and endeavours to remove all prejudice from their minds, which they might have taken up against him, and so have missed of the benefit of his ministry. From whence learn, That it is the great duty of the ministers of the gospel, prudently to prevent, if possible, or presently to remove all prejudices, which may be taken up by their people against their persons, knowing that, if they have a prejudice against their persons, they will never relish their doctrine, nor be benefited by their ministry. Thus did the great apostle here endeavour to set himself right with his auditors the Jews, before he began to preach to them. 3. How the apostle was not ashamed of, but rather glories in, the cause for which he suffered, For the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain: As if he had said, "For preaching that Messiah, who hath long been hoped and prayed for, I am come hither a prisoner; or for the sake of Jesus Christ the promised Messiah, whom all true Israelites long expected and hoped for, who is now come in the flesh, to be their Redeemer, and in whom all the true Israel of God repose all their hope of salvation, and by whom they expect a joyful resurrection; I am bound with this chain." Here note, 1. The hard usage which the blessed apostle meets with from the hands of a wicked world; a chain is clapped upon him as if he were some rogue or thief: Paul the lamb, was now a prisoner to Nero the lion. The best of men may, and oft do suffer under the notion of the most vile and wicked persons. 2. The true cause of St. Paul's sufferings, For the hope of Israel, I am bound. That is, for the object of Israel's hope, or the Messiah which they so long expected, and so much hoped for. 3. The publication which St. Paul makes of his sufferings here at Rome: he tells all the world, for whom and in whose cause he now suffered. Thence learn, That sufferings for Christ and the gospel are no matter of shame, but glory: The apostle doth not blush to say, For the hope of Israel I wear this chain: the shame belonged to them that clapped on the chain, not to him that wore it. 4. The end why the apostle makes known his sufferings; namely, That all the Jews now at Rome might know the true cause wherefore he suffered. St. Paul's enemies had laid heavy things to his charge, which possibly might fly to Rome; now although he little regarded what the wicked world said of him, yet he desired to stand right in the thoughts of the Jews here at Rome; and therefore as soon as he was come thither he sends for them to acquaint them with the cause of his imprisonment. When good men are in a suffering condition, the devil is very industrious to defame them, and the world very ready to misrepresent them; therefore it is a duty which is owing to themselves, to vindicate their own innocency, and to set forth the cause of their sufferings, in a clear and true light. It is verily for the hope of Israel, that I am bound with this chain.

21 And they said unto him; We neither received letters out of Judea concerning thee, neither any of the brethren that came, shewed or spake any harm of thee. 22 But we desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest: for as concerning this sect, we know that every where it is spoken against. 23 And when they had appointed him a day, there came many to him in his lodging: to whom he expounded and testified the kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the law of Moses, and out of the prophets, from morning till evening. 24 And some believed the things which were spoken, and some believed not.

Note here, 1. The advantage which the apostle had to preach the gospel to the Jews at Rome; they assure him that they had entertained no prejudice against his person; for they had received no letters out of Judea concerning him: neither had any of their brethren that came from Judea spoken any evil of him; yea, they assure him, it was their desire to hear him preach, and to understand what he had to say for the christian religion (which they call a sect or heresy) that both Jews and Gentiles did generally oppose and speak against, and talk hardly of. 2. How readily the apostle complies with their request in preaching to them; time and place are appointed, the people assembled: The great truth defended and proved was this, That Jesus of Nazareth was the true and promised Messiah, in whom all that desire to be saved, ought to believe and trust. This argument he confirmed by testimonies out of the law of Moses, and out of the prophets, continuing his discourse from morning until night; so unwearied was this faithful labourer in his Lord and Master's work. 3. The different success of the word preached, and the contrary effects which it had upon his hearers; Some believed the things which were spoken, and some believed not. As the same sun that softens the wax hardens the clay, so has the gospel different effects upon those it is preached to; there are some whom no sun will tan, no heat will warm, no influence will quicken: To some we are the favour of life unto life, to others the favour of death unto death: But, blessed be God, if we his ministers be found faithful, we shall be a sweet favour unto God, as well in them that perish, as in them that are saved.

25 And when they agreed not among themselves they departed, after that Paul had spoken one word, Well spake the Holy Ghost by Esaias the prophet unto our fathers, 26 Saying, Go unto this people and say, Hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and not perceive. 27 For the hearts of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed: lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and should be converted; and I should heal them. 28 Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will hear it. 29 And when he had said these words, the Jews departed, and had great reasoning among themselves.

The obstinate infidelity and unreasonable unbelief which was found among the Jews under the apostle's preaching, was no doubt a great grief of heart unto him; but at their departure, he tells them they would not be persuaded, that this unbelief of theirs was what the prophet Elias had long before punctually foretold, that hearing they will not hear and seeing they will not see: having contracted such a willful hardness, blindness, and deafness, as will not suffer them to hearken to any counsel which may tend to their conversion and salvation. Here note, That though the present unbelief of the obstinate Jews, to whom the apostle now preached, was long before foretold by the prophets of God: Yet the prophets' prediction was no cause of their unbelief; or that which laid them under an impossibility of believing: But the fault lay in their own obstinate wills; with respect to which by the just judgment of God, they were blinded and hardened. When sinners close their eyes wilfully, and say, they will not see, it is just with God to close their eyes judicially; and say, they shall not see. Deus non deserit nisi desertentem; the Jews had forsaken God, and now God forsakes them; but the apostle tells them, that upon this refusal of theirs, he was to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, and that they would hear it, and gladly receive it, ver. 29. The salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and they will hear it. Where observe, The epithet or title given to the gospel, The salvation of God: 1. It is styled salvation, because it makes a tender and universal offer of life and salvation unto lost sinners. 2. It is called the salvation of God, because it is a salvation of his providing and contriving, of his revealing and discovering: It is his by way of satisfaction and discovery; his by way of tender and offer; his by way of power and efficacy; The salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles.

30 ¶ And Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came in unto him, 31 Preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him.

Note here, 1. The special favour indulged St. Paul, now a prisoner at Rome, with so much freedom, and without any molestation to preach the gospel in his own hired house for two years together. Where observe, 1. Who preaches; St. Paul, a prisoner, who scarcely had liberty to hear, rarely to preach. 2. Where he preached, even in the proud, powerful and imperious Rome, and in his own hired house there. 3. To whom he preached; To all that came unto him. He set open the doors of his house for all comers, excluding none from the gracious offers of salvation by a Redeemer, upon the condition of faith and obedience. 4. How long he continued his ministry at Rome; for two whole years at that time; he would neither be allured by flatteries, nor hector'd by threatenings, to lay down his ministry, or desist from his preaching-work. 5. After what manner he preached; with all confidence, boldness, openness, and freedom, with such an undaunted courage, as neither love of life, nor fear of death, could overcome. 6. The subject matter of this preaching; The kingdom of God, and things concerning the Lord Jesus Christ; not vain janglings or envious railings; but Jesus Christ, and the way of salvation by him. Lastly, With what freedom he did all this; No man forbidding him; neither emperor, nor senate, nor magistrate, nor soldier, nor priest nor people, though in an Heathen city, devoted to idolatry, in the least hindering, or forbidding him. Where note, That Rome Heathen of old, was far less cruel and much more courteous to the preachers of the gospel, than Rome Antichristian since has been. Then an apostle might preach two years together, without molestation, in his own hired house, to all comers; but now a minister of God must there have no public or private meeting to worship God according to his word and will, without danger of an inquisition.—To conclude, see how impossible it was at that day to hinder the progress of the gospel; even as impossible as to hinder the sun from shining, or the wind from blowing. That God, who shut the mouths of the hungry lions that they hurt not Daniel, did open the mouth of the apostle, that neither Nero nor the Jews could stop it; yea, after this, he was delivered from the mouth of the lion; rescued out of Nero's hands. And God would have continued to deliver him, had not his death been more for the glory of God, and his own advantage, than his life; which at last was offered up as a sacrifice and a sweet smelling savour, acceptable unto God through Jesus Christ.

Thus St. Luke concludes his history of St. Paul's life, without giving us any particulars of his death. He leaves him at Rome, a prisoner under Nero, where, after two years confinement, the scriptures seem to hint, that he was set at liberty, and that he went about preaching the gospel, and confirming the churches for some years; but an attempt to trace this apostle farther, without scripture light, may be the ready way to lose ourselves: Let us therefore conclude with prayer.

That Almighty God, who, through the preaching of his blessed apostle St. Paul, did cause the light of the glorious gospel to shine throughout the world would mercifully grant, that we, having his wonderful conversion and instructive example in our remembrance, may shew forth our thankfulness unto him for the same, by following the holy doctrine which he taught; through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

ROMANS.

This epistle to the Romans has always been esteemed by the church of GOD one of the chiefest and most excellent portions of the holy scripture: The reason why this epistle stands first, is not because it was wrote first, (the epistles to the Corinthians, Galatians, and Theſſalonians, being wrote before it;) but either because of the imperial dignity of the city, to wit, Rome, unto which it was directed; or else because of the sublimity of the matter, and the excellency of the doctrine contained in it, with respect to which, some have called it, The marrow of divinity; The key of the New Testament; The Christian church's confession of faith; and The most divine epistle of the most holy apostle.

The scope and design of which, is twofold; First, To shew that neither the Gentiles by the law of nature, nor the Jews by the law of Moses, could ever attain to justification and salvation, but only by faith in Jesus Christ; for the sake of whose merits alone we are accounted righteous in the sight of GOD. Secondly, To shew that faith is not separated from good works, but productive of them; being the parent and principle of obedience, without which, whosoever liveth, is accounted dead before GOD.

The subject-matter of this epistle is twofold, partly doctrinal, and partly practical: In the doctrinal part, which makes up the first eleven chapters, the apostle treats of justification by faith alone, without the works of the law; of original corruption by the fall of Adam; of sanctification by the Spirit of Christ; of the calling of the Gentiles; that is, of the present rejection of the Jews, and the future recalling of them when the fulness of the Gentiles was come in.

In the applicatory or practical part of this epistle, which begins at chapter xii. we have many useful and excellent exhortations, both to general and particular duties respecting GOD, our neighbour, and ourselves; and several encouragements given us to the love and practice of universal holiness.

C H A P. I.

In this first chapter, our apostle proceeds to assert and prove the grand doctrine of justification by faith; that is, by believing and obeying the gospel of Christ; and that no person, either Jew or Gentile, could possibly be justified by any works of their own. As to the Gentiles, he shews, that their works were so far from justifying them before God, that they were an abomination in his sight; that, for rebelling against the light and law of nature, God delivered them up to their unnatural lusts, which exposed them to unutterable and inevitable condemnation, and this as a just judgment and righteous punishment for their sins.

PAUL, a servant of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle, separated unto the gospel of God.

Observe here, The author and penman of this epistle described: 1. By his name, Paul: Before his conversion he was called Saul; Saul the persecutor: After his con*version, he was Paul the professor, Paul the preacher, and Paul the great doctor of the Gentiles. O wonderful power of the heart-changing grace of God! which is able to turn Sauls into Pauls, persecutors into professors, faithless sinners into faithful servants of Jesus Christ. 2. He is described by his general office; a servant of Jesus Christ: An higher and more honourable title than that of emperor of the whole earth. Servire Christo est regnare: To serve Christ, especially in the quality of an ambassador, is a greater honour than to have the monarchs of the world to serve us, and bow the knee before us. 3. He is described by his particular office; Called to be an apostle; that is, constituted and appointed by Christ to that holy function, without any merit or desert of his own. He did not assume the honour of an apostle till called; and when called, it was not any great desert of his own, but the free and undesigned grace of God that called him. 4. That as he was called to, so he is said to be separated for the great work of preaching the gospel; separated unto the gospel of God; that is, set apart in the purpose and decree of God; separated from his mother's womb, Gal. i. 15. immediately an extraordinarily called by Christ himself to this great work, Acts ix. 15*

And mediately by the officers of the church, Acts xiii. 2, 3, &c. The work of dispensing the mysteries of the everlasting gospel is to be undertaken by none but those who are solemnly separated and set apart for it; and regularly called to it: I would to God the herd of lay-preachers at this day would consider this. These usurpers of the sacred function can neither pray in faith for a blessing upon what they undertake, because they have no promise to bottom their faith upon, nor can the people expect to profit by what they hear from them; for this would be to expect God's blessing out of God's way. Read with trembling what God says, Jer. xxiii. 32. I sent them not, neither commanded them, therefore shall they not profit this people at all. Where mark, That the people's not profiting by these men; is not charged upon their false doctrine, but upon their want of a call and commission: It is not said, that their doctrine is unsound, but they preach unsent; therefore, they shall not profit this people at all: These men contradict the command of God, the universal practice of the Christian church; violate the rules of order and right reason; and expose a most awful and tremendous ordinance of God to contempt and scorn; yea, lay it open to the bold presumption of every ignorant and impudent pretender, Observe, 5. The glorious title given to the gospel, which St. Paul was called forth to preach; it is here stiled the gospel of God, and elsewhere the gospel of Christ. It is the gospel of God, as he was the author and contriver of it; it is the gospel of Christ, as he is the subject-matter and scope of it: As Jesus Christ was the sum of the law, so is he the substance of the gospel. Indeed, St. Paul sometimes calls it his gospel, Rom. ii. 16. because he was the dispenser and promulger of it; it was depositum fidei sua commissum; "A divine treasure committed to his care and trust." And, if the gospel preached be the gospel of God, let us entertain it in our judgments, retain it in our memories, embrace it in our affections, hide it in our hearts, confess it with our mouths, and practice it in our lives.

That is, Which gospel God had promised before by his holy prophets speaking in the holy scriptures. Where note, 1. The antiquity of the gospel, how ancient the doctrine is, even as old as the old prophets themselves; nay, as old as Adam himself. The gospel, or glad tidings of a Saviour, was first preached to Adam by God himself, Gen. iii. 15. next to Abraham, Gen. xv. then it was predicted by all the prophets which have been since the world began. The gospel which we preach can by no means fall under the charge and imputation of novelty: It is no new or modern doctrine, but almost as old as the world itself: Which gospel he had promised before by his holy prophets. Behold then a great correspondency, a sweet agreement and harmony between the Old and New Testament, between the prophets and apostles, though great difference in the manner and measure of the revelation. For, as one says, the Old Testament is the hiding of the New; the New Testament is the opening of the Old. The Old Testament is the New Testament veiled; the New Testament is the Old revealed. 2. The venerable title given to the scriptures; they are called the holy scriptures: Which he had promised before by his prophets speaking in the holy scriptures. The scriptures are holy in several respects: (1.) In regard of their author and inditer, the Holy Spirit of God. (2.) In regard of the penmen and writers of them, holy men of God. (3.) In regard of the subject-matter contained in them, the holy will of God. (4.) In regard of the use of them, to make us holy both in heart and life. And, if the word of God be an holy word, then let it be treated by us with all holy deference and regard. Lord, what an impious liberty do some men take, in this wanton age, to furnish out a jest in scripture attire, and in their jocular humour to make light and irreverent applications of scripture phrases and sentences! They lay their schemes of ridiculous mirth in the Bible, and play the buffoons with the most serious things in the world. These men bring forth the scripture as the Philistines brought forth Sampson, only to make them sport; but they shall ere long find almighty God in earnest, though they were in jest: He that has magnified his word above all his name, will not brook it, that any man should make it vile and contemptible, by rendering it the theme of his giddy mirth and profane drollery.

3 Concerning his Son Jesus Christ our Lord, which was made of the seed of David according to the flesh, 4 And declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead:

The apostle having told us in the foregoing verses, that he was particularly called to, and by God set apart for the preaching of the gospel; in the verses before us, he declares that Jesus Christ was the main subject of that gospel which he preached, and describes him by his two-fold nature; by his human nature, ver. 5. by his divine nature, ver. 4. According to his human nature, he was made of the seed of David; that is, descended from David, and one of his posterity by the mother's side, who was of that house and line according to the flesh; that is, the weakness, frailty, and mortality of this human nature. Where note, 1. That our Lord Jesus Christ had a being, even an eternal existence, before his incarnation and manifestation in our flesh and nature. He was the Son of God, before he was the son of man; hence he is said to be made of the seed of David, intimating, that he was then made what he was not before. In regard of his divine nature, he was begotten not made; but, in regard of his human nature, he was made, not begotten. 2. That Jesus Christ, the eternal Son of God, did in the fulness of time assume the true and perfect nature of man into a personal union with his Godhead. The human nature was united to the divine nature miraculously and extraordinarily, by the overshadowing power of the Holy Ghost, Luke i. 34, 25. and also integrally and completely: That is to say, Christ took a complete and perfect human soul and body, with all the faculties of the one, and all the members of the other, that thereby he might heal the whole nature of that leprosy of sin, which had seized upon, and diffused its malignity into every member, and every faculty. Next we have a demonstration of Christ's divine nature, ver. 4. Declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the merits and deserts of men: Who will render to every one according to his deeds; that is, according to the kind and quality, and according to the measures and degrees of every man's works, Where note, he doth not say, God will render to every man a reward for his works, but according to his works! Works are regula retributionis, non causa mercedis; "Our works are the rule of God's proceedings, but not the cause of his rewards." Having thus described the impartiality of the Judge, he next declares the universality of the persons that shall then be judged; namely, the righteous and the wicked; which shall both have their distinct rewards assigned them, according to the quality of their works. Note, 1. The righteous persons described, and their reward declared; they are described by their well-doing, by their continuance in well-doing, by their patient continuance in well-doing; they are not weary in well-doing, they can undergo sufferings for the sake of well-doing, and they can patiently wait for the reward of well-doing till hereafter, whilst others snatch at their reward here: Yet in the mean time they are seeking after, and securing of this their reward: They seek for glory, honour, and immortality; that is, they seek for a portion of glory and immortality in the world to come; they leave the world to the men of the world, and whilst they are scrambling for earth, they are making sure of heaven. Next, Their persons being described, their reward is declared, eternal life; an eternity of glory and happiness in a future state, shall certainly be the reward of well-doers, and of patient continuance in well-doing. 2. The wicked are here characterized, and their reward assigned. They are contentious and obey not the truth, but obey unrighteousness; that is, They contend with God, and resist the light of his revealed truth; they refuse the offers of his grace, and kick against his word, disobeying the gospel of truth, but obeying unrighteousness. God will pour forth such indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish. Lord, who knowest the power of thine anger, or who can bear the weight of thy wrath! It broke the back of angels, how shall sinners stand under it? It is styled fire in scripture, it is a consuming fire, and an unquenchable fire: It preys upon the sinner, but never devours him: It is unquenchable by any thing but the blood of Christ. A mysterious fire, whose strange property it is always to torment, but never to kill; or always to kill, but never to consume. 3. With what equity, as well as impartiality, this distribution of God's indignation and wrath will be made: Upon every soul that doeth evil; but upon the Jew first, and then of the Gentile. The Jew first, that is, principally and especially; because the light and mercy which the Jews abused and sinned against, was far greater than that bestowed upon the Gentiles. Learn hence, That the light under which men sin, puts extraordinary aggravations upon their sins, answerable whereunto will be the degrees of their punishment. The Gentiles will be condemned for disobeying the light of nature, the law of God written on their hearts; but much greater wrath is reserved for the Jews, unto whom were committed the oracles of God: But the greatest of all is reserved for Christians, who obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; these shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe, 2 Thess. i. 9, 10.

12 For as many as have sinned without law, shall also perish without law: And as many as have sinned in the law, shall be judged by the law.

That is, as many as have sinned without the written law, which is the case of the Gentiles or Heathens, shall also perish without that law, being judged and condemned by the law of nature written in their hearts; but as many as have sinned in, or under the law of Moses, which is the case of the Jews, shall be judged and condemned by that law. Note here, 1. A truth plainly implied, and necessarily supposed; namely, That as some sinners perish, having the written word, and all external means of salvation; so others perish, having not the written law or word of God, and the outward and ordinary means of salvation: As many as have sinned without the law, shall perish without the law. God, in the dispensations of his grace, acteth in a way of sovereignty, according to his own pleasure; yet, in his penal dispensations, he proceeds according to the measures of strict justice, upon the previous demerits of sinners. 2. That all men shall not be proceeded against in the day of judgment after one and the same manner; but every man according to the demerit of his sin, and according to the capacity and relation in which he stood in this life. The Gentiles which had only the law of nature, shall not be judged by the law of Moses: The Jews, which have both the law of nature, and the law of Moses shall be judged by both: And consequently Christians, which have the law of nature underwritten, the Mosical law written, and the Evangelical law, both written and preached, shall lie under greater guilt, and receive a more aggravating condemnation. Christ will exactly proportion every man's hell hereafter to his sin committed here; the greater light we have quenched, the greater darkness will be inflicted, Heb. ii. 3.

13 (For not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified.

That is, not the bare hearers of the law shall, upon that account, be just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified; that is, accepted of God, as acting suitably to their holy profession. It is notoriously known, the Jews gloried in, and rested upon, their outward privileges for salvation, because they were Abraham's seed, because they were circumcised, because they were employed in reading and hearing of the law; they concluded this sufficient to render them acceptable with God; therefore, says the apostle, not the hearers, but doers of the law shall be justified; that is, the persons whom God will accept and account righteous for the sake of Christ. Note here, That the doers of the law or word of God, are the best hearers, yea, the only hearers in the account of God. Hearing is good, but it must not be rested in; a great understanding may a man have by much reading the word and law of God; but a good understanding only have they that do the word and will of God; the praise and fruit of that endureth for ever.

14 For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves; 15 Which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the mean while accusing or else excusing one another.

The sense is, that the Gentiles, which have not the law of Moses promulgated, are yet not without a law ingrafted in their consciences; and although they have not a written law; yet have they a law, that is a rule of living to themselves; doing those things which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their consciences bearing witness to it, and their natural reason either accusing or defending of them from it. Learn, 1. That there is a law of nature ingrafted and written by God in the hearts of men, whereby the common notions of good and evil are found with them. 2. That this law of nature serveth for the instigation and provocation of men to many good actions and duties towards God and man. 3. That to rebel against and not walk in conformity unto this ingrafted law of nature, is a God provoking and a wrath procuring sin. 4. That although many of the Gentiles gave themselves over to all manner of uncleanness, yet others shewed the works of the law written in their hearts: They shewed it two ways, (1.) By their temperance, righteousness, and moral honesty; wherein (to our shame) they excelled many of us who are called Christians. (2.) In the efficacy of their conscience; which, as it cleared and comforted them for things well done, so it witnessed against them, yea, judged and condemned them for doing evil: And these evidences of a law written on the heart, are every where to be found, wherever men are found: The Gentiles having not a written law, are a law unto themselves, and shew the work of the law written in their hearts.

16 In the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ according to my gospel.

As if the apostle had said, If any shall ask, when shall rewards and punishments be distributed to Jew or Gentile? The answer is, In that day when God shall judge the secrets of men's hearts by Jesus Christ, according to my gospel: That is, as my gospel testifies, he will most certainly do. Here note 1. A fundamental doctrine asserted, That there will be a day of judgment, in which the secrets of all men's hearts shall be judged by Jesus Christ, as Mediator. All the thoughts, words, and works of all men, that lived from the beginning of the world, or shall live to the end of the world, will then be produced in judgment; and if so, may we not infer, that the day of judgment must certainly and necessarily take up a vast space of time? For if all records and registers now made, shall then be opened and read, and all the witnesses for and against man, shall be then examined and heard, what a vast space of time then must that great day take up! Some divines are of opinion, that the day of judgment may last as long as the world hath lasted: This we may depend upon, that things will not be huddled up, nor thrust over in haste; but as sinners have taken their time for sinning, so God will take his time for judging. 2. The proof and confirmation of this doctrine of a future judgment. According to my gospel; that is, as certainly as I have foretold you of it in the doctrine which I have preached, so certainly shall all men, and the secrets of all men's hearts, be judged by Jesus Christ. But was it not a presumption in St. Paul, to call the gospel, his gospel? Ans. He means that he was the publisher, not the author of it; it was God's in respect of authority, St. Paul's in respect of dispensation.

17 Behold, thou art called a Jew, and restest in the law, and makest thy boast of God, 18 And know his will, and approvest the things that are more excellent, being instructed out of the law; 19 And art confident that thou thyself art a guide of the blind, a light of them which are in darkness; 20 An instructor of the foolish, a teacher of babes, which hast the form of knowledge, and of the truth in the law.

Here the apostle proceeds in his former argument; namely, to prove, That the Jews could no more rationally expect to be justified before God by the law of Moses, than the Gentiles by the law of nature; the apostle allows them all their privileges which they so much doated upon, boasted of, and gloried in; but withal assures them, that these, all these, yea, more than these, were insufficient to justify them before God. As if the apostle had said, "Thou bearest thyself mightily upon this, that thou art called a Jew; that is, a professor of the true religion, and a worshipper of the true God: Thou restest in the law: that is, either in the divineness and perfection of it, or in thy external obedience to it, and in the outward performances of it: Thou makest thy boast of God, as a God in covenant with thee above all the nations of the earth; and thou knowest his will, having his word and law in thy hands, the oracles of God committed to thee, and the writings of Moses and the prophets alone found with thee: And approvest things that are most excellent, being instructed out of the law; that is, thou thinkest that thou hast such a degree of knowledge of God's word and will, that thou canst clearly discern between sin and duty, and compare one duty with another, preferring that which is most excellent: And art confident that thou thyself art a guide of the blind, a light of them that are in darkness; that is, thou hast a strong conceit that such are the measures of thy knowledge, that thou art able to be a guide to the blind Gentiles, who sit in darkness, and to be a teacher of babes; that is, such as have little or no knowledge in the matters of religion, conceiting, That thou hast the form of knowledge and of the truth in the law; that is, such a method and measure of divine knowledge, as may enable thee to instruct others, whether Gentiles or Jews, which never reached to thy attainment."— These external privileges the presumptuous Jew rested upon, and thought them sufficient to salvation, though he lived loosely, and his practice gave his profession the lie. Hence learn, 1. That persons are exceedingly prone to be proud of, and puffed up with church privileges, glorying in in the letter of the law, whilst, neither in heart nor life, they are comforted to the spirituality of the law. Learn 2. That gifts, duties, and supposed graces, are the stay and staff which hypocrites rest upon, and repose their trust and confidence in: Thou art called a Jew, and restest in the law; that is, in the outward profession of the law, or in an external obedience to the law; the apostle speaks of this, their resting in the law, not barely by way of narration, but by way of reproof, telling us not only what they did, but how ill they did in so doing. The duties which Christ has appointed, are the trust and rest of the hypocrites; but Christ himself is the rest and trust of the upright; they desire to be ever acting graces, never trusting to them; to be much in duty, and yet much above duty; much in it in point of performance, much above it in regard of dependence.

21 Thou therefore which teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? thou that preachest a man should not steal, dost thou steal? 22 Thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery? thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou commit sacrilege? 23 Thou that makest thy boast of the law, through breaking the law dishonourest thou God? 24 For the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles, through you, as it is written.

The apostle proceeds, to the end of this chapter, to convince the Jews, that they were equally in a sinful and wretched condition with the despised Gentiles, and therefore stood in need of Jesus Christ to justify them by his grace, as well as they: And because the Jews were so exceeding apt to dote upon, and rest in, their external privileges, he did, in the foregoing verses, recount and reckon up the several privileges which they enjoyed: Thou art called a Jew; thou makest thy boast of God. &c. But now, in the verses before us, he takes occasion to aggravate their sins committed, from their high privileges and prerogatives enjoyed, because they sinned against light and knowledge, against the convictions of their own consciences, and contradicted the dictates of their minds, as the Gentiles did: But besides all that, rebelled against the precepts of the written word, which was all in their hands. The law of Moses was near in their mouths, but far from their reins; for thus the apostle expostulates with them, Thou that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? Thou that undertakest to be a teacher of, and guide unto the ignorant and blind Gentiles, wilt thou not practise thine own instructions; but condemn thyself out of thine own mouth? Wilt thou, O Jew! (as if the apostle had said) be guilty of theft, adultery, sacrilege, rapine and murder, sins which the very heathens condemn; and all this while, call yourselves the only people of God? Verily, The name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you Jews; who pretend to be the favourites of heaven, whilst you do the works of hell." Learn hence, 1. That it is much easier to instruct and teach others, than to be instructed and receive instruction ourselves. 2. That it is both sinful and shameful to teach others the right way, and to go in the wrong ourselves: It is a double fault in a private person, when his actions run cross to his profession; but it is intolerable, if not an unpardonable fault in a teacher, when the crimes which he condemns in others, may be justly charged upon himself: Thou that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? 3. That the name of God suffers much, very much; yea, by none so much as those who preach and press the duties of Christianity upon others, but practise them not themselves. The name of the Lord is blasphemed by such preachers, the wicked profane world taking occasion from thence to wound the name of God with the poisoned arrows and darts of reproach. The sins of teachers are teaching sins. True, sin, strictly speaking, cannot injure the name and glory of God: He is above the reach of any mischief that sin can do him: his essential glory is perfect, and can neither be increased or diminished by the creatures: God cannot no more be hurt by our sins, than the sun can be hurt by throwing stones into the air, or the moon hurt by the barking of dogs. But his manifestative glory, or the present manifestations of his glory, these are clouded and eclipsed by sin: and therefore God will deal with knowing sinners, especially with such as undertake to be teachers of others, as with those that have blasphemed his name, wounded his glory, trampled upon his honour, and caused his holy ways to be evil-spoken of, by reason of their wicked and unholy lives. Lord, let all that administer, unto thee in holy things consider, that they have not only their own sins to account for, but also the sins of their people, if committed by their profligate example.

25 For circumcision verily profiteth, if thou keep the law: but if thou be a breaker of the law, thy circumcision is made uncircumcision. 26 Therefore if the uncircumcision keep the righteousness of the law, shall not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision? 27 And shall not uncircumcision which is by nature, if it fulfil the law, judge thee, who by the letter and circumcision dost transgress the law?

It is sufficiently known what great stress the Jews laid upon circumcision; they taught, that this alone was enough to procure the favour of God, and to free them from hell: "God having, as they said, promised Abraham, that if his children transgressed, he would remember the odour of the forefathers, and deliver them for the merit of circumcision;" But all this was a false and vain-glorious bubble. Our apostle, therefore, in the words before us, assures the Jews, that circumcision without holiness of conversation, would never free them from condemnation: That a circumcised Jew, who walks not in obedience to the law of God, is in as bad, or worse condition, than any uncircumcised heathen; yea, the uncircumcision, that is, the uncircumcised person that keeps the law, shall be accepted of God, as well as if he had been circumcised; and be preferred by God before the circumcised Jew that transgressed the law. The sum is, that the obedient Gentile shall condemn the disobedient Jew, and be sooner accepted by God, with whom there is no respect of persons, but with respect of their qualifications: That no church-privileges, no external prerogatives nor the highest profession of piety and holiness, without an humble, uniform, and sincere obedience, will be any thing available to salvation. And as, then, an uncircumcised Gentile found better acceptance with God than any circumcised Jew, even so, an unbaptized heathen, at the great day will not change place with many baptized christians. It is a sad, but a certain truth, that the case of the Pagan world will be much easier in the day of judgment, than others that live and die disobedient under the gospel of Jesus Christ. The heathens have but abused one talent, the light of nature; but we thousands, even as many thousands as we have slighted the tenders of offered grace: Lord, what a fearful aggravation doth it put upon our sin and misery! We must certainly be accountable to thee at the great day, not only for all the light we had, but for all that we might have had in the gospel-day; and especially for that light we have sinned under, and rebelled against.

28 For he is not a Jew which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision which is outwardly in the flesh: 29 But he is a Jew, which is one inwardly: and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God.

Here our apostle comes close and home to the self-confident Jews, and touches them in the most sensible part. It was the hardest saying that could sound in a Jewish ear, to affirm, that circumcision which is outward in the flesh, profiteth nothing; for they so gloried in it, that they accounted it equal to the keeping of all the commandments of God. Now our apostle here takes away the very foundation of this their boasting and glorying, by a plain and true distinction. There is, saith he, a Jew outwardly, that only has the badge of circumcision in his flesh. Now he is not a Jew in God's account, who is only so by outward circumcision; neither is that circumcision valuable or available, which is only outward in the flesh; but then there is a Jew, who is one inwardly, namely, by the purification of his heart from all filthy lusts, evil affections, and sinful dispositions, and a circumcision of the heart, and in the spirit; that is, a circumcision wrought in us by the Spirit of God, and not barely by the letter of the law: And the praise of this is not of men, who cannot discern the heart, but of God, who is the searcher of the heart, and trier of the reins. Learn hence, That although men are very prone to rest upon church privileges and external performances, as evidences of divine favour, yet they are no testimonies or signs of the truth of grace. What circumcision, sacrifices, and the temple were to the Jews of old, the same are baptism, the Lord's supper, and public assemblies to professing Christians at this day. And as the Jews rested in those externals, without eyeing Christ in them, without desiring to derive holiness and sanctification from them: In like manner, multitudes of professors set up their rest in outward duties, and repose a fleshly carnal confidence in ordinances, without either desiring of, or endeavouring after any lively communion with the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, in the exercise of faith and love, without any regard to spiritual warmth in religious duties, and being by ordinances rendered more like to the God of the ordinances, which are the most desirable things next to heaven itself. So that I shall conclude the chapter with the same application to Christians now, as the apostle did to the Jews then: Circumcision, saith the apostle, verily profiteth, if thou keep the law; but if thou be a breaker of the law, thy circumcision is made unprofitable: For he is not a Jew which is one outwardly, &c. In like manner, say I, "Baptism verily profiteth, if we perform the conditions of that covenant, which we entered into by baptism; but if we do not, baptism is no baptism: For he is not a Christian, who is one outwardly; nor is that baptism, which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Christian, which is one inwardly, and baptism is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in water only; and such shall have praise, if not of men, yet of God."

CHAP. III.

Our apostle in this chapter proceeds in his grand design and purpose in writing this epistle: He answers the objections of the Jews against what he asserted in the foregoing chapter; and the first objection runs thus:

WHAT advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there of circumcision? 2 Much every way: chiefly, because that unto them were committed the oracles of God.

The sense is this: But you of the Jews will object and say, "If outward circumcision avails nothing, but the inward circumcision is all in all; and if the uncircumcised person, keeping the law, is to be reckoned as circumcised what advantage then hath the Jew above the Gentile, or what profit is there of the circumcision above unprofitable?" He answers it, ver. 2. saying, The advantage is much every way; but chiefly, because unto them were committed the oracles of God. That is, the holy scriptures contained in the Old Testament, the sacraments and seals of the covenant, the prophecies and promises of the Messiah, and the whole revelation of the word and will of God, were then found with them, and in their hands only. Hence learn, 1. Great is that people's privilege and mercy, who enjoy the word of God, the audible word in the holy scriptures, the visible word in the holy sacraments. This enlighteneth the eyes, rejoiceth the heart, quickeneth the soul. This is compared to gold for profit; to honey for sweetness; to milk for nourishing, to food for strengthening. O how many souls are blessing God eternally for the benefit and blessing of divine revelation! The Jews had this special favour, to them were committed the oracles of God: that is, the writings of Moses and the prophets. But we Christians have a privilege beyond them, the doctrine of Jesus delivered to us by evangelists and apostles; not like the killing letter of the law, but a gospel bringing life and immortality to light. 2. The title which St. Paul gives to the holy scriptures; he calls them the oracles of God. St. Stephen calls them the lively oracles, Acts vii. 38. partly because delivered by a lively voice from God, partly because they should be to us as oracles; that is, consulted with upon all occasions, for resolving all doubts, determining all controversies. Had the church of Rome consulted these oracles more, and councils, &c. less, she had kept the doctrine of faith much freer from corruption than she has done. Lastly, That the original word, here rendered oracles, is the same which profane wretches made use of for the dark and doubtful oracles oracles of the devil ; Nevertheless, the Holy Ghost doth not disdain, nor decline, to make use of this word, as he also doth several others, though abused to heathenish superstition ; which may serve to rectify their mistake, who scruple to make use of some words, much more of some things which have been abused to superstition. Verily, there may be superstition in avoiding superstition ; and though we cannot be too circumspect in our words and actions, yet we may be too nice and precise in both. Yet, note, That though the same word, Verba, signifies God's oracles and Satan's, yet these oracles were not delivered in the same manner : Satan delivering his oracles ambiguously, and doubtfully, keeping his dark and blind votaries as much as might be in the dark ; what he said might bear several constructions, that so, whatever the event or issue proved to be, he the father of lies, might have the reputation of speaking truth : But God's oracles are plain and clear, free from ambiguity and darkness ; the scriptures are not dark, though some places are difficult, and that proceeds from the sublimity of the matter, not from the intention of the Writer.

3 For what if some did not believe ? Shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect ? 4 God forbid. Yea, let God be true, but every man a liar ; as it is written, That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings, and mightest overcome when thou art judged.

Here follows a second objection : Some might say, " True, the Jews had the oracles of God, but some of them never believed them, nor gave any credit to the promise of the Messiah contained in them ; therefore, they had no advantage by them." Be it so faith the apostle : yet shall the unbelief of some make the faith or fidelity of God in his promises, of no effect to others ? God forbid! that such a thought should enter into our hearts : But on the contrary, let God be acknowledged true and faithful to his word, though all men should prove liars. Learn thence, 1. That man's infidelity cannot shake the stability of God's word, whether we believe the fidelity of the promises, or assent to the veracity of God in his threatenings, or not ; his word standeth fast forever. The promise shall be fulfilled, the threatening executed ; only with this difference, we cannot personally find the comfort of the promise without faith, but we shall experimentally feel the terror of the threatening, whether we believe it or no. 2. The wonderful condescending grace of God towards those who have any measures of true faith, though with great mixtures of unbelief. O how faithful is God to us (if in truth believers) in the midst of our unfaithfulness to him ! the unbelief of men shall not make the fidelity or faith of God of none effect. 3. That as God is a God of truth, so all men are false and liars, compared with God ! As God cannot lie neither deceive, nor be deceived, so every man is fallible and false ; that is, under a possibility of deceiving and being deceived. Let God be true, and every man a liar. 4. That good men under afflictions, is very careful to justify and clear God from dealing unjustly with him in any of his severest dispensations towards him. The apostle here quotes Psal. li. 4.

That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings, and clear when thou art judged. As if David had said, " I know the men of the world, when they see me afflicted, will be ready to judge hardly of God for it ; therefore to stop their mouths to clear the justice of God, that he may overcome, when he is judged for dealing rigorously with me, I do freely confess my sin unto him, with all the aggravating circumstances of it, that all the world may justify him, how great soever my sufferings may be from him." A child of God, under the rod of God, desires nothing more than to justify him in all his severest dealings with, and dispensations towards him.

5 But if our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God, what we shall we say ? Is God unrighteous who taketh vengeance ? (I speak as a man.) 6 God forbid : for then how shall God judge the world ?

A third objection here followeth : namely, " That if the unrighteousness of men, that is, both of Jews and Gentiles, tends so visibly to commend, that is, to illustrate and recommend the righteousness of God, namely, his wisdom, grace, and favour, in appointing this way of justification by faith in Christ ; how can it be right in God to punish them for this unrighteousness, which tends so highly to illustrate the glory of his gospel-grace ?" The apostle tells us, that in making his objection, he spake as a man, that is, as natural and carnal men are ready to think and speak : But, says he God forbid that we should entertain such a thought, as if God either were, or could be unrighteous ; for then how should God judge the world, for their unrighteousness ? Learn thence, 1. That although the unrighteousness and wickedness of men be over-ruled by God, to subserve the purposes of his glory ; yet is God just in punishing all unrighteousness and wickedness whatsoever. God is never intentionally, but is sometimes accidentally glorified by the sin of man. There never was such an hellish wickedness committed, as crucifying Christ ; nothing, by which God ever reaped greater glory, than by the death of his Son : Yet is the wrath of God come upon the Jews to the utmost, and that most justly, for their committing of that wickedness. 2. That the righteous God neither doth, nor can do any iniquity or unrighteousness whatsoever ; Is God unrighteous ? How then shall God judge the world ? God is judge of all the world, and cannot but do right ; because the universality of his power puts him above all possibility of error in the exercise of his power. The very reason why God cannot exercise his power beyond the limits of justice, because his power is altogether unlimited ; he can do whatsoever he will do ; and whatsoever he will do, is for that reason just : Shall not the judge of all the earth do right ?

7 For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my life unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner ? 8 And not rather, as we be slanderously reported, and as some affirm that we say, Let us do evil that good may come ? whose damnation is just.

We must by no means understand these words as spoken by the apostle himself in his own name, as if he had told lies for upholding of the truth; and that the truth of God had abounded to the glory of God through his lies; but he speaks in the person of a profane objector. Thus some man (as if the apostle had said) may possibly plead for his sin: "The truth of God hath gained through my lie; the faithfulness of God is made more manifest by the unfaithfulness of men; therefore, why should I be judged and condemned as a sinner, when the glory of God will shine more bright upon the occasion of my sin? The free grace of God discovered in the gospel, will be manifested, say some, and magnified in the pardoning of sin; let us therefore sin our fill, that the immeasurableness of divine goodness may appear, and the abundance of pardoning mercy may abound." The apostle rejects this doctrine and practice, of doing evil that good may come, with the greatest abhorrency and utmost detestation, affirming, that their damnation is just, who either fasten this doctrine upon the apostles, or affirm it themselves. Learn hence, That no person must adventure to the least of evils; no, not for the sake of the greatest good. True, Almighty God can bring good out of evil, by the same word of his power, by which he brought light out of darkness, and something out of nothing; but to do readily evil for the sake of obtaining the greatest good, is dangerous and damnable. Sin, or that which is sinful, ought not to be chosen, whatever we chuse. 2. That nothing is more just and righteous than their damnation, who will adventure to do evil that good may come: A good intention will not excuse, never justify a bad action in the sight of God: He will condemn evil doers, though they do evil that good may come. 3. That the apostle pronounces their damnation just, who laid these slanders to the apostle's charge, as if their doctrine did allow of this damnable practice, to do evil that good might come: Their damnation is just, who thus slanderously report and affirm, that we say, Let us do evil that good may come. Whence note, That it is a just thing with God to damn those men that raise or spread abroad reports of his ministers doctrine, as giving liberty to licentious practices; Verily, the slander of a minister's regular doctrine is more than ordinary slander. The original word here rendered slander, signifies blasphemy; the word which God makes use of, to set forth his own reproches by. Behold God's resentment of his minister's wrongs! The slander and contempt cast upon our office and doctrine, is esteemed blasphemy in God's account: As we be slanderously reported or blasphemed; and as some affirm that we say. Let us, &c.

9 What then? are we better than they? No, in no wise: for we have before proved both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin;

Here the apostle starts another objection in the name of the Jews: Some of them might say, "Are we not better than the Gentiles? Do we not excel them in outward privileges? Is not the knowledge of the law found with us, and the oracles of God committed to us?" True, says the apostle, the Jews are better than the Gentiles in respect of outward dispensations, but not in respect of inward qualifications. Jews and Gentiles are alike by natural corruption; alike under sin by actual transgressions; and so stand in need both alike of justification by faith; and the gospel-righteousness is no less necessary for the one, than for the other. To prove what he had said, namely, That the whole race of mankind, both Jew and Gentile, were under sin, and void of all true righteousness and goodness, and consequently standing in need equally of justification by Christ; the apostle produces several texts out of the Old Testament, and particularly out of the sixth Psalm, which speaks fully of the original corruption, and universal depravation of all mankind in the following words:

10 As it is written, There is none righteous, no not one: 11 There is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. 12 They are gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable, there is none that doeth good, no not one. 13 Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they have used deceit; the poison of asps is under their lips: 14 Whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness. 15 Their feet are swift to shed blood. 16 Destruction and misery are in their ways. 17 And the way of peace have they not known. 18 There is no fear of God before their eyes.

Observe here, How the apostle proves his assertion; namely, That both Jew and Gentile were under the guilt both of original and actual transgression, from the testimony of David, Psalm xiv. where the state of corrupt nature is described, and the natural condition of all men declared till they are either restrained or renewed by the grace of God: There is none righteous, no not one. Which words are true in several respects: 1. There is none originally righteous, no not one: none righteous in their first plantation in the world until they are transfused into the body of Christ, wrought and fashioned by his Holy Spirit. 2. There is none efficiently righteous; no not one: None have a righteousness of their own, making but of God's. The righteousness of justification and sanctification are both from Christ, not from ourselves; we are his workmanship, not our own. 3. There is none meritoriously righteous, no not one; none can deserve or demand any thing as a due debt at God's hand; but the most righteous and holy saints are but unprofitable servants. 4. There is none perfectly and completely righteous, no not one; but inchoatively only: None righteous in a strict and legal sense, but in a gospel and qualified sense only: He that doth righteousness is righteous, in the account of God; and, as such, shall be accepted and rewarded by him. Observe, 2. How the apostle proves the corruption of mankind in general, by an induction of particulars. He surveys him in all the principal faculties of his soul, and members of his body; his understanding, will, and affections; his eye, hand, tongue, and feet, all corrupted and depraved: Their mouth is full of cursing, and bitter speeches; Their throat is an open sepulchre, gaping after, and devouring the good name of their neighbours, and belching out filthy, ill-scented, and unflavoury words against them. They seek not God in any thing they do, and there is no fear of God, no respect of God

God before their eyes. The apostle shuts up all with this, because want of the fear of God before our eyes, is the fountain from whence all other evils do proceed and flow. The fear of God is the bridle and curb which restrains from sin; where that is wanting, all iniquity abounds: where that is present and prevalent, it keeps the soul close to God, Jer. xxxii. 32. I will put my fear in their hearts, and they shall not depart from me. We usually depart far, yea, run from those we fear; but the true fear of God will make us cleave close unto him, because love is intermixed with it and renders it a delightful fear.

19 Now we know, that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law: that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God.

Note here, Lest the Jews should think to elude or evade the force of the foregoing testimonies concerning man's corruption and depravation, as not belonging to them, but to the Gentiles only; he tells them, that what the law; that is, the books of the Old Testament, do thus say, it says to those that are under the law: that is, to those that are subjects of it, and obliged by it; to such as are under the instruction and direction of it, as the Jews are known to be; and if so, then every mouth must be stopped; Jew and Gentile both must own themselves, before God, obnoxious to his wrath, without being able to say any thing for themselves. Learn hence, That the holy law of God brings such plain evidence and conviction with it, that no man can have a word to speak against it: When God spreads before men the purity of his laws, and the impiety of their own lives, every man must sit down silent, and lay his hand upon his mouth, not having one word to object why sentence should not be executed, because they have all transgressed.

20 Therefore by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight. For by the law is the knowledge of sin.

Here we have St. Paul's conclusion drawn from all the foregoing premises: "Seeing all mankind, since the fall are disabled, by their innate corruption, and actual transgression to fulfil the law, either natural or written, it must necessarily follow, that by the works of the law can no flesh, that is, no person, neither Jew or Gentile, be justified before God; all the efficacy which the law now has, being to discover sin, and condemn for sinning: By the law is the knowledge of sin. By the law we apprehend our malady, but by the gospel we understand our remedy." Learn hence, That no son of Adam, since the breach of the law, can stand justified before God by his best obedience to the commands of the law: By being justified, understand that gracious act in God, whereby we are acquitted, and finally discharged from the guilt and punishment of all our sins. By the law, and the deeds of the law, we are to understand ceremonial and moral law both, especially the latter; for by the moral law, is the knowledge of sin: It is the moral law that forbids theft, adultery, &c. Besides, it is evident, that the antithesis, or opposition, runs all along, not between ceremonial works, and moral works, but between works in general; and faith: The law of works, and the law of faith are opposed to each other, ver. 27. But why can no flesh, that is, no person, be justified by the deeds of the law. Ans, 1. Because he is flesh, that is, depraved by original corruption, and obnoxious to the curse of the law, by actual transgression. Now, that which condemns, cannot justify: An after obedience to the law can never atone for a former disobedience. 2. Because the best obedience we can perform to the law, is imperfect. Now, he that mixes but one sin with a thousand good works, can never be justified by his works. He that would be justified by his works, must not have one bad work amongst all his good works; for that one will lay him under the curse, and condemnatory sentence of law; Gal. iii. 10. Cursed is every one that continueth not, &c. Nothing that is imperfect can be a ground of a justification before God, because the designs of God is to exalt his justice, as well as his mercy, in the justification of a sinner. Again, 3. No flesh can be justified by the works of the law, because all that we do, or can do, is a due debt which we owe to the law: We owe all possible obedience to the law as creatures; and by performing our obligation as creatures, we can never pay our debts as transgressors. But now, our surety, Christ Jesus, who has given satisfaction for our violation of the law, was under no obligation to the law, but what he voluntarily laid himself under upon our account. And if so, let us eternally bless God with the highest elevation of soul for the gospel-revelation, for his sending his own Son to justify and save us, by working out a compleat and everlasting righteousness: And let us plead with him incessantly for the justifying faith, which is as necessary in its place as the death of Christ. One renders God reconcilable unto poor sinners, the other actually reconciled.

21 But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets; 22 Even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe. For there is no difference. 23 For all have sinned; and come short of the glory of God;

Our apostle having proved negatively, that by the works of the law righteousness and justification is not to be had for any person, be he Jew or Gentile: He comes now to prove the affirmative part of his assertion; namely, that God hath manifested another way of justification in the gospel, to wit, by faith in Jesus Christ. "For, saith he, now, that is, since the coming of Christ, since the dispensation of the gospel: the righteousness of God, that is, the righteousness which God appoints, approves, and accepts for a sinner's justification. is without the law, that is, without performing the works of the law, either natural ceremonial, or moral: and is manifested to be the righteousness which is by faith in Christ: which all that believe and obey the gospel, shall be admitted to the participation of both Jew and Gentile: for there is no difference; that is, no difference between Jew and Gentile, as the way and means of their justification." And the reason assigned by the apostle, why there is, and can be, no other way of justification justification but this, we have in the next verse, namely, because all have sinned, the whole race of mankind, not one mere man excepted: and so will fall short of obtaining the glory of God, and eternal life, if they seek it not in this way. Learn hence, 1. That there is no standing or appearing before God for any creature, in a creature's unrighteousness. There is much unrighteousness in our righteousness, and therefore we cannot stand justified before God. Besides, the wisdom of God has appointed another righteousness, or the righteousness of another, even the righteousness of Jesus Christ, to stand before him in; But now the righteousness of God is manifested, even the righteousness of God which is by faith in Jesus Christ. 2. The necessity and excellency of faith; the righteousness of God is unto all, and upon all that believe: Faith is the bond of union, the instrument of our justification, the spring of our consolation; Being justified by faith we have peace with God, Rom. v. 1. Render we then unto faith the things which are faith's, as well as unto Christ the things which are Christ's. 3. That in reference to, or in respect of our justification before God, there is no difference among believers, verse 22. For there is no difference; that is, no difference as to the way of justification, between Jew and Gentile, male and female, bond and free; but all, without the righteousness of faith in Christ, must die, and be damned to all eternity. There is now a difference amongst believers, with respect to their degrees of sanctification, and with respect to their measures of consolation, and will be hereafter, with respect to their degrees of glorification. Some faints have more grace and comfort on earth, and shall have higher degrees of glory in heaven, than others; but the justification of all believers is alike. There is the same sin to all, not for measure and degree, but in respect of guilt and obligation to punishment. There is the same price paid by way of satisfaction to divine justice, for all; namely, the death of Christ: There is the same righteousness imputed to all, and the Spirit of holiness imparted to all, and the same mansions of glory designed for all; thus there is no difference. And there is no difference amongst believers, in respect of truth of grace, but much in respect of strength of grace; no difference amongst them in respect of God's promises, but much difference with respect to their performances; no difference in respect of God's covenant, but much difference in respect of God's counsels, as also in respect of God's dispensations; no difference in respect of God's acceptance but much in respect of their application; no difference as they are a body, in respect of their head, but much difference as they are members of that head. And if there be no difference among believers (as such) before God, why should there be so much difference amongst themselves, as there is often times here in this world! You are all dear, truly dear to God; why should you not be so, one to another? Why should not one church and one communion hold you now? Ere long, perhaps, one prison may, one heaven shall certainly hold you all. For there is no difference.

24 Being justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ; 25 Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God: 26 To declare, I say, at this time, his righteousness: that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus.

Note here, 1. A glorious privilege vouchsafed to believers which the scriptures call justification, whereby they are judicially acquitted and discharged from the guilt and punishment of all their sins, and accounted righteous before God. 2. The efficient cause of our justification. It is God that justifies; Who can forgive the crime, but the person against whom we have done the wrong? 3. The moving or impulsive cause, namely, the free grace of God: Being justified freely by his grace. 4. The meritorious cause, the blood-shedding and death of Christ; through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ. 5. The final cause; to declare his righteousness, not his clemency and mercy only, but his justice and righteousness, especially that attribute which disposes and inclines him to punish sin and sinners. 6. The instrumental cause of justification, faith, Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood, &c. Some of the papists, especially Cajetan, and a Lapide, do call faith causa applicans in our justification: Verily, an unapplied Christ justifies none, saves none. Learn thence, * That in order to a sinner's being saved, he must be justified, that is, discharged of, absolved from, the guilt of all sin, upon the account of a complete satisfaction given to divine justice for sin. 2. That not all and every sinner, but only repenting and believing sinners are justified by God. 3. That when the Lord justifies a believing sinner, he doth it freely; being justified freely by his grace. It is an act of mere grace; there is nothing in the creature can merit or deserve it: then it would be debt and not grace. 4. That God's free grace and Christ's full satisfaction were consistent, and both concurring in the believer's justification we are justified freely by God's grace; yet, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus; Him hath God set forth to be a propitiation. The word propitiation is an allusion to the mercy-seat, which covered the ark wherein the law was; this typified Christ, who fully covers our sins, the transgressions of the law, out of God's sight. When therefore the apostle saith that God hath set forth Christ to be a mercy-seat to us, through faith in his blood; we have reason to believe the blood of Christ, as our sin-offering, doth make an atonement for us, and renders God propitious to us. 5. That Almighty God, in the justification of a believing sinner, is not only gracious and merciful, but just and righteous, in the most exalted degree: To declare his righteousness for the remission of sin. Where note, That the design and end of God in exacting satisfaction from Christ, was to declare his righteousness in the remission of sin; but the apostle would have us take notice that our justification is an act of justice as well as mercy, and that God, as he is a just God, cannot condemn the believer, since Christ has satisfied for his sins. O blessed be God! that pardon of sin is built upon that very attribute, the justice of God, which is so affrighting and dreadful to the offending sinner. This attribute, which seemed to be the main bar against remission, is now become the very ground according to the merits and deserts of men: Who will render to every one according to his deeds; that is, according to the kind and quality, and according to the measures and degrees of every man's works. Where note, he doth not say, God will render to every man a reward for his works, but according to his works! Works are regula retributionis, non causa mercedis; "Our works are the rule of God's proceedings, but not the cause of his rewards." Having thus described the impartiality of the Judge, he next declares the universality of the persons that shall then be judged; namely, the righteous and the wicked; which shall both have their distinct rewards assigned them, according to the quality of their works. Note, 1. The righteous persons described, and their reward declared; they are described by their well-doing, by their continuance in well-doing, by their patient continuance in well-doing; they are not weary in well-doing, they can undergo sufferings for the sake of well-doing, and they can patiently wait for the reward of well-doing till hereafter, whilst others snatch at their reward here: Yet in the mean time they are seeking after, and securing of this their reward: They seek for glory, honour, and immortality; that is, they seek for a portion of glory and immortality in the world to come; they leave the world to the men of the world, and whilst they are scrambling for earth, they are making fire of heaven. Next, Their persons being described, their reward is declared, eternal life; an eternity of glory and happiness in a future state, shall certainly be the reward of well-doers, and of patient continuance in well-doing. 2. The wicked are here characterized, and their reward assigned; They are contentious and obey not the truth, but obey unrighteousness; that is, They contend with God, and resist the light of his revealed truth; they refuse the offers of his grace, and kick against his word, disobeying the gospel of truth, but obeying unrighteousness: God will pour forth such indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish. Lord, who knowest the power of thine anger; or who can bear the weight of thy wrath! It broke the back of angels, how shall sinners stand under it? It is styled fire in scripture, it is a consuming fire, and an unquenchable fire: It preys upon the sinner, but never devours him: It is unquenchable by any thing but the blood of Christ. A mysterious fire, whose strange property it is always to torment, but never to kill; or always to kill, but never to consume. 3. With what equity, as well as impartiality, this distribution of God's indignation and wrath will be made: Upon every soul that doeth evil; but upon the Jew first, and then of the Gentile. The Jew first, that is, principally and especially; because the light and mercy which the Jews abused and sinned against, was far greater than that bestowed upon the Gentiles. Learn hence, That the light under which men sin, puts extraordinary aggravations upon their sins, answerable whereunto will be the degrees of their punishment. The Gentiles will be condemned for disobeying the light of nature, the law of God written on their hearts; but much greater wrath is reserved for the Jews, unto whom were committed the oracles of God: But the greatest of all is reserved for Christians, who obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; these shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe, 2 Thess. i. 9, 10.

12 For as many as have sinned without law, shall also perish without law: And as many as have sinned in the law, shall be judged by the law.

That is, as many as have sinned without the written law, which is the case of the Gentiles or Heathens, shall also perish without that law, being judged and condemned by the law of nature written in their hearts; but as many as have sinned in, or under the law of Moses, which is the case of the Jews, shall be judged and condemned by that law. Note here, 1. A truth plainly implied, and necessarily supposed; namely, That as some sinners perish, having the written word, and all external means of salvation; so others perish, having not the written law or word of God, and the outward and ordinary means of salvation: As many as have sinned without the law, shall perish without the law. God, in the dispensations of his grace, acteth in a way of sovereignty, according to his own pleasure; yet, in his penal dispensations, he proceeds according to the measures of strict justice, upon the previous demerits of sinners. 2. That all men shall not be proceeded against in the day of judgment after one and the same manner; but every man according to the demerit of his sin, and according to the capacity and relation in which he stood in this life. The Gentiles which had only the law of nature, shall not be judged by the law of Moses: The Jews, which have both the law of nature, and the law of Moses shall be judged by both: And consequently Christians, which have the law of nature underwritten, the Mosaical law written, and the Evangelical law, both written and preached, shall lie under greater guilt, and receive a more aggravating condemnation. Christ will exactly proportion every man's hell hereafter to his sin committed here; the greater light we have quenched, the greater darkness will be inflicted, Heb. ii. 3.

13 (For not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified.

That is, not the bare hearers of the law shall, upon that account, be just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified; that is, accepted of God, as acting suitably to their holy profession. It is notoriously known, the Jews gloried in, and rested upon, their outward privileges for salvation, because they were Abraham's seed, because they were circumcised, because they were employed in reading and hearing of the law; they concluded this sufficient to render them acceptable with God; therefore, says the apostle, not the hearers, but doers of the law shall be justified; that is, the persons whom God will accept and account righteous for the sake of Christ. Note here, That the doers of the law or word of God, are the best hearers, yea, the only hearers in the account of God. Hearing is good, but it must not be rested in; a great understanding may a man have by much reading the word and law of God; but a good understanding only have they that do the word and will of God; the praise and fruit of that endureth for ever.

3 Z. 14 For

14 For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves; 15 Which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the mean while accusing or else excusing one another.

The sense is; that the Gentiles, which have not the law of Moses promulgated, are yet not without a law ingrafted in their consciences; and although they have not a written law; yet have they a law, that is a rule of living to themselves; doing those things which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their consciences bearing witness to it, and their natural reason either accusing or defending of them from it: Learn, 1. That there is a law of nature ingrafted and written by God in the hearts of men, whereby the common notions of good and evil are found with them. 2. That this law of nature serveth for the instigation and provocation of men to many good actions and duties towards God and man. 3. That to rebel against and not walk in conformity unto this ingrafted law of nature, is a God provoking and a wrath procuring sin. 4. That although many of the Gentiles gave themselves over to all manner of uncleanness, yet others shewed the works of the law written in their hearts: They shewed it two ways, (1.) By their temperance, righteousness, and moral honesty; wherein (to our shame) they excelled many of us who are called Christians. (2.) In the efficacy of their conscience; which, as it cleared and comforted them for things well done, so it witnessed against them, yea, judged and condemned them for doing evil: And these evidences of a law written on the heart, are every where to be found; wherever men are found: The Gentiles having not a written law, are a law unto themselves, and shew the work of the law written in their hearts.

16 In the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ according to my gospel.

As if the apostle had said, If any shall ask, when shall rewards and punishments be distributed to Jew or Gentile? The answer is, In that day when God shall judge the secrets of men's hearts by Jesus Christ; according to my gospel: That is, as my gospel testifies, he will most certainly do. Here note r. A fundamental doctrine asserted, That there will be a day of judgment, in which the secrets of all men's hearts shall be judged by Jesus Christ, as Mediator. All the thoughts, words, and works of all men, that lived from the beginning of the world, or shall live to the end of the world, will then be produced in judgment; and if so, may we not infer, that the day of judgment must certainly and necessarily take up a vast space of time? For if all records and registers now made, shall then be opened and read, and all the witnesses for and against man, shall be then examined and heard, what a vast space of time then must that great day take up! Some divines are of opinion, that the day of judgment may last as long as the world hath lasted: This we may depend upon, that things will not be huddled up, nor shuffled over in haste; but as sinners have taken their time for sinning, so God will take his time for judging. 2. The proof and confirmation of this doctrine of a future judgment, According to my gospel; that is, as certainly as I have foretold you of it, in the doctrine which I have preached, so certainly shall all men, and the secrets of all men's hearts, be judged by Jesus Christ. But was it not a presumption in St. Paul, to call the gospel; his gospel? Ans. He means that he was the publisher, not the author of it; it was God's in respect of authority, St. Paul's in respect of dispensation.

17 Behold, thou art called a Jew, and restest in the law, and makest thy boast of God, 18 And know his will; and approvest the things that are more excellent, being instructed out of the law; 19 And art confident that thou thyself art a guide of the blind, a light of them which are in darkness, 20 An instructor of the foolish, a teacher of babes, which hast the form of knowledge, and of the truth in the law.

Here the apostle proceeds in his former argument; namely, to prove, That the Jews could no more rationally expect to be justified before God by the law of Moses, than the Gentiles by the law of nature; the apostle allows them all their privileges which they so much doated upon, boasted of, and gloried in; but withal assures them, that these, all these, yea, more than these, were insufficient to justify them before God. As if the apostle had said, "Thou bearest thyself mightily upon this, that thou art called a Jew; that is, a professor of the true religion, and a worshipper of the true God: Thou restest in the law; that is, either in the divineness and perfection of it, or in thy external obedience to it, and in the outward performances of it: Thou makest thy boast of God, as a God in covenant with thee above all the nations of the earth; and thou knowest his will, having his word and law in thy hands, the oracles of God committed to thee, and the writings of Moses and the prophets alone found with thee: And approvest things that are most excellent, being instructed out of the law; that is, thou thinkest that thou hast such a degree of knowledge of God's word and will, that thou canst clearly discern between sin and duty, and compare one duty with another, preferring that which is most excellent: And art confident that thou thyself art a guide of the blind, a light of them that are in darkness; that is, thou hast a strong conceit that such are the measures of thy knowledge, that thou art able to be a guide to the blind Gentiles, who sit in darkness, and to be a teacher of babes; that is, such as have little or no knowledge in the matters of religion, conceiting, That thou hast the form of knowledge, and of the truth in the law; that is, such a method and measure of divine knowledge, as may enable thee to instruct others, whether Gentiles or Jews, which never reached to thy attainment."— These external privileges the presumptuous Jew rested upon, and thought them sufficient for salvation, though believed loosely, and his practice gave his profession the lie. Hence learn, 1. That persons are exceedingly prone to be proud of, and puffed up with church privileges, glorying in the letter of the law, whilst, neither in heart nor life, they are comforted to the spirituality of the law. Learn 2. That gifts, duties, and supposed graces, are the stay and staff, which hypocrites rest upon, and repose their trust and confidence in; Thou art called a Jew, and restest in the law; that is, in the outward profession of the law, or in an external obedience to the law; the apostle speaks of this their resting in the law, not barely by way of narration, but by way of reproof, telling us not only what they did, but how ill they did in so doing. The duties which Christ has appointed, are the trust and rest of the hypocrites; but Christ himself is the rest and trust of the upright; they desire to be ever acting graces, never trusting to them; to be much in duty, and yet much above duty; much in it in point of performance, much above it in regard of dependence.

21 Thou therefore which teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? thou that preachest a man should not steal, dost thou steal? 22 Thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery? thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou commit sacrilege? 23 Thou that makest thy boast of the law, through breaking the law dishonourest thou God? 24 For the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles, through you, as it is written.

The apostle proceeds, to the end of this chapter, to convince the Jews, that they were equally in a sinful and wretched condition with the despised Gentiles, and therefore stood in need of Jesus Christ to justify them by his grace, as well as they. And because the Jews were so exceeding apt to dot upon, and rest in, their external privileges, he did, in the foregoing verses, recount and reckon up the several privileges which they enjoyed: Thou art called a Jew, thou makest thy boast of God, &c. But now, in the verses before us, he takes occasion to aggravate their sins committed, from their high privileges and prerogatives enjoyed, because they sinned against light and knowledge, against the convictions of their own consciences, and contradicted the dictates of their minds, as the Gentiles did: But besides all that, rebelled against the precepts of the written word, which was all in their hands. The law of Moses was near in their mouths, but far from their reins; for thus the apostle expostulates with them, Thou that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? Thou that undertakest to be a teacher of, and guide unto the ignorant and blind Gentiles, wilt thou not practise thine own instructions? but condemn thyself out of thine own mouth? "Wilt thou, O Jew! (as if the apostle had said) be guilty of theft, adultery, sacrilege, rapine and murder, sins which the very heathens condemn, and all this while, call yourselves the only people of God? Verily, The name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you Jews, who pretend to be the favourites of heaven, whilst you do the works of hell." Learn hence, 1. That it is much easier to instruct and teach others, than to be instructed and receive instruction ourselves. 2. That it is both sinful and shameful to teach others the right way, and to go in the wrong ourselves. It is a double fault in a private person, when his actions run cross to his profession; but it is inexcusable, if not an unpardonable fault in a teacher, when the crimes which he condemns in others, may be justly charged upon himself: Thou that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? 3. That the name of God suffers much, very much; yea, by none so much as those who preach and press the duties of Christianity upon others, but practise them not themselves. The name of the Lord is blasphemed by such preachers, the wicked profane world taking occasion from thence to wound the name of God with the poisoned arrows and darts of reproach. The sins of teachers are teaching sins. True, sin, strictly speaking, cannot injure the name and glory of God: He is above the reach of any mischief that sin can do him; his essential glory is perfect, and can neither be increased or diminished by the creatures: God cannot no more be hurt by our sins, than the sun can be hurt by throwing stones into the air, or the moon hurt by the barking of dogs. But his manifestative glory, or the present manifestations of his glory, these are clouded and eclipsed by sin: and therefore God will deal with knowing sinners, especially with such as undertake to be teachers of others, as with those that have blasphemed his name, wounded his glory, trampled upon his honour, and caused his holy ways to be evil spoken of, by reason of their wicked and unholy lives. Lord, let all that administer, unto thee in holy things consider, that they have not only their own sins to account for, but also the sins of their people, if committed by their profligate example.

25 For circumcision verily profiteth, if thou keep the law: but if thou be a breaker of the law, thy circumcision is made uncircumcision. 26 Therefore if the uncircumcision keep the righteousness of the law, shall not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision? 27 And shall not uncircumcision which is by nature, if it fulfill the law, judge thee, who by the letter and circumcision dost transgress the law?

It is sufficiently known what great stress the Jews laid upon circumcision; they taught, that this alone was enough to procure the favour of God, and to free them from hell: "God having, as they said, promised Abraham, that if his children transgressed, he would remember the odour of the foreskins, and deliver them for the merit of circumcision;" But all this was a false and vain-glorious bulle. Our apostle, therefore, in the words before us, assures the Jews, that circumcision without holiness of conversation, would never free them from condemnation: That a circumcised Jew, who walks not in obedience to the law of God, is in as bad, or worse condition, than any uncircumcised heathen; yea, the uncircumcision, that is, the uncircumcised person that keeps the law, shall be accepted of God, as well as if he had been circumcised; and be preferred by God before the circumcised Jew that transgressed the law. The sum is, that the obedient Gentile shall condemn the disobedient Jew, and be sooner accepted by God, with whom there is no respect of persons, but with respect of their qualifications: That no church-privileges, no external prerogatives nor the highest profession of piety and holiness, without an humble, uniform, and sincere obedience, will be any thing available to salvation: And is, then, an uncircumcised Gentile found better acceptance with God, than any circumcised Jew, even so, as unbaptized heathen, at the great day will not change place with many baptized christians. It is a sad, but a certain truth, that the case of the Pagan world will be much easier in the day of judgment, than others that live and die disobedient under the gospel of Jesus Christ. The heathens have but abused one talent, the light of nature; but we thousands, even as many thousands as we have slighted the tenders of offered grace: Lord, what a fearful aggravation doth it put upon our sin and misery! We must certainly be accountable to thee at the great day, not only for all the light we had, but for all that we might have had in the gospel-day; and especially for that light we have sinned under, and rebelled against.

28 For he is not a Jew which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision which is outwardly in the flesh: 29 But he is a Jew; which is one inwardly: and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God.

Here our apostle comes close and home to the self-confident Jews, and touches them in the most sensible part. It was the hardest saying that could sound in a Jewish ear, to affirm, that circumcision which is outward in the flesh, profiteth nothing; for they so gloried in it, that they accounted it equal to the keeping of all the commandments of God: Now our apostle here takes away the very foundation of this their boasting and glorying, by a plain and true distinction. There is, saith he, a Jew outwardly, that only has the badge of circumcision in his flesh. Now he is not a Jew in God's account, who is only so by outward circumcision; neither is that circumcision valuable or available, which is only outward in the flesh; but then there is a Jew, who is one inwardly; namely, by the purification of his heart from all filthy lusts, evil affections, and sinful dispositions, and a circumcision of the heart, and in the spirit; that is, a circumcision wrought in us by the Spirit of God, and not barely by the letter of the law: And the praise of this is not of men, who cannot discern the heart, but of God, who is the searcher of the heart, and trier of the reins. Learn hence, That although men are very prone to rest upon church privileges and external performances, as evidences of divine favour, yet they are no testimonies or signs of the truth of grace. What circumcision, sacrifices, and the temple were to the Jews of old, the same are baptism, the Lord's supper, and public assemblies to professing Christians at this day. And as the Jews rested in those externals, without eyeing Christ in them, without desiring to derive holiness and sanctification from them: In like manner, multitudes of professors set up their rest in outward duties, and repose a fleshly carnal confidence in ordinances, without either desiring of, or endeavouring after any lively communion with the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, in the exercise of faith and love, without any regard to spiritual warmth in religious duties, and being by ordinances rendered more like to the God of the ordinances, which are the most desirable things next to heaven itself. So that I shall conclude the chapter with the same application to Christians now, as the apostle did to the Jews then: Circumcision; saith the apostle, verily profiteth, if thou keep the law; but if thou be a breaker of the law, thy circumcision is made uncircumcision: For he is not a Jew which is one outwardly, &c. In like manner, say I, "Baptism verily profiteth, if we perform the conditions of that covenant, which we entered into by baptism; but if we do not, baptism is no baptism: For he is not a Christian, who is one outwardly; nor is that baptism, which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Christian, which is one inwardly, and baptism is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in water only; and such shall have praise, if not of men, yet of God."

CHAP. III.

Our apostle in this chapter proceeds in his grand design and purpose in writing this epistle: He answers the objections of the Jews against what he asserted in the foregoing chapter; and the first objection runs thus:

WHAT advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there of circumcision? 2 Much every way: chiefly, because that unto them were committed the oracles of God.

The sense is this: But you of the Jews will object and say, "If outward circumcision avails nothing, but the inward circumcision is all in all; and if the uncircumcised person, keeping the law, is to be reckoned as circumcised what advantage then hath the Jew above the Gentile, or what profit is there of the circumcision above uncircumcision?" He answers it, ver. 2. saying, The advantage is much every way; but chiefly, because unto them were committed the oracles of God: That is, the holy scriptures contained in the Old Testament, the sacraments and seals of the covenant, the prophecies and promises of the Messiah, and the whole revelation of the word and will of God, were then found with them, and in their hands only. Hence learn, 1. Great is that people's privilege and mercy, who enjoy the word of God, the audible word in the holy scriptures, the visible word in the holy sacraments. This enlighteneth the eyes, rejoiceth the heart, quickeneth the soul. This is compared to gold for profit; to honey for sweetness; to milk for nourishing, to food for strengthening. O how many souls are blessing God eternally for the benefit and blessing of divine revelation! The Jews had this special favour, to them were committed the oracles of God: that is, the writings of Moses and the prophets. But we Christians have a privilege beyond them, the doctrine of Jesus delivered to us by evangelists and apostles; not like the killing letter of the law, but a gospel bringing life and immortality to light. 2. The title which St. Paul gives to the holy scriptures; he calls them the oracles of God. St. Stephen calls them the lively oracles, Acts vii. 38. partly because delivered by a lively voice from God, partly because they should be to us as oracles; that is, consulted with upon all occasions, for resolving all doubts, determining all controversies. Had the church of Rome consulted these oracles more, and councils, &c. less, she had kept the doctrine of faith much freer from corruption than she has done. Lastly, That the original word, here rendered oracles, is the same which profane wretches made use of for the dark and doubtful oracles oracles of the devil; Nevertheless, the Holy Ghost doth not disdain, nor decline, to make use of this word, as he also doth several others, though abused to heathenish superstition; which may serve to rectify their mistake, who scruple to make use of some words, much more of some things which have been abused to superstition. Verily, there may be superstition in avoiding superstition; and though we cannot be too circumspect in our words and actions, yet we may be too nice and precise in both. Yet, note, That though the same word, Avaz, signifies God's oracles and Satan's, yet these oracles were not delivered in the same manner: Satan delivering his oracles ambiguously, and doubtfully, keeping his dark and blind votaries as much as might be in the dark; what he said might bear several constructions, that so, whatever the event or issue proved to be, he the father of lies, might have the reputation of speaking truth: But God's oracles are plain and clear, free from ambiguity and darkness; the scriptures are not dark, though some places are difficult, and that proceeds from the sublimity of the matter, not from the intention of the writer.

3 For what if some did not believe? shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect? 4 God forbid. Yea, let God be true, but every man a liar; as it is written, That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings; and mightest overcome when thou art judged.

Here follows a second objection: Some might say, "True, the Jews had the oracles of God, but some of them never believed them, nor gave any credit to the promise of the Messiah contained in them; therefore, they had no advantage by them." Be it so with the apostle: yet shall the unbelief of some make the faith or fidelity of God in his promises, of no effect to others? God forbid! that such a thought should enter into our hearts: But on the contrary, let God be acknowledged true and faithful to his word, though all men should prove liars. Learn thence, 1. That man's infidelity cannot shake the stability of God's word, whether we believe the fidelity of the promises, or assent to the veracity of God in his threatenings, or not; his word standeth fast forever. The promise shall be fulfilled; the threatening executed; only with this difference, we cannot personally find the comfort of the promise without faith, but we shall experimentally feel the terror of the threatening, whether we believe it or no. 2. The wonderful condescending grace of God towards those who have any measures of true faith, though with great mixtures of unbelief. O how faithful is God to us (if in truth believers) in the midst of our unfaithfulness to him! the unbelief of men shall not make the fidelity or faith of God of none effect. 3. That as God is a God of truth, so all men are false and liars, compared with God: As God cannot lie neither deceive, nor be deceived, so every man is fallible and false; that is, under a possibility of deceiving and being deceived. Let God be true, and every man a liar. 4. That good men under afflictions, is very careful to justify and clear God from dealing unjustly with him in any of his severest dispensations towards him. The apostle here quotes Psal. li. 4.

That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings, and clear when thou art judged. As if David had said, "I know the men of the world, when they see me afflicted, will be ready to judge hardly of God for it; therefore to stop their mouths to clear the justice of God, that he may overcome. when he is judged for dealing rigorously with me, I do freely confess my sin unto him, with all the aggravating circumstances of it, that all the world may justify him, how great soever my sufferings may be from him." A child of God, under the rod of God, desires nothing more than to justify him in all his severest dealings with, and dispensations towards him.

5 But if our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God, what shall we say? Is God unrighteous who taketh vengeance? (I speak as a man.) 6 God forbid: for then how shall God judge the world?

A third objection here followeth: namely, "That if the unrighteousness of men, that is, both of Jews and Gentiles, tends so visibly to commend, that is, to illustrate and recommend the righteousness of God, namely, his wisdom, grace, and favour, in appointing this way of justification by faith in Christ; how can it be right in God to punish them for this unrighteousness, which tends so highly to illustrate the glory of his gospel-grace?" The apostle tells us, that in making his objection, he spake as a man, that is, as natural and carnal men are ready to think and speak: But, says he God forbid that we should entertain such a thought, as if God either were, or could be unrighteous; for then how should God judge the world, for their unrighteousness? Learn hence, 1. That although the unrighteousness and wickedness of men be over-ruled by God, to subserve the purposes of his glory; yet is God just in punishing all unrighteousness and wickedness whatsoever. God is never intentionally, but is sometimes accidentally glorified by the sin of man: There never was such an hellish wickedness committed, as crucifying Christ; nothing, by which God ever reaped greater glory, than by the death of his Son: Yet is the wrath of God come upon the Jews to the utmost, and that most justly, for their committing of that wickedness. 2. That the righteous God neither doth, nor can do any iniquity or unrighteousness whatsoever; Is God unrighteous? How then shall God judge the world? God is judge of all the world, and cannot but do right; because the universality of his power puts him above all possibility of error in the exercise of his power. The very reason why God cannot exercise his power beyond the limits of justice, because his power is altogether unlimited; he can do whatsoever he will do; and whatsoever he will do, is for that reason just: Shall not the judge of all the earth do right?

7 For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my life unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner? 8 And not rather, as we be slanderously reported, and as some affirm that we say, Let us do evil that good may come? whose damnation is just.

We must by no means understand these words as spoken by the apostle himself in his own name, as if he had told lies for upholding of the truth; and that the truth of God had abounded to the glory of God through his lies; but he speaks in the person of a profane objecter. Thus some men (as if the apostle had said) may possibly plead for his sin: "The truth of God hath gained through my lie; the faithfulness of God is made more manifest by the unfaithfulness of men; therefore, why should I be judged and condemned as a sinner, when the glory of God will shine more bright upon the occasion of my sin? The free grace of God discovered in the gospel, will be manifested, say some, and magnified in the pardoning of sin; let us therefore sin our fill, that the immeasurableness of divine goodness may appear, and the abundance of pardoning mercy may abound." The apostle rejects this doctrine and practice, of doing evil that good may come, with the greatest abhorrency and utmost detestation, affirming, that their damnation is just, who either fasten this doctrine upon the apostles, or affirm it themselves. Learn hence, That no person must adventure to the least of evils; no, not for the sake of the greatest good. True, Almighty God can bring good out of evil, by the same word of his power, by which he brought light out of darkness, and something out of nothing; but to do readily evil for the sake of obtaining the greatest good, is dangerous and damnable. Sin, or that which is sinful, ought not to be chosen, whatever we chuse. 2. That nothing is more just and righteous than their damnation, who will adventure to do evil that good may come: A good intention will not excuse, never justify a bad action in the sight of God: He will condemn evil doers, though they do evil that good may come. 3. That the apostle pronounces their damnation just, who laid these slanders to the apostle's charge, as if their doctrine did allow of this damnable practice, to do evil that good might come: Their damnation is just, who thus slanderously report and affirm, that we say, Let us do evil, that good may come. Whence note, That it is a just thing with God to damn those men that raise or spread abroad reports of his ministers doctrine, as giving liberty to licentious practices; Verily, the slander of a minister's regular doctrine is more than ordinary slander. The original word here rendered slander, signifies blasphemy; the word which God makes use of, to set forth his own reproaches by. Behold God's resentment of his minister's wrongs! The slander and contempt cast upon our office and doctrine, is esteemed blasphemy in God's account: As we be slanderously reported or blasphemed; and as some affirm that we say, Let us, &c.

9 What then? are we better than they? No, in no wise; for we have before proved both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin;

Here the apostle starts another objection in the name of the Jews: Some of them might say, "Are we not better than the Gentiles? Do we not exceed them in outward privileges? Is not the knowledge of the law found with us, and the oracles of God committed to us?" True, says the apostle, the Jews are better than the Gentiles in respect of outward dispensations, but not in respect of inward qualifications. Jews and Gentiles are alike by natural corruption; alike under sin by actual transgressions; and so stand in need both alike of justification by faith; and the gospel-righteousness is no less necessary for the one, than for the other. To prove what he had said, namely, That the whole race of mankind, both Jew and Gentile, were under sin, and void of all true righteousness and goodness, and consequently standing in need equally of justification by Christ; the apostle produces several texts out of the Old Testament, and particularly out of the xvth Psalm, which speaks fully of the original corruption, and universal depravation of all mankind in the following words:

10 As it is written, There is none righteous, no not one: 11 There is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. 12 They are gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable, there is none that doeth good, no not one. 13 Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they have used deceit; the poison of asps is under their lips: 14 Whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness. 15 Their feet are swift to shed blood. 16 Destruction and misery are in their ways. 17 And the way of peace have they not known. 18 Where is no fear of God before their eyes.

Observe here, How the apostle proves his assertion; namely, That both Jew and Gentile were under the guilt both of original and actual transgression, from the testimony of David, Psalm xiv. where the state of corrupt nature is described, and the natural condition of all men declared till they are either restrained or renewed by the grace of God: There is none righteous, no not one. Which words are true in several respects: 1. There is none originally righteous, no not one; none righteous in their first plantation in the world until they are transplanted into the body of Christ, wrought and fashioned by his Holy Spirit. 2. There is none efficiently righteous; no not one: None have a righteousness of their own making but of God's. The righteousness of justification and sanctification are both from Christ, not from ourselves; we are his workmanship, not our own. 3. There is none meritoriously righteous, no not one; none can deserve or demand any thing as a due debt at God's hand; but the most righteous and holy saints are but unprofitable servants. 4. There is none perfectly and completely righteous, no not one; but inchoatively only: None righteous in a strict and legal sense, but in a gospel and qualified sense only: He that doth righteousness is righteous, in the account of God; and, as such, shall be accepted and rewarded by him. Observe, 2. How the apostle proves the corruption of mankind in general, by an induction of particulars. He surveys him in all the principal faculties of his soul, and members of his body; his understanding, will, and affections; his eye, hand, tongue, and feet, all corrupted and depraved: Their mouth is full of cursing, and bitter speeches; Their throat is an open sepulchre, gaping after, and devouring the good name of their neighbours, and belching out filthy, ill-seemed, and unfavoury words against them. They seek not God in any thing they do, and there is no fear of God, no respect of God

God before their eyes. The apostle shuts up all with this, because want of the fear of God before our eyes, is the fountain from whence all other evils do proceed and flow. The fear of God is the bridle and curb which restrains from sin; where that is wanting, all iniquity abounds; where that is present and prevalent, it keeps the soul close to God, Jer. xxxii. 32. I will put my fear in their hearts, and they shall not depart from me. We usually depart far, yea, run from those we fear; but the true fear of God will make us cleave close unto him, because love is intermixed with it and renders it a delightful fear.

¶ 19. Now we know, that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law: that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God:

Note here, Lest the Jews should think to elude or evade the force of the foregoing testimonies concerning man's corruption and depravation, as not belonging to them, but to the Gentiles only; he tells them, that what the law, that is, the books of the Old Testament, do thus say, it says to those that are under the law: that is, to those that are subjects of it, and obliged by it; to such as are under the instruction and direction of it, as the Jews are known to be; and if so, then every mouth must be stopped; Jew and Gentile both must own themselves, before God, obnoxious to his wrath, without being able to say any thing for themselves. Learn hence, That the holy law of God brings such plain evidence and conviction with it, that no man can have a word to speak against it: When God spreads before men the purity of his laws, and the impiety of their own lives, every man must sit down silent, and lay his hand upon his mouth, not having one word to object why sentence should not be executed, because they have all transgressed.

20. Therefore by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight. For by the law is the knowledge of sin.

Here we have St. Paul's conclusion drawn from all the foregoing premises: "Seeing all mankind, since the fall are disabled, by their innate corruption, and actual transgression to fulfil the law, either natural or written, it must necessarily follow, that by the works of the law can no flesh, that is, no person, neither Jew or Gentile, be justified before God; all the efficacy which the law now has, being to discover sin, and condemn for sinning: By the law is the knowledge of sin. By the law we apprehend our malady, but by the gospel we understand our remedy." Learn hence, That no son of Adam, since the breach of the law, can stand justified before God by his best obedience to the commands of the law: By being justified, understand that gracious act in God, whereby we are acquitted, and finally discharged from the guilt and punishment of all our sins. By the law, and the deeds of the law, we are to understand ceremonial and moral law both, especially the latter; for by the moral law, is the knowledge of sin: It is the moral law that forbids theft, adultery, &c. Besides, it is evident, that the antithesis, or opposition, runs all along, not between ceremonial works, and moral works, but between works in general, and faith: The law of works, and the law of faith are opposed to each other, ver. 27. But why can no flesh, that is, no person, be justified by the deeds of the law. Ans, 1. Because he is flesh, that is, depraved by original corruption, and obnoxious to the curse of the law; by actual transgression. Now, that which condemns, cannot justify: An after obedience to the law can never atone for a former disobedience. 2. Because the best obedience we can perform to the law, is imperfect, Now, he that mixes but one sin with a thousand good works, can never be justified by his works. He that would be justified by his works, must not have one bad work amongst all his good works; for that one will lay him under the curse and condemnatory sentence of law; Gal. iii, 10. Cursed is everyone that continueth not, &c. Nothing that is imperfect can be a ground of a justification before God, because the designs of God is to exalt his justice, as well as his mercy, in the justification of a sinner. Again; 3. No flesh can be justified by the works of the law, because all that we do, or can do, is a due debt which we owe to the law: We owe all possible obedience to the law as creatures; and by performing our obligation as creatures, we can never pay our debts as transgressors. But now, our surety, Christ Jesus, who has given satisfaction for our violation of the law, was under no obligation to the law, but what he voluntarily laid himself under upon our account. And if so, let us eternally bless God with the highest elevation of soul for the gospel-revelation, for his sending his own Son to justify and save us, by working out a compleat and everlasting righteousness: And let us plead with him incessantly for the justifying faith, which is as necessary in its place as the death of Christ. One renders God reconcilable unto poor sinners, the other actually reconciled.

21 But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested; being witnessed by the law and the prophets; 22 Even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe. For there is no difference. 23 For all have sinned; and come short of the glory of God;

Our apostle having proved negatively, that by the works of the law righteousness and justification is not to be had for any person, be he Jew or Gentile: He comes now to prove the affirmative part of his assertion; namely, that God hath manifested another way of justification in the gospel; to wit, by faith in Jesus Christ. "For, said he, now, that is, since the coming of Christ, since the dispensation of the gospel: the righteousness of God, that is, the righteousness which God appoints, approves, and accepts for a sinner's justification: is without the law, that is, without performing the works of the law, either natural ceremonial, or moral: and is manifested to be the righteousness which is by faith in Christ: which all that believe and obey the gospel; shall be admitted to the participation of both Jew and Gentile: for there is no difference; that is, no difference between Jew and Gentile, as the way and means of their justification." And the reason assigned by the apostle, why there is, and can be, no other way of justification.

justification by this, we have in the next verse, namely, because all have sinned, the whole race of mankind, not one mere man excepted: and so will fall short of obtaining the glory of God, and eternal life, if they seek it not in this way. Learn hence, 1. That there is no standing or appearing before God for any creature, in a creature's unrighteousness. There is much unrighteousness in our righteousness, and therefore we cannot stand justified before God. Besides, the wisdom of God has appointed another righteousness, or the righteousness of another, even the righteousness of Jesus Christ, to stand before him in; But now the righteousness of God is manifested, even the righteousness of God which is by faith in Jesus Christ. 2. The necessity and excellency of faith; the righteousness of God is unto all, and upon all that believe: Faith is the bond of union, the instrument of our justification, the spring of our consolation; Being justified by faith we have peace with God, Rom. v. 1. Render we then unto faith the things which are faith's, as well as unto Christ the things which are Christ's. 3. That in reference to, or in respect of our justification before God, there is no difference among believers, verse 22. For there is no difference; that is, no difference as to the way of justification, between Jew and Gentile, male and female, bond and free; but all, without the righteousness of faith in Christ, must die, and be damned to all eternity. There is now a difference amongst believers, with respect to their degrees of sanctification, and with respect to their measures of consolation; and will be hereafter, with respect to their degrees of glorification. Some saints have more grace and comfort on earth, and shall have higher degrees of glory in heaven, than others; but the justification of all believers is alike. There is the same sin to all, not for measure and degree, but in respect of guilt and obligation to punishment. There is the same price paid by way of satisfaction to divine justice, for all; namely, the death of Christ: There is the same righteousness imputed to all, and the Spirit of holiness imparted to all, and the same mansions of glory designed for all; thus there is no difference. And there is no difference amongst believers, in respect of truth of grace, but much in respect of strength of grace; no difference amongst them in respect of God's promises, but much difference with respect to their performances; no difference in respect of God's covenant, but much difference in respect of God's counsels, as also in respect of God's dispensations; no difference in respect of God's acceptance but much in respect of their application; no difference as they are a body, in respect of their head, but much difference as they are members of that head. And if there be no difference among believers (as such) before God, why should there be so much difference amongst themselves, as there is often times here in this world? You are all dear, truly dear to God; why should you not be so, one to another? Why should not one church and one communion hold you now? Ere long, perhaps, one prison may, one heaven shall certainly hold you all. For there is no difference.

his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God: 26 To declare, I say, at this time, his righteousness: that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus.

Note here, 1. A glorious privilege vouchsafed to believers which the scriptures call justification, whereby they are judicially acquitted and discharged from the guilt and punishment of all their sins, and accounted righteous before God. 2. The efficient cause of our justification. It is God, that justifies; Who can forgive the crime, but the person against whom we have done the wrong? 3. The moving or impulsive cause, namely, the free grace of God: Being justified freely by his grace. 4. The meritorious cause, the blood-shedding and death of Christ; through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ. 5. The final cause; to declare his righteousness, not his clemency and mercy only, but his justice and righteousness, especially that attribute which disposes and inclines him to punish sin and sinners. 6. The instrumental cause of justification, faith, Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood, &c. Some of the papists, especial Cajetan, and a Lapide, do call faith causa applicans in our justification: Verily, an unapplied Christ justifies none, saves none. Learn thence, * That in order to a sinner's being saved, he must be justified, that is, discharged of, absolved from, the guilt of all sin, upon the account of a complete satisfaction given to divine justice for sin. 2. That not all and every sinner, but only repenting and believing sinners are justified by God. 3. That when the Lord justifies a believing sinner, he doth it freely; being justified freely by his grace. It is an act of mere grace; there is nothing in the creature can merit or deserve it: then it would be debt and not grace. 4. That God's free grace and Christ's full satisfaction were consistent, and both concurring in the believer's justification we are justified freely by God's grace; yet, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus; Him hath God set forth to be a propitiation. The word propitiation is an allusion to the mercy-seat, which covered the ark wherein the law was; this typified Christ, who fully covers our sins, the transgressions of the law, out of God's sight. When therefore the apostle saith that God hath set forth Christ to be a mercy-seat to us; through faith in his blood; we have reason to believe the blood of Christ, as our sin-offering, doth make an atonement for us, and renders God propitious to us. 5. That Almighty God, in the justification of a believing sinner, is not only gracious and merciful, but just and righteous, in the most exalted degree: To declare his righteousness for the remission of sin. Where note, That the design and end of God in exacting satisfaction from Christ, was to declare his righteousness in the remission of sin; but the apostle would have us take notice that our justification is an act of justice as well as mercy, and that God, as he is a just God, cannot condemn the believer, since Christ has satisfied for his sins. O blessed be God! that pardon of sin is built upon that very attribute, the justice of God, which is so affrighting and dreadful to the offending sinner. This attribute, which seemed to be the main bar against remission, is now become the very ground and reason why God remits. Hence saith St. John, God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins: Faithful with respect to his own promise, and just with respect to his Son's satisfaction. Who then can lay any thing to the charge of God's elect, when justice itself doth justify them? Behold here the sweet harmony of the divine attributes in justifying and pardoning the believer! One attribute is not robbed to pay another; neither is one attribute raised upon the ruin of another; but justice and mercy both triumph. And well might the Justice of God triumph, for never was it thus honoured before, to have such a person as the Son of God stand at its bar, and such a sum as his Son's blood paid down at once, by way of satisfaction, to its due demands. O glorious and all wise contrivance! whereby God made sufficient provision for the reparation of his honour, for the vindication of his holiness, and for the manifestation of his truth and faithfulness, and for the present consolation, and eternal salvation of all repenting and believing sinners, to the end of the world.

24 Being justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ; 25 Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation, through faith in

27 Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? of works? Nay: but by the law of faith.

The apostles having laid down in the foregoing verses, the nature of justification, exactly in the several and respective causes of it, declares in this verse, what is the consequent of this doctrine, namely, the excluding of all self-confidence and in boasting ourselves, or in any work done by ourselves: Where is boasting then? Learn thence, That man is naturally a very proud creature, prone to boast of, and glory in, any excellency, either real or supposed, belonging to himself. 2. That God has taken care to give a check to this insolent pride of man, and to cut off all occasion of boasting from him, 1 Cor. i. 29. That no flesh should glory in his sight. Whilst God intended to give man glory, he took a course to cut off all glorifying from man. 3. That the course which the wisdom of God has taken to hide pride from man's eyes, and to cut off all occasion of boasting from him, is by denying him justification by his own works; and ordaining, that the meritorious cause of justification should not lie in himself, but in another. Grace must have all the glory; not the law of works, but the law of faith justifieth and saveth all believers.

28 Therefore we conclude, that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law. 29 Is he the God of the Jews only? is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also: 30 Seeing it is one God which shall justify the circumcision by faith, and uncircumcision through faith.

Note here, The conclusion drawn by the apostle, from all that he had been discoursing of, in the foregoing chapters: namely, that God's way of justification of a guilty sinner is not by works done by him, but by faith in the Mediator, who hath satisfied the justice of God by him: Therefore we conclude, that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law. Learn thence, That justification from our past sins is by faith alone, without respect to any works of ours, done either before or since conversion. 2. How the apostle doth extend his proposition universally to all sorts of persons, Jews and Gentiles; that is, the whole race of mankind; affirming that God will justify circumcised believers, and uncircumcised believers, one and the same way, even by the way of grace and faith. ver. 30. It is one God which justifieth, &c. Where note, The argument is drawn from the unity or oneness of God, which is not to be understood so much of the unity of his essence and nature, as of his will and pleasure; yet as God is one and the same unchangeable God in his nature, so is he as immutable in his will and purpose. Having therefore determined and declared his way of justifying all sinners to be one and the same to all nations, both Jew and Gentile, even by faith alone in his Son Christ Jesus; no other way is to be expected from that God who is unchangeable in his purpose. Learn thence, That God's ways and method of justifying all sinners, both Jews and Gentiles, great and small, is, and ever will be the same namely, by faith alone, without works. What false notions soever men may entertain in their minds about it, and when the pride of men has arraigned the wisdom of God never so much, the apostle's conclusion will remain like a rock unshaken, ver. 28. Therefore we conclude, that a man.

31 Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid: yea, we establish the law.

Note here, The wise and holy caution which our apostle uses to take away the calumny and reproach cast upon him by the adversaries of the doctrine of free justification by faith; as if this would render the law of God void and altogether useless: Do we then make void the law of God? As if he had said, "There may be those that will say so, but untruly, for we establish the law; because we acknowledge, that without exact obedience and conformity to the law, both in our natures and in our lives, as a rule of living, there can be no salvation." Learn hence, That the doctrine of justification by faith alone, doth not overthrow, but establish the law. Here note, That it is the moral, not ceremonial law, which the apostle speaks of. The ceremonial law is utterly abolished by the gospel, but the moral law is not abolished, but established by the gospel; or if abolished, it is only as covenant, not as a rule. Christ has relaxed the law in point of danger, but not in point of duty; for the law is holy, and just, and good and is not disannulled, but established by the gospel: Because by the gospel we obtain grace, in some measure, to fulfil the law, and yield a sincere obedience to it; which, for the sake of Christ's perfect and spotless obedience, shall find a gracious acceptance with God. Therefore, with the highest elevation of soul let us bless God for Jesus Christ; and for the gospel revelation, which has so fully discovered and clearly revealed to us the only way of justification by faith in the Son of God, who hath loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood. To whom be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

CHAP. IV.

In the close of the foregoing chapter, our apostle laid down a positive conclusion, that a man is justified by faith without the work of the law. In this he undertakes to confirm the truth of that conclusion, by instancing the patriarch Abraham, from whose justification by faith, the apostle infers the justification of all believers with him.

WHAT shall we then say that Abraham our father, as pertaining to the flesh hath found? 2 For if Abraham were justified by works, he hath whereof to glory, but not before God.

As if the apostle had said, "What shall we say? Shall any one affirm, Abraham our father found or obtained righteousness by, or according to the flesh? that is, being circumcised in the flesh, or by any work of righteousness which he had done? Surely no: For if Abraham were justified by circumcision, or any other works of his own, he hath whereof to glory: that is, ground of boasting in these works by which he was thus justified. But manifest it is, that he had not whereof to boast and glory before God; therefore he was not justified by circumcision nor any works of his own." Learn hence, That no righteousness of our own, no services we can perform, are sufficient to procure our justification in the sight of God: For if we are justified by our works, it must be by works either before faith, or after faith. Not before faith; for the corruption of nature, and man's impotent condition thereby, will give check to any such thought. Surely, unrighteousness cannot make us righteous, no more than impurity can make us clean. Nor do works after faith, justify; for then a believer is not justified upon his believing, but by his works after his believing; and faith is not the justifying grace, but only a preparation to those works which justify; which is contrary to the whole strain of the apostle throughout the epistle, who ascribes justification to faith in the blood of Christ without works. In short, no righteousness of man is perfect; therefore no righteousness of man can be justifying: There is nothing that a man doth, but it is defective, and consequently, has matter of condemnation in it: Now, that which is condemning cannot be justifying; that which falls short of the holiness of the law, can never free us from the condemnatory sentence and curse of the law. Now, all works after faith fall short of that perfection which the law requireth. 2. That the design of God was to justify us in such a way as to strip us of our own. Not of works lest any man should boast, says the apostle often. We are justified by faith, to exclude boasting, which would not have been excluded by the law of works.

3 For what faith the scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness.

4 Now to him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt. 5 But to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness.

Observe here, 1. The account which the scripture gives of Abraham's justification; it was by faith alone; He believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness: That is, he firmly believed the promise of God, that he would give him a son in whom all the families of the earth should be blessed. And by means of this faith, he was reckoned or esteemed righteous before God, and not by means of his works. 2. The apostle's argument, to prove that Abraham was justified by faith, and not by works; had he works of perfect holiness, then in strict justice a reward might have been expected by him as a due debt, and not given him in a way of grace and favor. For to him that worketh, that is, with a design and intent to obtain justification by his works, is the reward reckoned not of grace, but of debt; he having performed all that was required, in order to his being righteous before God. But to him that worketh not; that is, worketh not to the intent and end forementioned; viz. to procure justification by working, but seeks that in a way of believing; his faith is counted for righteousness. To him that worketh not, but believeth, &c. We must not understand it absolutely; for he that believeth, worketh: But secundum quid, after a sort, he is said not to work; because he worketh not with a design to stand righteous before God by his works. Again, by him that worketh not, we are not to understand an idle, lazy believer, that takes no care of the duties of obedience, no, an idle faith is an ineffectual faith, and can never be a saving faith: But the meaning is, he worketh not in a law-sense, to the ends and intentions of the first covenant, to make up a righteousness to cover himself by his own working: Being convinced of his utter inability to work out his own righteousness by the law, and seeing all his endeavours to obey the law, fall short of righteousness; he is therefore said in a law-sense not to work, because he doth not work so as to answer the purpose and end of the law, which accepts of nothing short of perfect and complete obedience. And whereas it is here said, That God justifieth the ungodly; the meaning is, such as have been ungodly, not such as continue so. The apostle describes the temper and frame of their hearts and lives before justification, and not after it; as it found them, not as it leaves them. True, God justifies the ungodly, yet such as continue ungodly are not justified by him: We must bring credentials from our sanctification, to bear witness to the truth of our justification.

5 Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works. 7 Saying, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. 8 Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin.

Observe here, That to the example of Abraham, the apostle subjoins the testimony of David, Psal. xxxii. who describeth the blessedness of that man to whom God imputeth righteousness, to wit, the righteousness of the Mediator, without any works brought before God to be justified by, saying, Blessed is the man whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered, and iniquity not imputed. Sin, in respect of the offence, is remitted; in respect of the filth or turpitude of it, is covered; in respect of the punishment, not imputed. This heap of words, serves only to amplify and set forth the abundant grace of God in the act of pardoning sin. Learn hence, 1. That to pardon sin, is God's prerogative; he forgiveth iniquity and covereth transgression. 2. That pardoning of sin is a covering of sin; not such a covering covering of sin, as that God cannot see it in a justified person, to chastise him for it: but so covered, as not to punish him with wrath and condemnation for it. 3. That God's act in pardoning; and covering sin, is extensive and perfect, full and final: Iniquity, transgression, and sin, is forgiven, covered, and not imputed. 4. That transcendent is the blessedness of those whose iniquity is pardoned, and their transgressions covered. Blessedness, faith the original, belong to the man whose iniquity is forgiven, and whose sin is covered, and to whom the Lord will not impute transgression.

9 Cometh his blessedness then upon the circumcision only, or upon the uncircumcision also? For we say that faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness. 10 How was it then reckoned? when he was in circumcision, or in uncircumcision? Not in circumcision, but in uncircumcision.

Here the apostle moves the question, namely, Whether the forementioned blessedness of pardon of sin, and justification by faith, belongs to the circumcised Jews only, or to the uncircumcised Gentiles also? which argument carries with it the force of a strong affirmation, that seeing faith was imputed to Abraham for righteousness, many years before he was circumcised; therefore the uncircumcised Gentiles, as well as the circumcised Jews, shall by faith be made partakers of the same blessedness, unto which Abraham was intitled before he was circumcised. Learn hence, That God has appointed one and the same way and method for the justification and salvation of all persons, circumcised and uncircumcised, Jew and Gentile, honourable and ignoble; namely, justification by faith in the blood of his Son, without which no church privileges or spiritual prerogatives whatsoever, will intitle them to real blessedness. Abraham believed unto righteousness before he was circumcised; therefore, the Gentiles by faith shall be recounted righteous, though they never be circumcised.

11 And he received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised: that he might be the father of all them that believe, though they be not circumcised, that righteousness might be imputed unto them also; 12 And the father of circumcision to them who are not of the circumcision only, but also walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham which he had being yet uncircumcised.

Here the apostle declares the reason why, and the end for which, Abraham was circumcised, seeing he was justified by faith in the promised Messiah, long before circumcision. He tells us, that Abraham received circumcision, as a sign and seal of the covenant made with him, and to his seed, Gen. xvii. and as an obligation that the righteousness of faith was the true way for a sinner to become righteous; which righteousness Abraham had obtained whilst he was uncircumcised, that so he might be the father in a spiritual sense of all believers, both Jews and Gentiles, who imitated him in his faith, and in the holiness and obedience of his life. Note here, 1. The person instituting the sacrament of circumcision: God, and not Abraham: He received circumcision: that is, by the appointment of God he was circumcised, Sacraments must be of divine institution, not of human invention. The church can make no sacraments; her duty is, with care and caution to administer them. There is a fourfold word requisite to a sacrament. A word of institution; a word of command; a word of promise; a word of blessing. The elements are cyphers: It is the institution makes them figures. Divine institution is as necessary to a sacrament, as the royal inscription is to current money. 2. The nature of sacraments in general, and of circumcision in particular. They are signs and seals; He received the sign of circumcision; a seal of the righteousness by faith. The circumcision, 1. Was a sign and token of the covenant which God made with Abraham and the Jews. It was a commemorative sign of God's covenant with Abraham: A representative sign of Abraham's faith and obedience towards God: A demonstrative sign of original sin, and the depravity of human nature: A discriminating and distinguishing sign of the true church and people of God from all the rest of the world: An intimating sign, by which all strangers, that were received into the commonwealth of Israel, were admitted into the Jewish church: And lastly, It was a prefigurative sign of baptism, which, in the Christian church, was to succeed in the room of circumcision. 2. Circumcision was not a sign only, but a seal also; a seal of the righteousness by faith; it was a seal, both on God's part, and on Abraham's also. A seal on God's part, to confirm all the promises made to Abraham and his seed. 3. A seal on his and their parts, to bind them to renounce the service of all other gods, and to oblige them to the observation of the whole law. Note, lastly, The character and description here given of true believers: they are such as walk in the steps of faithful Abraham. They have not only Abraham to their father, but they walk in the footsteps of their fathers faith. As Abraham readily obeyed the call of God, so do they: As Abraham left his idolatrous country and kindred, and though he had opportunity of returning, yet never returned more; so do the faithful sons and daughters of Abraham leave all known sins, and no temptation can prevail with them to return to the delightful practice of them. Did Abraham break through all impediments, difficulties, and discouragements whatsoever? So do and will all those that tread in the faith of their Father Abraham, surmount all difficulties, bid defiance to all dangers that they may yield a cheerful and persevering obedience to the commands of the God of Abraham: Few of the children of Abraham's flesh, but all the children of his faith, do thus walk in the steps of their renowned father.

13 For the promise that he should be the heir of the world was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith.

That is, the great promise which God made to Abraham, and his seed, that they should possess that rich and pleasant part of the world, the land of Canaan, under which also heaven itself was typically promised and comprehended, was not made upon condition of their performing perfect obedience to the law, but they were to obtain it by faith; that is, by trusting to, and depending upon the gracious promise of a faithful God. Note here, The argument couched for justification justification by faith without works, which is the apostle's grand scope, design and drift; it runs thus: "If the promise made to the father of the faithful was accomplished, not by legal obedience, but by the righteousness of faith; then it follows, that all his children are justified by faith, as Abraham their father was. But the promise of the earthly inheritance, and under it, of the heavenly one, was accomplished not by the law, but by the righteousness of Abraham's faith: Therefore, justification is not to be expected by the works of the law, but by faith alone."

14 For if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect.

That is, If they which seek to be justified by the works of the law be heirs of this promised inheritance; then faith that is, the way of justification by faith, prescribed by God, is to no purpose; for to what end should we by faith seek righteousness in another, if by our legal obedience we can find it in ourselves? Here then lies couched another argument, to confirm the apostle's doctrine of justification by faith: Thus, that only justifies, unto which a gracious promise of justification is made; but no such promise is made to any man for his weak and imperfect keeping of the law, but for his believing there is; therefore, by the law there can be no justification, but by faith only.

15 Because the law worketh wrath. For where no law is, there is no transgression.

Here the apostle suggests another reason, why no justification can be expected by the law, because it condemns, rather than justifies. The law worketh wrath: That is, it discovers the wrath of God due to our transgression, and then pronounces condemnation upon the transgressor: for were there no law, either natural or revealed, there would be no transgression, and consequently no condemnation. Here note, 1. The use of the law; it discovers sin, it convinces of sin, it condemns for sin, it denounces the wrath of God due unto sin. And 2. The apostle's argument for the use of the law; he infers an utter impossibility of being justified by the law. That which condemns, cannot justify; but the law of God condemns the sinner for his transgression; therefore, it can never be the instrument and means of his justification.

16 Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace; to the end of the promise might be sure to all the seed, not to that only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham, who is the father of us all.

The apostle here assigns a double cause, why the wisdom of God had appointed justification and salvation to be obtained by the way of faith: namely, 2. That it might be of free and undeserved grace and favour; for to be justified by faith, and by grace, are all one with the apostle. And 2. That the promise might be sure unto all the seed: That is, that God's promise might stand firm and sure to all the believing seed of Abraham, not only to all the children of the flesh, to whom the law was given, but to all the children of his faith, even Gentiles as well as Jews; he being the father of all that believe, whether Jews or Gentiles. Learn hence, That if our justification and salvation did depend upon our performing perfect obedience to the law, it would never be sure, but always uncertain, because of our impotency and weakness to keep and observe it. The apostle, chap. viii. 3. tells us, That the law is weak through the flesh; though the truth is, the law is not weak to us, but we are weak to that; the law has the same authority for commanding that it ever had, but we have not the same ability for obeying. It is our wickedness that is the sole cause of the law's weakness: Had every man the same integrity, the law would have the same ability that ever it had, both to justify and to save us.

17 (As it is written, I have made thee a father of many nations) before him whom he believed, even God, who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were.

Our apostle in this and the following verses, enters upon an high commendation of Abraham's faith, magnifying and extolling the same, for and upon account of sundry excellencies which are found in it. And here, 1. He takes notice how Abraham's faith was strongly acted and exercised on the almighty power of God: He believed in God, who quickeneth the dead, and calleth these things which are not, as though they were: That is, the Lord having promised to make Abraham the father of many nations, when he had no seed, nor was ever likely to have any; he believed the thing to be both credible and possible, because God had spoken it, how improbable soever. And although with respect to generation, he looked upon Sarah's body and his own, as good as dead; for she was barren and past bearing, and he was an hundred years old, and past all hopes of having a child; yet he exercised his faith on the promise and power of God, who quickeneth the dead, that is, his own dead body, and Sarah's barren womb; and calleth these things which be not, that is, the Gentiles, which were not then a people, as if they were. Learn hence. That it is a noble act and exercise of faith, to believe God upon his bare word, and to assent to truth, though never so improbable. As whatever God doth is good, because he doth it: so whatever God doth is true, because he speaks it: And accordingly, faith, which is an assent of the understanding to what God reveals, depends upon the veracity of God, for making good his own word, and fulfilling his own promise. Faith has a threefold excellency; it assents to the truth's of God, though never so improbable; it puts men upon duties, though seemingly unreasonable (witness Abraham's offering up Isaac;) and it enables to sufferings, be they never so afflictive. But from believing plain contradictions and impossibilities, as the church of Rome would have us in the point of transubstantiation: Faith desires there to be excused. Note here, 2. That as Abraham's faith exceedingly honoured God; so God highly honours Abraham's faith, making him like himself, a father of many nations. As God is an universal Father, not of one, but of all nations, so was Abraham; as God is their spiritual Father, not by carnal generation, so was Abraham: God made faithful Abraham like himself, a father, not of this or that nation only, but universally of all believers, among among all nations, believing after his example. Thus Abraham's faith honours God, and God honours Abraham's faith, styling him the Father of the Faithful throughout all generations.

18 Who against hope believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations: according to that which was spoken, So shall thy seed be, 19 And being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old, neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb. 23 He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith giving glory to God; 21 And being fully persuaded that what he had promised, he was able also to perform.

Here St. Paul farther expatiates in the commendation of Abraham's faith, telling us, That against hope he believed in hope; that is, he had a strong hope, a firm hope and trust in the promise and power of God against all natural grounds of hope; namely, that he should certainly have a son, and a seed like the stars of heaven for multitude. He farther adds, That he considered not the deadness of his own body, nor the barrenness of Sarah's womb; neither staggered at the promise through unbelief: That is, he regarded not any difficulties, which lay in the way of his faith, he admitted no doubts or questions touching the promise or power of God; but without any disputing, depended fully upon God for the performance of his own promise, and so gave God the glory of his omnipotency and faithfulness. Note here, 1. What was the ground of Abraham's faith; namely, the special promise, yea, the absolute promise of God, that he should have a son. 2. The height and measure of his faith; He was strong in faith, and staggered not through unbelief; he was fully persuaded of God's all-sufficiency: it is a metaphor, taken from ships that come into the harbour with full sail. Thus was it with Abraham, there was not any sail of his soul but what was filled with the wind of assurance. As a ship with full gale and strong sail is carried to the haven against wind and waves, so Abraham, by the strength of his faith overcame all waves of doubts and difficulties beating upon his mind. 3. What was the fruit and issue, the end and event of Abraham's faith; it brought glory to God: He was strong in faith, giving glory to God. All faith glorifies God truly, but strong faith glorifies him abundantly: It gives him the glory of his power and faithfulness, goodness and truth. Quest. 1. But how could Abraham's body be said to be dead, when he had several children after-ward by Keturah? even six sons, forty years after Sarah's death. Ans. Abraham's and Sarah's bodies received now a blessing, or new generative faculty from God, which rendered them capable of begetting and bearing children, when by nature they were not so. Quest. 2. Was Abraham's faith so strong as to exclude all doubting? Did not he distrust when he said, Shall a child be born to Abraham that is an hundred years old; and Sarah, that is ninety years old, bear? Gen. xxi. Answer, These words are not words of doubting, but inquiring; they proceeded from a desire to be further informed how these things could be. But Abraham laughed, and Sarah also, at the mention of a son? True, they did both laugh, but not alike; Abraham's laughter proceeded from admiration and joy, but Sarah's from defiance and distrust: And accordingly, we find Sarah reprimanded, but not Abraham reprehended, for laughing: Abraham staggered not at the promise through unbelief, but was strong, &c.

22 And therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness. 23 Now it was not written for his sake alone, that it was imputed to him; 24 But for us also, to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe on him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead.

Our apostle having, in the former part of this chapter, declared the manner of our justification, from an instance of Abraham, which having at last pursued, lest we should think that was Abraham's personal privilege, and did not concern us, he applies in the verses before us Abraham's example unto us, assuring us, that as Abraham's faith was imputed to him for righteousness, because he depended upon the almighty power of God in the promise; and also looked by faith to the Messias promise, who was to come of his seed; so, says the apostle this was written for our sakes as well as Abraham's, for our comfort and encouragement, to assure us, that faith shall be imputed to us also for righteousness, if we firmly trust in God, through the merits and mediation of our Lord Jesus Christ. Where observe, The apostle's argument fully overthrows the Socinian doctrine, which teaches, that the godly, under the Old Testament, were not justified in the same way with us under the New; whereas the apostle fully proves that Abraham, and all the children of Abraham, who walk in the steps of him their father, are justified alike; and accordingly, it was not thus written of him for his sake alone, that his faith was imputed to him for righteousness, but for the benefit of us also; to whom the like faith shall be imputed for justification, if we believe in him, that raised up Jesus from the dead. Learn hence, That the doctrine of justification by faith, through the imputed righteousness of a Mediator, is no new doctrine, but as old as Abraham. Some are much offended at this word imputed; but as the pious bishops, Downham and Davenant, on justification, well observe, it is no less than ten times mentioned, either in the term or in the signification of it in this chapter: Their arguments for, and answers to, Bellarmin's objections against the imputed righteousness of the Mediator, runs thus: "If Christ's righteousness be not imputed, it is not accepted; if it be not accepted, it is not performed, and so there will be no redemption by Jesus Christ; without this, we shall make Christ little, very little, in the justifying of sinners: And why is Christ called the Lord our righteousness, and how are we said to be made the righteousness of God in him? And why is faith so infinitely pleasing to God, but because faith brings to God a righteousness which is highly pleasing to him, even that of the Mediator? for there is no standing before God for any creature in a creature righteousness." The popish objections run thus:

Objection, 1. If Christ's righteousness be imputed to us, then may we be reputed redeemers of the world, as well as he was. Ans. It may as well be said, the debtor may be accounted the surety, because the surety's payment is accepted for the debtor. Objection, 2. If Christ's righteousness be imputed to us as our's, then we ought to be accounted as righteous as himself. Ans. It may be as well argued and concluded, that the debtor is as rich a man as the surety, because the surety pays the debtor's debts. Objection, 3. If Christ's righteousness be properly imputed to us, then our unrighteousness was properly imputed to him, and he may be strictly and truly called a sinner. Ans. Just as if we should say, "If the acceptance of the surety's payment acquits the debtor, then the surety is as bad an husband, and as much a bankrupt as the debtor himself." Objection, 4. But if Christ's righteousness be our's no need of any righteousness of our own. Ans. We plead for the meritorious righteousness of Christ to answer the demands of the law, and for a personal righteousness of our own, to answer the commands of the gospel; Let us render to all their due; let us render unto Christ the things which are Christ's, to faith the things which are faith's, and to good works the things which are their's. Let us awfully adore the wisdom of God, who has made Christ unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption. To relieve our ignorance and folly, he is our wisdom; to discharge us from guilt, and free us from condemnation, he is our righteousness; to relieve us against the filth and pollution, the power and dominion of sin, he is our sanctification; and to rescue us from our miserable captivity of Satan, he is our redemption. Blessed be God for the benefit of imputed righteousness to such as live in the practice and power of inherent holiness. True, our sanctification and holiness, when most perfect, cannot justify us before God; but it will evidence our justification before men and be a witness to our own consciences, that we are accepted in the Beloved.

25 Who was delivered for our sins, and raised again for our justification.

In this one verse, we have an abridgment of the whole gospel, the death and resurrection of Christ declared, and the benefit and advantages of both assigned. (1.) for his death: he was delivered for our offences. Here note, 1. The person delivered: He, that is, Christ Jesus the righteous; the Lord our righteousness. 2. The person delivering, not expressed, but necessarily implied and understood. Judas delivered him, the Jews delivered him, God the Father delivered him, and Christ himself delivered himself. All these did one and the same act, but not for one and the same end: Judas delivered him for gain, the Jews for envy, the Father delivered him out of love, and Christ delivered himself in great compassion to a lost world. 3. Unto what he was delivered, namely, Unto death, even the death of the cross. This in God was an act of the highest justice, in Christ an act of wonderful obedience in the Jews an act of the highest wickedness. 4. For whom, and for what he was delivered; for us and for our offences: It notes the vicergerency of his sufferings, not barely for our good as the final cause, and for our sins as the meritorious cause; but for us, in our room, place and stead, dying under an imputation of guilt, and dying as the sacrificed beast for the expiation of that guilt: The original word here for offences, signifies great falls, grievous offences, and heinous crimes. This sacrificed lamb was delivered and died to expiate the guilt of great sins, and to make atonement for the greatest sinners. 5. It is here said, that Christ was delivered, rather than died for our offences, to lead us to the consideration of the first cause of his suffering for us; namely, The determinate council of God, pursuant to which there was a concession or permission given to wicked instruments to shed his blood: his own Father delivering him up to death for our offences. Learn hence, That our sins were not only the occasions, but the moving and impulsive cause of Christ's sufferings. He died as a sacrifice to atone an offended Deity; A the sacrifices of old were brought to the altar, and there slain, so Christ, substituting himself in our room and stead, was brought to the altar of his cross, and there died as a victim or expiatory sacrifice for our sins. Thus, He was delivered for our offences. Observe next, Our Lord's resurrection asserted, He was raised again; and its end assigned, for our justification. Christ as our surety was under the arrest of death; but having given satisfaction by his sufferings, our discharge was published to the world by his resurrection: As by dying in our stead, he bare the curse of the law: so by rising again as a common person, we receive our acquittal from the hand of the Judge. His death was our payment, his resurrection our discharge: He was raised again for our justification. Learn hence, That Christ's resurrection was the cause of our justification; not the meritorious cause, for that was his death and bloodshed; but the declarative and perfect cause of our justification. His resurrection was a declaration of our justification, the justice of God thereby declaring itself satisfied, by his prisoner being released. His resurrection is also the perfective cause of our justification. The work of redemption wrought for us by his death, is perfected, and made effectual by his resurrection. This makes our redemption complete, which otherwise had been partial and imperfect; nay, none at all. It is upon Christ, as raised, that our faith must be settled: Had he not been raised from the dead, faith in his death had had no foundation, for it had been an unaccountable thing to believe in one that lay under the power of death. By Christ's resurrection, the efficacy of his death was declared to all the world: Therefore, says the apostle, chap. viii. Who shall condemn us, when Christ hath died for us? yea, rather is risen again. As our redemption was not in its glory till Christ's resurrection; so neither is our faith in its full strength and vigour, till it eyes him, who was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification.

CHAP. V.

The apostle having in the foregoing chapters, by many arguments demonstrated the necessity of a sinner's justification by faith alone in the Lord Jesus Christ; in this chapter he declares the sweet fruits and benefits, which flow from the foregoing privilege, to all such as are in a justified condition; namely, Peace with God, perseverance perseverance in grace, patience under affliction, hope of glory, joy in tribulation, &c.

THEREFORE, being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ.

The first blessed effect and sweet fruit of our justification by faith, in peace and reconciliation with God. Pardon and peace go together, and accompany each other; a sinner being discharged from guilt, and thereby from his obnoxiousness to God's wrath, is instantly brought into a state of friendship and reconciliation with God; for there is no middle state betwixt his favour and his wrath. Learn hence, 1. That peace is proclaimed in heaven betwixt God and every justified person whatsoever the enmity betwixt God and such a soul being taken away: Peace, I say, is proclaimed in the sinners conscience: A person may be in a state of peace, and yet want the sense of peace. Again, There is a three-fold peace with God: one which is opposite to God's hatred as an enemy; the other opposed to God's paternal anger as a father. Now, the apostle here speaks of the former. Being justified by faith, we have peace with God; that is, God has no more hostile enmity against us, and will not satisfy his justice upon us, by punishing of us; but if we offend him, we shall certainly fall under his frowns and chastisements, and feel the effects of his heavy displeasure as an angry father! With this agrees that of the learned and pious bishop Davenant; Deus absolvit justificatum ab omni pœna satisfactoria, sed non ab omni pœna medicinali & castigatoria. Learn, 2. That our reconciliation with God is settled upon a sure foundation by Jesus Christ: We have peace with God through our Lord Jesus: that is, through him as a Mediator betwixt God and us; he made peace by the blood of his cross; Col. i. 20. that is, by his blood shed upon the cross; his meritorious satisfaction brought us into a state of peace and reconciliation, and his prevailing intercession keeps us in it.

2 By whom also we have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God.

A second benefit which flows from justification by faith is our admission to grace and favour with God: This is a privilege beyond the former; a traitor may be pardoned by his prince, and yet not admitted into the presence of his prince, as Absalom's crime was forgiven, but he must not see his father's face: But by Christ's mediation, every justified person meets with divine acceptance; yea, he is not only brought into a state of grace and favour, but he stands and abides in it. No sufferings from God, no sufferings from man for God's sake, no temptations, no tribulations nor persecutions, can cause God to cast him out of his grace and favour; having access by faith into it, he shall stand and abide in it. True, he may fall under his Father's rod, but he shall never fall from his Father's love; Through Christ we have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand. A third benefit follows, We rejoice in the hope of the glory of God. Here note, 1. The happy union and connexion between grace and glory; grace is glory begun, and glory is grace consummated; grace is glory in the bud, glory is grace in the fruits; grace is the lowest degree of glory, and glory the highest degree of grace. Happy soul, that art partaker of the first-fruits of grace! thou shalt ere long reap the crop of glory! 2. A justified person has the hope of future glory, and always may, and sometimes can, rejoice in the hope: We rejoice in the hope of the glory of God: He hopes for the glory of God, and well he may, for it is purchased for him; it is promised to him, he has it already in the first fruits and earnest of that: It is prepared for him, and he is preparing for that; and he rejoices in the hope of his glory, believing it to be great and glorious, sure and certain, never decaying, everlasting.

3 And not only so, but we glory in tribulations also; knowing that tribulation worketh patience; 4 And patience, experience; and experience, hope: 5 And hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us.

Here the apostle mentions a fourth benefit flowing from justification by faith; and that is, glorying in their present sufferings. He told us before, that justified persons being at peace with God, rejoiced in hopes of future glory; but says he, this is not all, they glory in their present tribulations also. Here note, 1. What sort of sufferings they are which the saints glory in; they are tribulations, that is, such trials and persecution as did befall them for the profession of the gospel: In these a child of God may rejoice, yea, boast and glory, as a soldier doth of his marks, wounds and scars, received in the wars, but not in those sufferings, afflictions and trials which we bring upon ourselves, as punishments for our sins; these we have no more reason to glory in than a corrected child has to glory in his whipping: What glory is it when we are buffeted for our faults? Note 2. To what a height and heroic pitch the spirit of a justified believer may be raised under sufferings for Christ: He may glory in tribulation: It is an high strain of spiritualness in bearing afflictions, when a Christian can say, I love to bear. Though I love not that which I suffer, and that which I bear, yet I love to bear what I suffer. But it is a higher pitch than this, to say with the apostle, I rejoice in my sufferings. Col. i. 24. For joy is a degree beyond love; yet is it a degree higher still, to take pleasure in reproaches and distresses for Christ's sake, 2 Cor. xii. 10. for pleasure is a degree beyond joy; but to glory in tribulations, is beyond them all: it is more than to love, more than to rejoice, more than to take pleasure in them. O the power of faith in Christ, and love unto him, to support and uphold the soul! yea, cause it to glory under thy sharpest sufferings and tribulations for him! 3. That it is not in the tribulations themselves that believers glory, but in the sweet issue, happy fruits, and gracious effects of them; finding that by the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit, tribulation worketh patience; that is, exerciseth and increaseth patience, and patience begetteth and giveth experience of God's gracious presence with us, of his assistance of us, and of his faithfulness towards us, in and under all our afflictions: And experience of these things worketh worketh in us hope of reward. Here note, How one grace generates and begets another; graces have a generation one from another, though they have all but one generation from the Spirit of Christ. Note also, That it is not tribulation in its own nature, but when sanctified by the blessed Spirit, that by a happy gradation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope: For when affliction is not sanctified, but meets with a stubborn spirit, Lord, what dreadful effects doth it produce. Then tribulation excites impatience, impatience causeth perplexity, perplexity despair, and despair confusion. 4. The effect and property of the believer's hope, It maketh not ashamed; his hope will not make him ashamed neither will he ever be ashamed of his hope: Frustrated hopes fill men with confusion and shame: The justified person shall not find his hopes of glory frustrated, but exceeded: and the reason is added, why the Christian hope will not deceive or shame him, namely, Because the love of God is shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Ghost; that is, the Holy Spirit doth, in time of tribulation, testify his love to the hearts of the people, which causes them to glory in tribulation. Learn hence, That in time of affliction, especially of persecution for the sake of Christ, good men have a more sensible feeling of God's love shed abroad in their hearts by the blessed Spirit, both to prepare them for trials, and to support them under them. St. Peter calls this a joy unspeakable; it has the very scent and taste of heaven in it, and there is but a gradual difference betwixt it and the joys of heaven: No sooner doth the Holy Spirit shed forth the love of God into the believer's heart, by clearing up his interest in the promise and his title to eternal glory, but the soul is prepared to rejoice in affliction, yea, to glory in tribulation; and it will be as impossible to hinder it, as it is to hinder a man from satisfaction when he is most delighted and pleased: We glory in tribulation, because the love of God is shed abroad, &c.

6 For when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly.

In this verse the apostle sets forth the efficacy of Christ's love towards us before justification: He had a love towards us when we were sinners, which prevailed with him to die for sinners, When we were yet without strength, Christ died for the ungodly. Note here, 1. Man's condition by nature described, a state of enmity, ungodly, and a state of impotency, without strength. We are without strength, and so wanted help; ungodly, and so refused help. Man is but an impotent and obdurate creature; without power to resist justice, and without affection to desire mercy: So weak, that he trembles at the appearance of a worm; and yet so wicked that he lifts up his head against heaven. The state of unregeneracy is both a state of enmity and a state of impotency. 2. The ways and means found out for our recovery, the death of Christ: when we were yet without strength, Christ died for us. Though he found the whole race of mankind buried in the ruins of their lapsed state, yet he did not leave them so, but died for them. 3. The seasonableness of the means interposed for our recovery: It was in due time, that Christ died; that is, in the fulness of time appointed by God the father, and determined in his decree and purpose. Here we may remark, That Christ came not in the beginning of time, in the infancy and morning of the world, (though it was then promised he should come) nor yet did he stay till the last period and end of time; but came as it were in the middle of time, which is called the fulness of time, Gal. iv. 4. and here due time. Christ came out for our recovery as soon as ever we were fallen, that mankind might be the more sensible of the badness of their condition; Had we been instantly cured as soon as we complained we should neither have apprehended the danger of our disease, nor esteemed the kindness of our Physician: Neither did he stay till the last period and end of time before he came, that the faith and expectation of his church might not be put upon too long and severe an exercise: The patriarchs believed in Christ that was to come; the apostles in Christ then present; and Christians now believe in him who long since did come, and is gone again: So that the apostle might well say here, That in due time Christ died.

7 For scarcely for a righteous man will one die: yet peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die.

Here the apostle amplifies, extols, and magnifies the love of Christ in dying for us, when we were enemies to him; by comparing his love to us, with our love to one another: He intimates to us, that amongst men it is very rare and seldom known that one man will lay down his life to save another's; but if so, it must be for a very extraordinary friend, for a person of uncommon goodness, and of eminent worth: For, says he, scarcely for a righteous man will one die. As if he had said, Such a thing may be, but it is scarcely ever known, that a person will lay down his life for another, though he be very righteous, innocent and truly honest man. Perhaps for a good man, that is, for a very kind and bountiful benefactor: for some person of rare charity and extraordinary goodness; for a man that is a public blessing and common good to the whole community; some person, from a sense of strong obligations, would even dare to die. The scope of the apostle is this, To set forth the transcendency of Christ's love in dying for the ungodly, to shew that it is beyond all human example and that there can be no resemblance, much less any parallel of it: He loved us and gave himself for us. Had he only as an advocate spoken and pleaded for us, his commendation had been admirable, and his love unspeakable. But to die, yea, to die for us, to be not only our Mediator, but Redeemer; not only our Redeemer but our Ransom: Here is love beyond comparison: Blessed Jesus! was ever love like thine?

8 But God commendeth his love towards us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.

Note here, How the scripture distinctly represents the love of God in dying for us: God commendeth his love; declared, expressed, and made manifest his love to us: Christ's death is often represented in scripture, as an instance of the great love of the Father towards us; because his wisdom did contrive this way for our redemption; and he has graciously accepted of his Son's sufferings in our stead. Verily, seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? 25 But if we hope for that we seen not, then do we with patience wait for it.

We are saved by hope, that is, we are at present supported by hope, our present expectation of our future glorious condition beareth up our spirit under its sufferings, and carrieth us joyfully through all difficulties; or, We are saved by hope, that is, all the salvation which we have at present is in hope not in hand, in expectation not in possession; heaven in hope, is more worth than the whole world in hand; and seeing there is a certainty of hope, there is a certainty of salvation: We are saved by hope. Note next, The nature of hope declared: It is an expectation of good things promised, but not enjoyed: vision and fruition put an end to hope, none hopes for that he already enjoys: Hope is conversant about things unseen, as well as faith: Faith is the evidence of things not seen, and hope is the expectation of those things: The object of hope is a future good, a possible good, a promised good, a good promised by God, and believed by us. Lastly, the necessary adjunct, and the inseparable companion of hope, and that is patience, and waiting for the good hoped for: If we hope, &c. then do we with patience wait for it. Learn hence, That they only hope for eternal life aright, who continue in the pursuit of it with patience and perseverance; there must be found with us a waiting patience, a working patience, a bearing and forbearing patience, with a persevering continuance in well-doing, if we hope for glory and immortality, and eternal life.

26 Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities. For we know not what we should pray for as we ought: but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered.

Learn hence, 1. That the holiest and best of saints labour oftentimes under great infirmities in the work and duty of prayer, not knowing what to pray for, or how to manage that important affair as they ought. Hence it was that the apostles themselves, being sensible of their own disability in this kind, made their addresses to Christ himself to teach and instruct them how to pray, Luke xi. 1. Learn 2. That it is the work and office of the Holy Spirit of God to help our infirmities in prayer, or, as the word signifies, to help together with us, to set his shoulder to our's, and lift with us at the same burden; the Spirit of Christ and our own spirit must both do their part in carrying on this work: if we expect the Spirit's assistance, we must exert our own endeavours; more particularly, the Spirit helps us in prayer, by working in us a deep sense of our spiritual wants, by giving us an insight into the promises, and enabling us to plead them at the throne of grace, by creating and stirring up desires in our souls to have our wants supplied, by encouraging and emboldening us to come to God in prayer as to a Father, with an humble reverence and child-like confidence. But though the Holy Spirit be our guide and assistant in this duty, yet not so as to give us occasion to think that the words of prayer are immediately inspired and dictated to us by the Holy Ghost; let us have a care that we mistake not an idle and foolish loquacity, a frothy eloquence, and affected language, outward vehemency and boldness of speech, a natural fervency, or acquired fluency of expression, for the Spirit's help and assistance in prayer. Implore the Spirit's help, and he will help thy infirmities; he will shew thee thy sins, to give thee matter of confession, he will shew thee thy wants, to give thee matter of petition, he will shew thee the mercies and blessings of God, to yield thee matter of thanksgiving, he will shew thee the church's miseries and necessities, to furnish thee with matter of intercession. Thus the Spirit will assist thee, but never expect that he should act without thee. 3. The proper work and office of the Holy Spirit in prayer; it is to make intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered. But how is the Spirit an intercessor? Is not that Christ's office? Ans. Christ is an intercessor for us, the Holy Spirit is an intercessor in us. Christ, in respect of his meritorious sufferings, is an Advocate, Mediator, and intercessor with the Father for us: The Holy Spirit intercedes in us, by enabling us for, and assisting us in, the duty; by quickening our affections, and enlarging our desires; by setting us a-groaning after the Lord. Groaning denotes the strength and ardency of desire, which through the fervency of it puts the soul to pain, and an holy impatience, till it be heard. Lord, how flat and dead are our hearts sometimes in prayer! How much are our spirits straitened! But if we want words, let us not want groans; let thy Spirit help us to groan out a prayer, when we want ability to utter it; for silent groans proceeding from thy Spirit, shall be heard in thine ears, when the loudest cries shall not be heard without it.

27 And he that searcheth the hearts, knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because he maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God.

Note here, 1. the title or attribute given and appropriated unto God, He searcheth, or knoweth the heart. He was the maker of the heart, and is the disposer of the heart, and will judge every man according to his heart, and therefore, he must know the heart thoroughly and perfectly, certainly and infallibly, and it is the joy of an upright person, that God knoweth and searcheth the heart. When the world condemns him for insincerity, he rejoiceth that God knoweth his integrity; and when he has it in the purpose of his heart to do good, but wants power in his hand to accomplish and effect it, this is his consolation. that God accepts it as done, what he did desire and resolve to do, 2 Chron. vi. 8. Note, 2. The action here attributed to the heart-searching God; he knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit: That is, he knoweth the workings of the Holy Spirit, and of our own spirits also, in the duty of prayer. It is a great comfort to the children of God, that the Lord knoweth what kind of spirit is working in their hearts, when they are before him upon their knees. Do we labour under difficulty of utterance in prayer? Are we attended with distractions in prayer? Do we at any time forget and leave out in prayer what we intended to put into it? The Lord knoweth what is the mind of our spirits in that matter. God doth not only hear his people's prayers, but he hears their desires, and grants not only the desires of our lips, but the desires of our hearts, which have not been expressed by our lips. 3. Who the persons are whom the Holy Spirit intercedes for in prayer : They are Saints ; He maketh intercession for the saints ; for them exclusively, and none but them ; for them inclusively, for all and every one of them : The Spirit sanctifies all those in whom and for whom he intercedes ; he is first a Spirit of regeneration, before he is a Spirit of intercession : he first puts gracious dispositions into us, and then stirs up holy desires in us. 4. The qualification necessary to render our prayers acceptable to God, they must be according to God : that is, according to the will and mind of God. And that, 1. In respect of the matter of them, we must pray only for things lawful and warrantable. 2. In regard of the manner of them, we must pray in faith, with fervency, and in the name of Christ. 3. In respect of the end of them, and what we propound to ourselves in them, which is the glory of God : Notwithstanding Christ's mediation, and the Spirit's intercession, we may ask and not receive, if we ask amiss ; that is, for bad ends, that we may consume it upon our lusts.

28 And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose.

That is, " All dispensations of providence whatsoever, whether they be ordinary afflictions, or extraordinary trials, which do befall the children of God in this life, shall certainly be directed by his wisdom, and over-ruled by his power and goodness, for the temporal, spiritual, and eternal good of his children and people." Observe here, 1. What those things are, which are especially intended in that comprehensive term, All things. By all things here we are to understand, Omnia tristitia, non omnia turpia : " All the saints afflictions, not their sins ;" for then then they might rejoice in their sins and wickedness, which is damnable impiety as well in their sufferings for Christ, seeing they may rejoice in that which by God's designation tendeth to their good : But by all things, the apostle means all providential occurrences and dispensations ; all stations and conditions whatsoever, be it prosperity or adversity, health or sickness, liberty or captivity, life or death, God's glory and his children's good : shall shall be certainly furthered and advanced by it. 2. In what sense all things may be said to work for good, to good men ; namely, as they shall promote and further the temporal, spiritual, and eternal welfare of the children of God. If it be good for them to be rich, to be in honour, to be at liberty, they shall be so : If it be better for their souls, and more conducive to their eternal welfare, to be low in the world, to be frequently under the rod, to be harrassed with afflictions, and assaulted with temptations, they shall have them : Nothing that is needful shall be kept from them, only God must be judge what is needful, and when it is needful. He that thinks he can cut better for himself than God can carve for him, makes himself wiser than God, and has not only lost his faith, but his wits too. 3. That all things are said to work together for good ; not singly, separately, and apart, but as coadjutors and adjutant causes, and mutual helps. Afflictions and temptations seem to work against us ; but being put into the rank and order of causes, they work together with other blessed instruments, as the word and prayer, to an happy issue. More particularly, they work together with God, they work together with us, and they work together one with another, for our good, sooner or later. 4. How can all things be said to work for good ; particularly, evil things ? Sufferings from God, and sufferings from man for God's sake ? What ! must we call evil good, pain pleasure, torment ease, and loss gain ? Must we disbelieve our senses, that we may believe the scriptures ? Ans. Though affliction, which is evil in its own nature, cannot bring forth good, yet surely God can bring forth good out of evil, light out of darkness, and make his people's troubles the way to their triumph, and every cross providence, a step to the accomplishment of his promise. God suffers evil things to befall us, to keep out worse things, and causes evil things to prepare us for better things ; the cross makes way for the crown : For affliction there is glory ; for light affliction, a weight of glory ; and for light affliction which is but for a moment, a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. 5. The character of the persons to whom this privilege doth belong : They are described by their Christian affection, they love God, and by their effectual vocation, they are called according to his purpose. They love God, and evidence their love to him, by an high estimation of him, by their delight in him, by their desires after him, by their longings for the full fruition and final enjoyment of him. And as they love God, so are they called of God ; externally by the dispensation of the gospel ; internally, by the operation of his Holy Spirit : They are called out of darkness into light, out of bondage into liberty, and all this efficaciously and powerfully, yet sweetly and freely ; in a way congruous to the will's liberty. 6. The certainty and evidence of this proposition and assertion That all things work together for good. It is not built upon conjecture, or bare probability, but upon certain knowledge ; we know ; partly by divine revelation, God has told us so ; partly by experience we find it so. And when the apostle speaks it out, we know, it is a word of confidence and assurance, it is a word of comfort and encouragement ; all the saints of God to the end of the world, as well as the apostle himself, may depend upon it, live in the faith and assurance of it, and draw all that consolation from it which may render their lives, in some sort, an heaven upon earth. And now, if this be an indubitable and undeniable truth, That whatever sufferings and afflictions a saint meets with shall work together for good ; then we may infer, that a suffering condition is not so bad a condition as the world supposes it. The lion of affliction is not so fierce as he is painted. Times of difficulty and trial bring serious thoughts of God into our minds, who are too prone to forget both him and ourselves in affluence and quiet. Blessed be God, the time of affliction is no unprofitable time, nor uncomfortable time neither : It is a thinking time, an awakening time, a teaching time, a repenting time, a weaning time ; therefore, blessed is the man whom God correcteth and teacheth, 29 For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren. 30 Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called :

called: and whom he called, them he also justified: and whom he justified, them he also glorified.

St. Paul in these verses, lays before us a chain of the causes of salvation inseparably linked together, the first of which was before all time, namely God's foreknowledge of us from all eternity, and his predestinating or appointing of us to eternal life: Whom he did foreknow, he did also predestinate. But what were we predestinated unto? He tells us in the next words, To be conformed in the image of his Son: That is, to be made like unto the Lord Jesus in affection and disposition, in life and conversation, in the temper of our minds, and in the actions of our lives; like unto him in his sufferings, in the cause of his sufferings, righteousness sake and well doing; in the kind of his sufferings, reproach, hatred, outward violence, and death itself; and in the manner of his sufferings, with meekness and patience; and like unto him in his glory; suffering with him, we shall be glorified together. The second privilege we are partakers of, is in time, namely, effectual vocation: Whom he did predestinate, them he also called. They are called out of a state of ignorance and darkness, of sin and wickedness, of slavery and bondage, unto knowledge, grace and holiness; and the Holy Spirit of God, inclines and enables them to obey his call. The third privilege is justification: Whom he called; them he also justified: That is, absolved from guilt, and freed from condemnation; discharging them from their obnoxiousness to wrath, and the severity of divine displeasure. The last privilege we are partakers of, is after time, namely, glorification; Whom he justified, them he also glorified. They are already glorified in Christ their head, they have already the earnest and first fruits of glory, namely, the Holy Spirit dwelling in them, and they shall ere long partake of the same glory which Christ himself is in possession of: John xvii. Father, I will that those whom thou hast given me, may be with me, where I am, &c. But it may be said, that one link is wanting in this golden chain of salvation, namely, sanctification: No mention is here made of that, Ans. Some conceive, that sanctification is couched in effectual vocation; others, that it is included in glorification; for sanctification is gloria incipiens, glorification is gloria consummata; grace is the lowest degree of glory, and glory is the highest degree of grace. Others answer, That the apostle makes no mention here of sanctification, for this reason, because he was setting down here the causes of salvation. Now, sanctification being the way to salvation, but not the cause of it, the apostle mentions not that here though elsewhere he sufficiently shews, that none are now justified, or can be hereafter glorified, that are not here sanctified and renewed. From the whole, learn, 1. That there were certain persons, before all time, chosen of God to possess and inherit eternal life. 2. That God's design in choosing of them, was to render them comfortable to Christ, in his holiness, in his sufferings, and in his glory. 3. That those whom God chose in before time, he calleth; justifieth; and sanctifieth in time, and will finally glorify, when time shall be no more.

31 What shall we then say to these things? If God be for us, who can be against us?

What shall we say to these things? that is, to the fore-named truth and doctrines, to the forementioned privileges and benefits, what comforts doth arise from them? How shall we live up answerable to them? Neither the tongues of men or angels is sufficient to declare the comprehensive fulness of the foregoing favour of vocation and justification here, and glorification in heaven. Such love and goodness are beyond expression; it is as much as if the apostle had thus said, "What boundless love did our God move? No tongue can it express: No angel can this mystery scan, nor tell our happiness." What shall we say to these things? It follows, If God be for us, who can be against us? That is, seeing God is for us, who can, safely and successively be against us? Learn hence, 1. That at all times, but especially in the time of affliction and distress, danger and difficulty, God ever has been, and will be, on his people's side. 2. That those whom God is for, and on whose side he is of, need not fear, either how many or how mighty they be that are against them. God is for his people; that is, he approves and owns them, he assists and helps them, he will succeed and bless them, reward and crown them. Who then can be against them rationally, against them successively, against them safely? How dangerous is it to be against those whom God is for? If God be for us, who can be against us? And if God be against us, who can be for us?

32 He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?

Here we have, 1. A proposition laid down, containing matter of the highest consolation to us; namely, That God spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all. He spared not; that is, he did not spare to give him, or part with him; with Abraham, he did not withhold his Son, his only Son from us. Again: He did not spare him, that is, he did not spare to punish him; he did not abate him one farthing, nor spare him one stroke, which divine justice did or could demand. It is farther added, that God delivered him up for us all. Judas delivered up Christ, Pilate delivered him up, and the Jews also: Judas for money; Pilate for fear, the Jews for envy; but none for these delivered him up for us: But God the Father delivered up his Son, and God the Son delivered up himself, as a prisoner by the sentence of the law is delivered up to execution: and his being delivered up for us, denotes the vicegerency of his sufferings, not only for our good, as the final cause, but for our sins, as the meritorious cause, in our room, place and stead. Learn hence, that the utmost rigour and severity of divine justice was inflicted and executed upon our Lord Jesus Christ in the day of his passion, and that by the pleasure and appointment of God the Father: He spared not: but delivered up his own Son. 2. The comfortable inference and conclusion which the apostle draws from the foregoing proposition: How shall he not with him freely give us all things? Intimating, that the greatest mercies and best of blessings shall not be denied to us, or withheld from us. If Christ's be ours, 1 Cor. ii. 21. all things are yours (that is, all spiritual, temporal, and eternal mercies) and ye are Christ's. Per, 1. No other mercy can be so dear to God as his own Son: He was his soul's delight. If, therefore, he spared not the most excellent mercy, he will not withhold any inferior mercy. 2. There is no other mercy we want, but we are intitled to it by the gift of Christ, and it is conveyed to us with Christ; all things (as to right) are ours, if we be his. 3. If God gave us his Son, when we were his enemies, certainly he will deny us nothing that is good for us, now we are reconciled and made friends. It is our apostle's argument, Rom. v. 9. If, when we were enemies, we were, &c.

33 Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth:

Note here, 1. The apostle's confident and darling challenge: Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? Where observe, The universality of the challenge: It is universal in a double respect: 1. In respect of persons accusing, Who shall? He excepts none in heaven, none in earth, yea, none in hell; neither sin, nor the law, nor Satan, nor conscience, having any thing to lay to their charge, in order to our condemnation. 3. In respect of crimes; he excepts no sort of sins, though never so heinous, so aggravated, and so circumstantiated: Justifying grace is their full discharge. Learn hence, That it is impossible for any charge or accusation to take place against those whom God doth justify, because there is nothing to accuse them of, none to accuse them to, and nobody to frame or make the accusation against them. Well might the apostle say, Who can, who shall, who may, who dare lay any thing to the justified persons charge? Note, 2. The ground and reason of this confident challenge; it is God that justifieth, who shall condemn! Here observe, 1. That there is a very gracious privilege vouchsafed to believers, which the scriptures call justification. 2. That it is God that justifieth the believer's person, and pardons his sins, and none but God; he is the person against whom the offence is committed, and he alone, he it is that absolves us from the guilt contracted. When the justice of God accuses, when the law of God accuses, when our own consciences accuse, when Satan and wicked men accuse, the mercy and goodness, the truth and faithfulness of God will, for the sake of his Son's satisfaction, acquit and discharge us: for it is God that justifieth.

34 Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us.

The apostle here goes on with the triumphant challenge in the foregoing verse begun: Who shall condemn the justified believer? and here note, 1. The holy challenge of faith, it is ready for all comers, and bids defiance to all accusations, If the law implead, faith says, Christ, in the likeness of sinful flesh, has condemned sin in the flesh. If death looks the believer in the face, faith saith, Christ has abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light. If Satan roar, faith can scorn, and tell him to his teeth, he is a conquered enemy; that Christ by his death has destroyed him that had the power of death. Yes, if God himself frown upon the believer, faith can bring to God a righteousness that is highly pleasing to him, with respect to which God may be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus. 2. The ground of this triumphant challenge which faith enables the believer to make, and that is the mediation of Jesus Christ, in the four eminent branches of it, his death, resurrection, exaltation and intercession. Christ died, is risen again, is even at God's right hand, making continual intercession for us. Thence learn, That a believer's triumphs over condemnation, do eminently arise from the several acts of Christ's mediation. Christ died and rose again: our debt is therefore paid, because our surety is discharged; he sits at God's right hand as a testimony of the completeness of his sacrifice and satisfaction for us, and he continually intercedes, that is, presents himself to his father in both his natures, and in our names, as our Surety, our Advocate and Mediator: Who then shall lay any thing to the believer's charge, &c.

35 Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? shall tribulation? or distress? or persecution? or famine? or nakedness? or peril? or sword?

That is, none shall separate, nothing shall separate the believer from the love of Christ; either from the love that Christ bears to him or from that love which he bears unto Christ; no person shall, no condition of life can separate them, neither outward troubles, nor inward distresses, no evils either felt or feared; the apostle despises and despises them all, because neither of them alone, nor all together, can unclasp the arms of divine love, in which believers are safely entangled. Learn hence, That no troubles, tribulations or distresses whatsoever, can dissolve the union betwixt Christ and believers, or ever separate them from his love.

36 (As it is written, For thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter.)

As if the apostle had said. "The saints of old have endured all manner of sufferings, and yet were not separated from the love of God; therefore, the like or worse sufferings shall not be able to separate us now." Here note What may be the lot and portion of believers in this life, and that is, killing for the sake of Christ: For thy sake we are killed all the day long. The words, all the day long, denote the continuance of the persecution, the unweariedness of the enemy, and the patience of the saints. Learn hence, That such as resolve upon the profession of Christianity must prepare for killing, if God requires, and be ready to lay down their lives for their religion, when God calls: For thy sake we are killed; that is, ready to be sacrificed; a readiness of disposition, and a preparation of mind is found with us, to dart with all that is dear unto us, even life itself, for the sake of Christ:

37 Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us.

As if the apostle had said, "We are so far from being separated from Christ, by the afflictions and persecutions which which we undergo, that we are conquerors by our patience, nay, more than conquerors; we do not only bear our trials, but we glory in tribulations; we conquer by our patience, we are more than conquerors by our cheerfulness." But because these words, more than conquerors, look big, and sound great, the apostle instantly subjoins; it is that by Christ's strength, and not by our own, that we overcome and conquer: More than conquerors through him that loved us, which words are a periphrasis of Christ: It is both a proper description of him, and a comprehensive description. When the apostle said, he that loved us, he doth in effect say every thing else: he was born for us, that died for us, that redeemed and saved us; all these were the effects and fruits of his love, and they are all comprehended in this saying, Him that loved us. Lastly, How the believer is said to overcome by the help of his person. More than conquerors through him that loved us. Whence learn, That all a Christian's strength lies in Christ, and not in himself; all his strength for victory over sin, all his strength for victory over suffering, is all received from Christ, as all to be attributed and ascribed to Christ; the strength of every saint, yea, the whole host of saints, lies in the Lord of hosts.

38 For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, 39 Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

Our apostle concludes this excellent chapter with triumphant expressions, as he had begun it; in the first verse he proclaims, that there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus; I am persuaded, &c. Where observe, 1. The proposition positively laid down, nothing shall separate from the love of Christ; his love is like himself, unchangeable and ever lasting; he ever loves the same person, and ever loves him for the same reason; likeness is the ground of love, the attractive and loadstone of it; now the image of Christ, by the Spirit of Christ, is both preserved and increased in the believers soul; this engages the heart of Christ towards Christians in such a manner, that nothing shall separate them from his love. 2. The enumeration and induction of particulars which the apostle makes use of, for confirming this proposition, that nothing can separate the believer from the love of Christ, nor diminish his interest in him: Neither life, nor death, that is, neither the hope of life nor the fear of death: Nor angels, neither good nor bad: not the good angels, for they will not attempt it; nor the bad angels, for they can never effect it: Nor principalities, nor powers; by them understand earthly power, the great and mighty potentates of this world persecuting us for Christ, yet shall never be able to divorce us from him: nor things present, nor things to come; neither the things which we enjoy at present, or endure at present, or may hereafter meet with, be it prosperity or adversity; their present and future condition of life shall be ascribed, whatever comes; come what may come, come what will come, come what can come, nothing shall come amiss unto them: whatever has happened, does happen, or may happen to them in this world, shall not frustrate their hopes of future happiness in the world to come: Nor height, nor depth; that is, neither height of honour, nor depth of ignominy, neither the top of wordly advancement, nor the bottom of wordly debasement, neither the height of spiritual enlargement, nor the depth of spiritual desolations. God can and will keep his saints in an honourable, in a comfortable, yea, in a safe state and condition all at once: Nor any other creature; that is, if there be any other creature not comprehended, or comprised in the foregoing enumeration, whatever it be, it must fall under the rank and denomination of creatures; and no creature either in heaven, or in earth, or in hell, shall separate Christ and us. Learn hence, That it is matter of unutterable consolation, and inexpressible triumph to believers, that nothing, though never so great and powerful, though never so amiable or terrible, shall be able to separate them from the love of their Saviour. Blessed be God, our standing in Christ is not so lubricous and slippery as was in Adam; he might stand or might fall: the believer shall stand, the root bears up the branches: we shall be kept by the mighty power of God, with the concurrence of our own careful and continual endeavours, through faith unto salvation, 3. The full assurance which the apostle had of the stability of a believer's estate, I am persuaded, or I am fully assured: But how so? Not by extraordinary and special revelation, not by rapture into heaven, not by the apparition of an angel to him: But his assurance is built on that which is common to all believers; namely, the same spirit of faith, and the same love of God shed abroad in the hearts of all believers. 4. How the apostle having spoken in his own person in the former verse, saying, I am persuaded, changes the number in the last verse: Nothing shall separate us, not me. Where note, How he associates himself with all true believers in the participation of this privilege: They have all an interest in the same love of God, the same promises of salvation, and have felt the sanctifying work of the same Spirit. It is impossible that God should retract his merciful purpose to believers; he that chose them from eternity, from before all time, and gave his Son to suffer death for them in the fulness of time, will persevere in his purpose; namely, by grace to bring them to glory. He whose grace prevented them when they were in their pollutions, in a state of enmity, yea, in a state of obstinacy, will he leave them after his image is engraven, and re-impacted upon them? He that united them to Christ when they were strangers, will not cast them out of his love, now they are his members: their interest shall preserve them from falling, and present them faultless before the presence of his Father's glory with exceeding joy. God's love unto his children is everlasting, and the covenant that is built upon it, is more firm than the pillars of heaven, and the foundations of the earth: Well might the apostle then say, Nothing shall separate us from the love of God. 5. and lastly, The ground of this love's permanency and duration towards believers: It is the love of God in Christ Jesus that is vouchsafed to us for the sake of Christ Jesus: God looks upon Christ, and loves him, and them in him; he loves all that are members of him, all that are like unto him. O blessed Jesus! it is for thy sake that the Father smiles upon us; we are chosen in thee, justified through thee, sanctified by thee, and shall be eternally glorified with thee: For neither life, nor death, &c. shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. Eternal thanks to Father, Son and Holy Spirit, for the consolation that flows from hence! May so high and glorious a privilege oblige all that are interested in it, to the exercise of universal holiness, remembering, that as the privileges of the gospel are glorious and great, so the duties it requires are exact and strict. If we would enjoy the consolation in the last verse of this chapter (here dilated upon) we must perform the duty in the first verse (there insisted on) namely, to walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit; otherwise the privilege of non-condemnation there, and of no separation from the love of God in Christ Jesus here, will neither belong unto us, or ever be enjoyed and improved by us.

CHAP. IX.

Our apostle, in this and the two next chapters, labours mightily to convince his countrymen the Jews, of their obstinacy against God, in rejecting his counsel concerning their justification by faith in Christ: And that their obstinacy was the certain cause of their rejection, or casting out of the favour of God, and of the calling of the Gentiles; that is, of investing the Gentiles with the privileges of the abdicated Jews.

I Say the truth in Christ, I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost,

Note here, 1. The apostle's solemn asseveration or oath; he calls Christ and the Holy Ghost to witness for the truth of what he says, which is the very formality of an oath. Learn thence, That it is not barely lawful, but in some cases expedient and necessary to assert and confirm by oath the truth and certainty of what we speak; in cases of great moment, which cannot otherwise be sufficiently confirmed a Christian may establish his saying by an oath. 2. The person whom the apostle swears by, Christ and the Holy Ghost; he calls them to be witness of the sincerity of his conscience in what he doth assert: I say the truth in Christ &c. But why doth the apostle swear by the name of Christ, and not rather by the name of God, seeing the Jews did not believe his divinity, and so were not like to give any whit the more credit to what was attested by him? I answer, Probably to assert the Godhead of Christ, which the Jews generally denied, and therefore wanted that honour which was and is due unto it. None but God was to be sworn by; the apostle swearing by Christ, proves him to be truly and really God, as also the Holy Ghost; for an oath being an act of religious worship, and the apostle swearing by Christ and the Holy Ghost, doth thereby acknowledge their divinity, according to the words of Moses in Deut. vi. 43. Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God, and serve him, and shalt swear by his name. 3. As the apostle appeals to Christ and the Holy Ghost, so also to his own conscience, as the avoucher and witness of the truth of what he says, My conscience also bearing me witness. Learn thence, That God has placed a conscience in every man, whose office it is to bear witness of all his words and actions; yea, of all his thoughts and inward affections. Conscience is God's register, to record whatever we think, speak or act; and happy he whose conscience bears witness for him, and doth not testify against him; who can say with the apostle here, My conscience beareth me witness, that I lie not, &c.

2. That I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart.

The original word signifies such sorrow as is found with women in travail; a sorrow continually affecting his heart, and afflicting his spirit, for his countrymen and kinsmen the Jews, upon the account of their obstinate infidelity, obduration of heart, and spirit of slumber which was fallen upon them, which had provoked God to resolve to cast them off, to reject their nation, and to scatter them up and down throughout the world. Behold here, 1. What are the dismal effects and dreadful consequences of obstinate unbelief, under the offers of Christ rendered to persons in and by the dispensation of the gospel, without timely repentance; the issue will be the final rejection, inevitable condemnation, and unutterable. Behold, 2. The true spirit of Christianity: it puts men upon mourning for the sins and calamities of others in a very sensible and affectionate manner. Good men ever have been, and are men of tender and compassionate dispositions; a stoical apathy, an indolency of heart, or want of natural affection, is so far from being a virtue, or matter of just commendation unto any man, that the deepest sorrow and heaviness of soul, in some cases, well becomes persons of the greatest piety and wisdom. 3. That great sorrow and continual heaviness of heart for the miseries of others, whether imminent or incumbent, but especially for the sins of others, is an undoubted argument; sign and evidence of a strong and vehement love towards them. The apostle's great heaviness and continual sorrow for the Jews, his brethren, was a great instance and evidence of his unfeigned love and affection to them.

3 For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren my kinsmen according to the flesh:

That is, "So great is my concern for the salvation of my brethren the Jews, that I could undergo the greatest misery and evil that can befall myself, to prevent their destruction." This wish of St. Paul is plainly an hyperbolical expression of his great affection to his countrymen the Jews, and his zeal for their salvation, which was so intense and vehement, that were it a thing reasonable and lawful, were it proper, and could avail to the procuring their salvation, he could have wished the greatest evil to himself; for their sakes, not only to be excommunicated from communion with the church of Christ, but to be separated from Christ himself. If it be said, that such a wish is sinful and unnatural, to desire the salvation of others without our own damnation; I answer, True: And therefore the apostle's words are not an absolute and positive wish:

He doth not say, I wish; but, I could wish: Just as we are wont to say, when we would express a thing to the height, which is not fit nor intended to be done by us: "I could wish so or so: I could even be content to do this or that." Which kind of expressions no man takes for a strict and precise declaration of our minds, but for a figurative expression of a very great and vehement passion. Thus here the apostle says not, I wish, but I could even wish. Were it proper to make such a wish, I could even wish so great a blessing to my brethren, though with the loss of my own happiness. Hence learn, 1. That it is neither lawful nor reasonable for any man to renounce his own eternal salvation, and to be willing to be damned upon any account whatsoever, be it for the good of brethren, or for the glory of God himself. The very thought of such a thing is enough to make human nature tremble at its very foundation; for the desire of our own happiness is the deepest principle that God has planted in our natures: And to pretend a reason from the glory of God, is impossible: because our damnation cannot make for the glory of God, unless by our own impenitency and wilful obstinacy, we have deserved damnation. 2. That such may be the ardency of a saint's affection towards others, and so fervent his desires for their conversion and salvation, that he may be willing to sacrifice himself, and all that is dear unto him in this world, for the accomplishing of that end: I could wish I were accursed from Christ for my brethren, &c.

2 Who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; 5 Whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen.

Our apostle, to vindicate himself for bearing such a passionate affection to the Jews, and for being so slightly concerned for their eternal welfare, doth here recount and sum up the high privileges and prerogatives belonging to the Jews above any nation under heaven: namely these, they were Israelites, that is, the seed and posterity of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob: To whom pertaineth the adoption; that is, national adoption, not personal; God adopting the nation of the Jews to be an holy people to himself, and calling them his sons and his first-born: And the glory; that is, the glorious presence of God among them, the temple, the ark, but particularly the Shechinah, or divine presence from between the cherubims: And the covenants; that is, the covenant made with Abraham and Moses, the old and new covenant, Jer. xxxi. 32. And the giving of the law; it was the prerogative of his people, that all their laws, ceremonial, judicial, and moral, were composed and delivered to them by God himself: And the service of God; that is, they only had the true worship of God amongst them, and no other nation could have the like, but by being a debtor to them for it: And the promises; that is, in general, all the blessings promised to them in the land of Canaan; and in particular, the promise of the Messiah, or God's gracious purpose and intention to send his Son into the world, to accomplish its redemption: Whose are the fathers; that is, the beloved fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were the ancestors, and they their offspring: Of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came; that is, of which Israelites Christ came; the promised Messiah according to the flesh or human nature, was their offspring, even he, who, according to his divine nature, was over all, God blessed for evermore. Note here, 1. How the apostle reserves the greatest privilege for the last: Christ's being born one of their nation, and according to the flesh, descended from the Jewish stock, this was the topping privilege. 2. That this restrictive clause, according to the flesh, plainly supposeth another nature in Christ, according to which he came not from the Israelites, which can be no other but the divine nature or Godhead, which, in the following words, is attributed to him: Who is over all, God blessed for evermore. Which glorious title given to Christ, as it highly exalts the prerogatives of the Jews, as being a people of whom so blessed and great a person descended; so, on the other hand, it aggravates their sin and condemnation, rejecting a person of such infinite worth and dignity, notwithstanding he descended from them. Now from the whole, learn, 1. That a fulness or richness of instituted means for grace, for the true knowledge and worship of God, is matter of high indignation and gracious condescension from God to man: Here the glory, the covenants, the service of God, &c. are numbered amongst the great and gracious respects vouchsafed by God to the Jews. 2. That the highest privileges and vouchsafements from God may be conferred upon a people who are neither pleasing to God, nor accepted with him: Such were the Jews, to whom the forementioned privileges did belong, a people rejected by God for their obduracy and unbelief. 3. That it is no small honour to be of the race or kindred of such as have been holy saints and faithful servants of the most high and holy God: The Jews here were very honourable, as they were the seed of Abraham; but much more so, had they trod in the steps, and done the works, of their father Abraham. 4. That Jesus Christ, who was the seed of Abraham according to the flesh, was yet, according to his divine nature, Lord over all, God blessed for evermore: He is over all, that is, over all things, and over all persons; and he is blessed for evermore, which is the constant title given to him that is God, and to none but him. The Socinians, to avoid the force of this text, which fully proves the divinity of Christ, turn the words into a thanksgiving for Christ, and read them thus: Of whom Christ was, according to the flesh: God, who is over all, be blessed for ever. A manifest perversion of the sense of the apostle's words, which was to shew, that according to the flesh he descended from Abraham; but that he had another nature, which was not derived from Abraham, even a divine nature, according to which he was over all, God blessed for evermore.

6 Not as though the word of God hath taken none effect. For they are not all Israel which are of Israel: 7 Neither because they are the seed of Abraham are they all children: but in Isaac shall thy seed be called. 8 That is, They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God: but the children of the promise are counted for the seed. 9 For this is the word of promise.

At this time will I come, and Sarah shall have a son.

Here the apostle answers to an objection against the rejection of the Jews: "If they be cast off by God, what will become of the promise of God made to Abraham? saying, I will be thy God, and the God of thy seed." He answers, by distinguishing a twofold seed that Abraham had: Some were only his carnal seed, or the children of his flesh; others were his spiritual seed or the children of his faith. Now the carnal seed of Abraham, born according to the course of nature, were not the children of God, to whom the promise was made, but the children represented by Isaac, born by the supernatural power of the Spirit of God; these are to be accounted the true seed of Abraham, mentioned in the covenant, when God says, I will be thy God, and the God of thy seed. So that the force of the apostle's argument lies thus: The rejection of such Jews, or such of Abraham's seed only who were so according to the flesh cannot make the word and promise of God to Abraham and his seed of no effect, because he made no absolute promise to them as such. But, says the apostle, none of those Jews, whose rejection I speak of, have any such promise made to them; therefore the rejection of some of Abraham's natural seed doth not make void the word and promise of God. Learn hence, 1. That the promises of God to his children and people, are firm and stable; they shall not be made void, but be accomplished and made good to those that have a title to them, and interest in them, and fulfil the conditions of them: Not as though the word or promise of God has taken no effect: All are not Israel that are of Israel. Learn hence, 2. That as all were not true Israelites of old that did bear the name of Israelites; so all are not true Christians at this day, who take upon them the name of Christ, and bear the name of Christians. 3. That men are very prone to bear up themselves upon the piety of their ancestors, though strangers in practice, to their piety; as the Jews boasted they were the seed of Abraham, but did not the works of Abraham; whereas men are so far from being God's children, because they had godly parents, that Christ told the Jews, who came forth out of Abraham's loins, that they were of their father the devil. John vii. 44.

10 And not only this; but when Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac: 11 (For the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election, might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth,) 12 It was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger. 13 As it is written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated.

Our apostle having in the foregoing verses proved, from what was done in Abraham's family, that it was the purpose and pleasure of God to account only those for Abraham's seed who were the children of his faith, and to reject the rest for their unbelief; in these verses he prosecutes the same argument, by insisting upon another special dispensation of God in the family of Isaac, whose wife Rebecca had twins, namely, Jacob and Esau, and had neither of them any thing in them to move God to love the one, and dislike the other: Yet a preference was given to the one before the other: So that the apostle's argument runs thus "As Jacob and Esau, were begotten of the same father, born of the same mother lay together in the same mother and had neither of them done any thing at all to oblige or disoblige Almighty God; yet he was pleased to make a difference between them and their posterity after them, giving the beloved Canaan to Jacob and his seed, which by birth-right belonged to Esau and his offspring: So in like manner is it the will and pleasure of God, that the believing Gentiles should become heirs of the promise by faith in Christ, and that the unbelieving Jews should be rejected and cast off for their infidelity." Learn hence, 1. That Almighty God chuses persons to the participation of divine favours. 2. That the choice which God makes of men to the enjoyment of that special favour of being his peculiar people, is not according to their external privileges or works, but according to his own free pleasure. 3. That as Jacob's and Esau's being unborn, and having done neither good nor evil, is used as an argument to prove, that the choice of the one before the other could not be, of works; so it is a strong argument against the pre-existence of souls, and their being sent unto bodies by way of punishment for former sins: For upon that supposition, it could not be true, that the children had done neither good nor evil before they were born, seeing they might both have sinned, in that state of pre-existence. Learn 4. and observe, That the apostle doth not say, That before the children had done either good or evil, God said, Jacob have I loved, and Esau hated, but only, the elder shall serve the younger. Hatred here may be taken two ways, either, 1. For a less degree of love, God preferring the seed of Jacob before the posterity of Esau, giving the former the good land of Canaan, to the latter the barren mountains of Seir. Or, 2. If hatred be taken in the strictest sense, then God is said to hate Esau, that is, the Edomites, after their wicked and unnatural behaviour toward their brethren the Israelites: And upon that occasion, see Obadiah, ver. 10. For thy violence against thy brother Jacob shame shall cover thee, and thou shalt be cut off forever. Nothing renders a person the object of God's hatred but sin; he doth not hate the devil himself as he is his creature, but only as he is a sinner. God adjudges none to eternal perdition, but with respect to sin. Observe, 5. That Jacob and Esau are not here to be considered personally, but collectively; for the Israelites that descended from Jacob, and for the Edomites which sprang from Esau: for Esau in his own person did not serve Jacob, but the Edomites did serve the Israelites. Thus the elder did serve the younger. Again, it appears that Job and all his friends were of the posterity of Esau: God did not then hate the person, or all the posterity of Esau, but only those of them who by their violence and wickedness rendered themselves the object of his hatred.

14 What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid. 15 For he saith to Moses, I have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion.

The apostle having by the two foregoing instances asserted his doctrine, concerning the purpose and decree of God to justify those that should believe on his Son, be they Gentiles or Jews; and consequently made it good, that no word or promise of God falls to the ground by the rejection of the unbelieving Jews; proceeds in this verse to demonstrate the righteousness of God in the execution of this his purpose. Is there then, says he, unrighteousness or injustice with God? God forbid. As if the apostle had said, "Is there any cause to say, that God, who preferred the posterity of Isaac before that of Ishmael; and the seed of Jacob before the numerous offspring of Esau; is there any just reason to say, that God is now unjust in calling the Gentiles, and upon their faith owning them for his people, the spiritual seed of Abraham, and rejecting the Jews because of their unbelief? God forbid that we should accuse him of unrighteous dealing upon this account." Learn hence, That God is just, infallibly and inflexibly just and righteous in all his dealings with, and dispensation towards the children of men: Is their unrighteousness with God? That is, there is none, there can be none. 2. That all such tenets or doctrines which reflect any manner of unrighteousness upon God, or charge him with hard dealing ought to be disclaimed with the utmost abhorrency and detestation: Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid. Note next, How the apostle proves that there is no unrighteousness in this dispensation of God, in rejecting the Jews, and calling the Gentiles, because he had said to Moses, he would shew mercy, where, when, and to whom, or to what people he pleased. If, therefore, upon the infidelity of the Jews, he will call the idolatrous Gentiles, and receive them to be his people, who can accuse him of any injustice upon that account? shall not Almighty God dispense his favours where, and upon whom he pleases? May he not confer his kindness upon some, which he owes to none? Learn hence, That God is absolutely and ultimately resolved to follow the counsel of his own will, in and about the justification of sinners; and whatsoever he doth, or resolves to do, his will being the rule of righteousness, is for that reason exactly just, and undeniably righteous.

16 So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy.

As if the apostle had said, "The foregoing instances abundantly shew, that it is not of him that willeth; for Abraham willed that Ishmael might live to be partaker of the blessing promised to his seed, when he said, Gen. xvii. 18. O that Ishmael might live before thee! Nor is it of him that runneth: For when Esau ran to fetch venison for his father, that he might receive the blessing, Gen. xxi. the wisdom of God saw fit to have it otherwise, and to confer the blessing upon Jacob; but it is of God that sheweth mercy, that any one is chosen to be the seed to which the promise made to Abraham belongs, and so to be his church and people." Learn hence, That it is of God's mere grace and mercy, that any sinners are called and admitted to the privilege of justification and adoption, upon any terms and conditions whatsoever. The reason why the sinful and unworthy Gentiles were called to be a people, who were not a people, while the Jews were left out, and cast off, for their unbelief, was not because the Gentiles were either more worthy or more willing, but from God's discriminating grace and mercy: it is not of him that willeth, but of God that sheweth mercy.

17 For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth.

Our apostle here proceeds to remove another objection, namely, the seeming injustice or severity of rejecting the Jews, and reserving them to wrath, giving them up to an obdurate heart, because they would not accept of the way which the wisdom of God had appointed for their justification; namely, faith in his Son Jesus Christ. This he clears by another instance; to wit, that of Pharaoh, who had so often hardened his own heart obstinately, and provoked God at last to harden him judicially. For this cause, says God, have I raised thee up: In the original it is, I have made thee to stand: that is, "I have sustained thee, and kept thee alive, when thou deservedst, and mightest justly have expected to be cut off by the several plagues inflicted on thee for thy obstinate hardness of heart, That I might shew my power in thee, &c." Or, I have patiently born thy stubbornness for a long time, that my power and justice might more illustriously appear at last in that conspicuous judgment, which I will execute upon thee in the sight of all the nations of the earth." Learn hence, That some sinners, whom the patience of God has long waited upon, are preserved of him, and raised out of great and imminent dangers by him, for this end; namely, to make them examples of his just indignation against stubborn and obdurate rebels, and that in the most illustrious and signal manner. For this cause have I raised thee up, that my name might be declared throughout all the earth.

18 Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth.

As if he had said, "From these scripture-instances, we may gather and conclude, that God, may, without the least injustice, magnify his mercy, in sparing and pardoning some sinners, and render his justice glorious in punishing others; yea, in punishing sin with sin, hardening them judicially, who had hardened themselves obstinately." Here note, That God did not harden Pharaoh's heart by any positive act or influx upon it, by infusing any evil into it, for this would make God the author of sin; but he was hardened by way of judicatory tradition, after he had long hardened himself. First he was delivered up into the hand of Satan, who deluded him by the magicians counterfeiting the same miracle that Moses wrought, and this hardened him against the belief of any thing that Moses either did or said. Secondly, He was delivered up to his own lusts, particularly, idolatry, ambition, and covetousness, and these hardened Pharaoh's heart. As an idolater, he was loath to receive a message from the God of Israel, when he had not: Who is the Lord, says he, that I should obey him? I know not the Lord. As an ambitious prince, it went to his very heart, to hear so mean a man as Moses control him in his own dominions, saying, Let the people go, that they may serve the Lord. This enraged him, to hear of any Lord over that people but himself; and as a covetous man he was loath to hear of parting with a people, by whose pains, in making brick, he had so great an income. Thus Pharaoh's affected hardness, was followed with inflicted hardness. Learn hence, That God doth justly deliver that man up to hardness of heart, by way of punishment, who has often hardened his own heart against God by repeated acts of sin.

Iuste toties cor ejus obduratur in peccatum, Quoties ipse cor suum obduravit in culpam, Lightfoot.

19 Thou wilt then say unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will? 20 Nay but O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say unto him that formed it Why hast thou made me thus? 21 Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another to dishonour?

Here the apostle brings in the unbelieving and rejected Jews making an objection against God: "If the case be thus, that God doth sometimes, and that justly, leave obdurate sinners to harden themselves, why is he offended at it, and complains of it? If God hardeneth us because he will, why doth he find fault with us for our hardness of heart? For who hath at any time resisted his will? How is it in our power to avoid being hardened, if it be his will that we should be hardened?" Learn hence, That guilty sinners are full of hard thoughts of God, and very prone to think the divine dispensations unreasonable, if not unrighteous; but upon false and mistaken grounds: Why doth he find fault? Who hath resisted his will? To this objection the apostle returns a very smart answer, saying, Who art thou, O man, that repliest against God? Shall, &c. In which answer, note, 1. A vehement objection or reproof 2. A substantial vindication of the righteousness and wisdom of God in his proceedings with men. Observe, 1. The objection or reproof drawn up in an interrogative form, which argues great intensement of mind in the person speaking; Nay, but O man, who art thou? As if the apostle had said, "What bold and unheard of presumption is this, that man, blind and ignorant man, guilty, sinful man, obnoxious to wrath and eternal death, that he should undertake to reprove and censure, to judge and condemn the actions and dispensations of the most high and most holy God as if they were crooked and perverse, defective either in justice or wisdom!" Learn hence, That it is no less than horrid and horrible presumption, for so weak, sinful and worthless a creature as man is, to contest and dispute with the most high God about the wisdom or righteousness of any of his ways: O man, who art thou that repliest against God. 2. How the apostle vindicates the wisdom and righteousness of God in his proceedings with men in general, and against the Jews in particular; shewing, That there is no more cause to make this objection against God for rejecting the unbelieving Jews, and shewing favour to the believing Gentiles, than for the pitcher to contend with him that formed it, why he made it of such a shape, and not of another figure; or for the clay when it is marred and broken, to complain of the potter, for making of one part of it a vessel unto honour, and the other unto dishonour. Learn hence, That men, who have made themselves obnoxious to the justice of God, by a long continual course in sin and disobedience against God, (as the unbelieving Jews here spoken of evidently did) have no cause to complain, neither of God's severe proceedings against themselves, or of his favourable dispensations towards others. What just cause had the Jews, rejected for their own unbelief and hardness of heart to murmur against God for shewing mercy to the Gentiles, who submitted to the terms of mercy?

22 What if God, willing to shew his wrath and to make his power known, endured with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction; 23 And that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had afore prepared unto glory? 24 Even us whom he hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles.

As if the apostle had said, "What though God doth not presently punish the obstinate and unbelieving Jews according to their desert, but beareth with them, and exercises forbearance towards them, and they go on, by their continual rebellions, to make themselves fit objects of his wrath; but he is pleased still, with great gentleness and patience to bear with them, as he did with Pharaoh, and if, after all, they be more hardened, as he was, by God's forbearance, what shew of injustice, I pray, is it, if he punishes them at last with greater severity, as God did him if he swallow up their nation, destroy their temple, ruin their city, what injustice is it to destroy those, who, by making themselves objects of God's wrath, are fitted for destruction?" Here note, That the vessels of wrath fitted for destruction, are such as the apostle saith, God endured with much long suffering; and therefore, they were not made vessels of wrath by God, but by themselves; after they had filled up the measure of their sins, and thereby fitted themselves as vessels for destruction. God endured them with much long-suffering, though judgment at last took hold upon them to the uttermost. Learn hence, That Almighty God may, without the least suspicion of injustice or unrighteousness, punish, with the utmost severity, such a person or a people, whom he hath long endured, with much forbearance, to go on in a course of sinning, if at last they repent not. This was the manner of God's dealing with the Jews here. His lenity towards the Gentiles is next expressed, ver. 22. That he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, &c. As if the apostle had said, "Can God be taxed with unrighteousness, in shewing the riches of his glorious grace and mercy towards the despised Gentiles, whom he hath called to the faith of Christ, and thereby fitted and prepared them to be vessels of mercy? Hath he not a just right to shew his mercy to such persons who have submitted to the terms upon which he hath promised favour and acceptance, and to own them as his peculiar people, although they be not the natural seed of Abraham, seeing they are his spiritual?"

Note here, That as the unbelieving Jews were called in the former verse, Vessels of wrath; so the believing Gentiles are called in this verse, Vessels of mercy; because, as vessels are fitted and formed by the hand of the artificer, for the use for which they are designed, in like manner, are believers wrought by God, and framed by his Holy Spirit, and made meet to receive the mercy of God; that is, the fruits and effects of his mercy, especially, pardon of sin, and peace with God. Concerning the vessels of wrath, the apostle speaks passively, they are fitted for destruction: Concerning the vessels of mercy, he speaks actively, that God has prepared them unto glory; that is, made them meet and fit by grace here, for glory hereafter. Learn thence, That the new creation of the saints, and all the spiritual workmanship that is found upon them, is to be ascribed unto God, and to the effectual working of his grace: He hath afore prepared them unto glory. 2. That the fullest measures of glory hereafter, shall be the portion of such, and only such, as are first prepared by grace and holiness to receive them here. 3. That only those are vessels of mercy, prepared by God unto glory, who upon the evangelical call, have been prevailed with, by faith and repentance, to answer the call and command of God: That he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he hath afore prepared unto glory, even us whom he hath called.

25 As he saith also in Osee, I will call them my people, which were not my people; and her, Beloved, which was not beloved. 26 And it shall come to pass, that in the place were it was said unto them, Ye are not my people; there shall they be called, The children of the living God.

Our apostle having hitherto vindicated the wisdom and righteousness of God, in the rejection of the Jews, and calling of the Gentiles; lest the Jews should stumble and take offence at it, in these, and in the following verses, he proves that the calling of the Gentiles was long before foretold, both by the prophet Hosea, and the prophet Isaiah: By the prophet Hosea, chap. ii. 22. I will call them my people, which were not my people, it shall be said, Ye are the sons of the living God. Which expressions signify and import, God's receiving the Gentiles into the church, as an act of free and undeserved mercy, whom the Jews looked upon as cast-aways, as strangers, as dogs; accounting themselves only to be of his family and household. Next, he produces the testimony of Isaiah.

27 Esaias also crieth concerning Israel, Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, a remnant shall be saved. 28 For he will finish the work and cut it short in righteousness: because a short work will the Lord make upon the earth. 29 And as Esaias said before, Except the Lord of Sabaoth had left us a seed, we had been as Sodom, and been made like unto Gomorrah.

Here the apostle shews how the reduction of the obdurate

Jews was foretold by Isaiah, as well as Hosea: That although the number of the Jews, according to the flesh, were as the sand of the sea, yet the greatest number of them would be passed by for their unbelief, and a remnant only saved. Thus the prophet speaks of those Jews who escaped the hand of Sennacherib; and the apostle makes the deliverance of those few, a type of them that should believe in Christ, and be saved by him. And the prophet farther adds, That God would finish his work and cut it short in righteousness; that is, God will make quick work with that incorrigible and unreclaimable people; such swift destruction shall come upon the multitude of evil doers in the land of Israel, as shall bring them very low, cut them short, lop them off; so that they shall be left as a tree, of which only the stump remaineth. They shall be reduced to a small remnant, and a remnant only of that remnant shall be converted. Now, first, From the liberal import of those words, Though Israel be as the sand of the sea, a remnant only shall be saved, we learn, That a numerous people or nation, among whom God hath been truly worshipped, and this for a long season, may, notwithstanding, for their wickedness be destroyed and reduced by God to a very small number. Secondly, From the typical import of these words, together with the apostle's scope in citing them, we gather, that amongst those multitudes who are called by the gospel to believe on our Lord Jesus Christ, and who make profession of his name and truth, the number of those who will be at last eternally saved, will be but comparatively small and little; A remnant shall be saved.

30 What shall we then say? That the Gentiles, which followed not after righteousness, have attained to righteousness; even the righteousness which is of faith: 31 But Israel; which followed after the law of righteousness, hath not attained to the law of righteousness. 32 Wherefore? Because they sought it not by faith, but as it were by the works of the law. For they stumbled as that stumbling-stone;

As if the apostle had said, "Lord, what shall we say to this great mystery of grace, the calling of the Gentile world, and the cutting off and casting away most of the present Jewish nation! That the Gentiles who lived in ignorance and blindness, in sin, and unrighteousness, should attain to righteousness by faith in Christ; and that the Israelites, who had God's own righteous law amongst them, and trusted to be justified by the observation of it, yet should they not attain to that righteousness which God accepteth. And wherefore have they not attained it? But because they sought not justification by that faith which God prescribeth for that end, namely, faith in the Mediator; but thought it must be attained by the works of the law, keeping all the ceremonial precepts, by which no flesh can be justified: and the reason they have sought it not by faith was this, They stumbled at the stumbling-stone; that is, at the Lord Jesus Christ, taking offence at his poverty and mean condition in the world, and at the spirituality of this kingdom." Learn hence, That the great humiliation of Christ in the days of his flesh, did prove a snare and occasion to many persons to despise and reject him, to stumble at him, and fall foul upon him.

him. But in what respects is Christ called a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence? Ans. Negatively: not because he was by God designed, either intentionally or accidentally, to be such. All stumbling and offence taken at Christ are accidental, proceeding from the depravity of man, not from the design of God. Much less were the Jews fore-appointed and ordained by God to stumble at his Sin, for God appoints no man to do that which he prohibits all men from doing. And as no man is necessitated by the decree of God, so neither is he constrained or necessitated by Satan, by his corruption, or any other instrument, to stumble or take offence at Christ; for actions necessitated upon men are neither demeritorious nor punishable. But positively Christ is called a stone of stumbling, because men willingly ignorant and wilfully perverse do take offence at him. Though God never designed or desired any man's stumbling at Christ, yet he knew and foreknew, that many, very many, would stumble at him; and accordingly expressed him by a prophetic character, answering the event, and predicting that which in time came to pass: Behold, in Zion I lay a stumbling stone.

33 As it is written, Behold, I lay in Sion a stumbling-stone and a rock of offence: and whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed.

Note here, 1. What use and office our Lord Jesus Christ is of to his church: He is a stone, a corner stone, the chief corner stone: a corner stone for strength, the chief corner stone for ornament and beauty: as the corner stone bears the weight of the building, so doth Christ bear the weight of his church, and supports all the pillars and supporters of it: yet this precious corner stone is accidentally and eventually a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence. Some are offended at the poverty of his person, and the meanness of his condition; others at the sublimity and sanctity of his doctrine; some are offended at his cross, others at his free grace; but such as, instead of being offended at him, do believe on him, shall never be ashamed of, or confounded by him. Learn hence, That those who, according to the direction of the gospel, do believe on our Lord Jesus Christ shall never have cause to be ashamed. Here note, What they shall not be ashamed of, when and why they shall not be ashamed. 1. What the sincere believer shall not be ashamed of! Ans. He shall never be ashamed of his choice, he shall not be ashamed of his profession, he shall never be ashamed of the cause and interest of Christ which he has owned and vindicated in the world; he shall never be ashamed of the work and service of Christ, nor of any time sincerely spent in that work and service; he shall never be ashamed of his reproaches and sufferings, tribulations and persecutions, for the sake of Christ. In a word, he shall never be ashamed hereafter, that he never was ashamed here, either of Christ and his gospel, his work and service, or his cause and interest. 2. When the believer shall not be ashamed; namely, when he is called forth to bear his testimony of Christ before the world, at the hour of death and at the day of judgment; neither the dreadfulfulness of the day, nor the majesty of the Judge, nor the number of the accusers, nor the impartiality of the sentence, nor the separation which shall then be made, will in the least cause him to be ashamed. 3. Why the believer shall never be ashamed. Ans. The cause of shame is removed and taken away; namely, sin; those only from whom he can reasonably fear shame, will never be ashamed of him; he can look God and Christ, his own conscience, and the whole world, in the face, without shame and blushing. O that sinners would now be ashamed of their unbelief! which otherwise will put them to eternal shame, and bring upon them everlasting confusion in the day of the Lord: Whoever believeth on him, shall never be ashamed; but he that believeth not in him, shame and the wrath of God abideth on him.

CHAP. X.

Our apostle prosecutes in this the argument which he had begun in the former chapter, viz. The temporary rejection of his countrymen the Jews, for their obstinate refusal of that way of justification which the wisdom of God had prescribed, namely, by faith in his Son Jesus Christ, BRETHREN, my hearts desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved.

Where note, 1. The mighty concern which the apostle had for the eternal salvation of his countrymen the Jews, who sought his destruction; their salvation lay very near his heart, and he was afraid they should miss it, by taking the wrong way for obtaining it, by building all their hopes of salvation upon such a bottom as would never bear the fabric, but utterly fail them, namely, justification by works. 2. What it was that made the apostle so concerned for the Jews: It was not upon the account of their wicked lives and scandalous immoralities, but for their bad principles and fundamental errors. They opposed the honour of God to the Son of God, and the observation of the law to the faith of Christ. From whence learn, That we ought to be concerned for those who lie under damnable errors, although they be men of good carriage and commendable conversation. Not only the vicious and ungodly, but the erroneous and unsound, are to be the objects of our pity and prayer: For error is as damnable as vice: the one is an open road, the other a by-path to hell and destruction; and accordingly, he that has a due care of his soul's salvation, will be as much afraid of erroneous principles, as of debauched practices.

2 For I bear them record, that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge.

As if the apostle had said, "I can bear them witness that many, very many of the Jews have a zealous desire in their way to please God, and do what is acceptable in his sight; but though it be a warm, it is but a blind zeal, and not according to right knowledge." Here note, 1. The apostle is desirous to say the best: he could of his countrymen the Jews; he compounds the good meaning of their zeal, but blames the ill conduct of it. It was a misguided and mistaken zeal, and not directed as it ought. Zeal is either one of the best or worst things in the world: It is a good thing, when it is right in its object, right in the measure and and degree, and pursued by right means. As to the object of our zeal, it must be that which is certainly good, and considerably good: certainly good, or else we are zealous for we know not what; or considerably good, or else it doth not deserve our zeal. To be zealous and not beyond all measure for the observation of a ceremony or custom, as some in the Christian church were of old about the observation of Easter; is certainly a zeal not according to knowledge. Again, zeal must be prosecuted by lawful and warrantable means; we must not from a principle of zeal do any evil, that good may come. But there is a zeal amongst the church of Rome, which I am sure cannot be according to knowledge, and that is a zeal for ignorance. This is a zeal peculiar to themselves: they will not allow the people to understand what they do in the service of God; they require them to pray, but will not let them know what they pray for; and all this under a pretence, that ignorance, which makes a man a block, is the mother of devotion; as if the less men understood the service of God, the better he was pleased with it, and the more they were edified by it.

That is the Jews being ignorant of God's way of justification by faith in Christ, discovered in the gospel, and relying upon, and trusting to their own works, their obedience to the ceremonial and moral law, to justify and save them, they have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God; that is, to the way and method which the wisdom of God has discovered for the justification of a sinner by the blood of his Son. Note here, 1. That by God's righteousness we are to understand that righteousness which Christ has wrought for us, which God bestows upon us, and the gospel reveals unto us: By establishing their own righteousness, is to be understood their resolution and endeavour to depend upon their own works; their obedience to the law for their justification before God, in opposition against, and in contradiction to, that way of justification which God had declared; namely, by faith in Christ Jesus, the one and only Mediator. 2. That upon the first opening of the gospel, no evangelical doctrine was more disrelished by the Jews than justification by the righteousness of Christ. They were possessed with this principle then, that eternal life was attainable only by the works of the law: And according to the example of the Jews at the beginning, persons ever since, even to this very day, are fond of that way of justification. The natural man is a proud man; he likes to live upon his own stock, he cannot stoop to a sincere and universal renunciation of his own righteousness, and to depend wholly upon the righteousness of another. It is natural to a man to chuse rather to eat a brown crust, or wear a coarse garment, which he can call his own, than to feed upon the richest dainties, or wear the costliest robes, which he must receive as an alms from another. Lord! how hard is it to subdue this pride of spirit, and to be thoroughly convinced of the absolute necessity of another and a better righteousness than our own, to constitute us righteous in the sight of God! From the whole learn, 1. How dark sighted the wisest men are by nature in God's way of justifying and saving sinners; ignorant of God's righteousness; that is, of the way which the wisdom of God has discovered for justifying guilty sinners by faith in his Son. This is known only by divine revelation, Rom. i. 17. The righteousness of God is revealed from faith to faith: It is purely an object of faith, and hangs all upon divine revelation, both as to the righteousness itself, and the manner of impuring it. 2. How absurd is the attempt, and how injurious the design, to set up and establish a righteousness of our own, either in opposition to, or in conjunction with, the righteousness of God. Alas! we fulfil the law only in sincerity, we cannot fulfil it to perfection; and if it be not to perfection, it cannot be to justification. Therefore to trust to any righteousness of our own for justification before God, which is imperfect and polluted, is both sinful and unsafe. Sinful, because it is confronting the plain declarations of the gospel; and unsafe, because it evacuates Christ: For Christ is of no effect unto us; whatsoever are justified by the law, are fallen from grace, Gal. v. 4. Learn, 3. What an hindrance is pride to the salvation of men; It stiffens the will, that it wont stoop to God's terms: They will not have justification in God's way, and they shall not have it in their own. Here it stuck with the Jews; they would not submit to the righteousness of God; and here it sticks with too many at this day. 4. Not to count a righteousness of your own needfuls to be possessed of, because you want the righteousness of another, to confide and trust in. We plead the meritorious righteousness of Christ, to answer the demands of the law; but contend for a personal righteousness of our own, to answer the commands of the gospel. Christ doth indeed ease us of the load of our sins, but not discharge us from the care of our duty. Our being in Christ frees us indeed from condemnation, but then that in-being must be proved by our holy walking, not after the flesh but after the Spirit, Rom. v. 1. Learn, 5. To submit to the righteousness of God, as ever you would enjoy peace with God. The more holy we are, and the more sanctified we grow, the more need of a Saviour, and of justification by him; and shall bless God for the gospel, in which the righteousness of God is revealed from faith to faith; and shall dread it as hell to be found amongst the number of those, who, though they be not ignorant of God's righteousness, yet will go about to establish their own righteousness, refusing to submit to the righteousness of God.

4 For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth.

There was a threefold law of God, which Christ may be said to be the end of; namely, judicial, ceremonial, and moral: 1. The judicial law was that which God by Moses delivered to the Jews, containing directions for the administration of their civil government. Now Christ was the end of this law, as he has abolished it: for the Jewish polity was to continue till the coming of the Messiah, and not longer, Gen. xlix. Dan. ix. 2. The ceremonial law was that which did prescribe certain sacred rites and ceremonies, to be observed in the external worship of God by the people of Israel. The former law had relation to them as a nation, this as they were a church. Now Christ is the end of this law, as he has abrogated it. All the ceremonies of that law were shadows and types of Christ; now the shadows were to cease, when once the substance was come. 3. The moral law is that holy and eternal rule of righteousness given by God to men, for the right ordering of their thoughts, words and actions towards God, their neighbor and themselves. This law is summarily comprehended in the ten commandments, and is called the law of righteousness, Rom. ix. 31. the royal law by St. James, ii. 8. Now Christ may be said to be the end of this law, (1.) As he is the scope of it. (2.) As he is the accomplishment of it. The precepts of the law point at Christ, as he by whom they are accomplished; the promises of the law point at him, as he by whom they are ratified; and the threatenings of the law may be said to point at him, as he by whom they are escaped. Christ was the sum of the law, as well as the substance of the gospel. In a word, (3.) Christ is the end of the law, inasmuch as he is to a believer, what the law would have been unto him if he could have perfectly kept it; namely, righteousness and life, justification and salvation. For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness, to be imputed to every one that believeth in him, the law being our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, that we might be justified by faith, Gal. iii. 25.

5 For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law, that the man which doth those things shall live by them.

As if the apostle had said, "Righteousness by faith can never be obtained by the works of the law, because Moses describeth the righteousness of the law thus, That the man that doth these things shall live by them; that is, a prosperous and happy life in the land of Canaan, say some; and eternal life in heaven, say others." But then by the law must be understood the moral, not the ceremonial law, according to that of our Saviour, If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments; that is, the moral law. This do, and thou shalt live. Where note, That such as seek justification and salvation by the works of the law, must keep the moral law perfectly and exactly; which being impossible to man in his fallen estate, Christ has obtained of his father, that for the sake of his righteousness, our sincere, though imperfect obedience, should find acceptance with God, and be available to salvation.

6 But the righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise: Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? (that is, to bring Christ down from above.) 7 Or, Who shall descend into the deep? (that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead.) 8 But what saith it? The word is not nigh thee, even in thy mouth and in thy heart: that is, the word of faith which we preach.

In which word the apostle seems to set forth the great anxiety and trouble of mind which is found with an awakened sinner; he is at a loss to find out the way how he shall stand justified in the sight of God. The law pro-pounds to him life, but it is upon an impossible condition; but the gospel clearly reveals to him, that Christ has performed what is necessary for his justification, and that, by a practical and lively faith, he shall have an interest in it. We need not therefore say, Who shall ascend into heaven for us? for Christ being ascended, hath given us a convincing proof, that the propitiation for our sins is perfect; for otherwise our surety hath not been received into God's sanctuary: Therefore, to be under perplexities how we may be justified, is to deny the value of his righteousness, and the truth of his ascension. And say not, Who shall descend into the deep? that is, to bear the torments of hell, and expiate sin; for this is to deny the virtue of his death, whereby he appeased God, and redeemed us from wrath to come. In the law, the condemning righteousness of God is made visible: in the gospel, his justifying righteousness is revealed from faith to faith. Eternally magnified be omnipotent love, that the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ has discovered how God may shew mercy to repenting and returning sinners, without any prejudice or injury done to his justice. Hereby the soul is at once freed from the fear of God's wrath and anger, and has a lively hope of his love and favour. Lord! What sins are there which so entire a satisfaction doth not expiate? What torments can they deserve, which his wounds and stripes have not removed? God is just as well as merciful, in justifying him that believeth on Jesus. From the whole, note, That the way of acceptance with God, is so clearly stated and discovered in the gospel, that we need not be in any doubtful suspense where to find it, or seek other satisfaction than God has given us in his word. The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thine heart, &c.

9 That if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. 10 For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.

Observe here, The two great and principal things which the gospel requires, in order to our justification and salvation. The first is, Confession of Christ with our mouth; that is, in all times of danger, particularly in a time of persecution, to own Christ Jesus our Lord, and to declare that we will serve him, and adhere to him, will be ruled of him, and expect only to be saved by him. The second is, To believe in our hearts, that God hath raised Christ from the dead. But why is the article of Christ's resurrection only named, seeing faith respects his birth, life, and death, &c. Ans. Because this article of the resurrection pre-supposes all the rest of the antecedents to it, and consequents of it; namely, his incarnation, death and passion, ascension and intercession. This article therefore of the resurrection is put for all the rest, and includes all the rest: For as he could not have risen, had he not first died, so his death had availed us nothing, unless he had risen again. Learn hence, 1. That all those who would be accepted with God unto righteousness and life, must be such as do believe in Christ with the heart, and openly confess with the mouth, that he is the

of God, and the Saviour of the world: If thou confests and believe, thou shalt be saved. Learn, 2. That the principal feat and subject of faith is not the understanding barely, but the will, called here the heart, With the heart, man believeth unto righteousness; not the head. Although knowledge is so necessary to faith, that it is sometimes put for faith, as in Isa. liii. By his knowledge, or by the knowledge of him, shall my righteous servant justify many; yet there may be much light in the understanding, where there is no life in the will; much knowledge in the head, where there is no faith in the heart, nor obedience in the life. Therefore says the apostle here, With the heart man believeth, &c.

11 For the scripture saith, Whosoever believeth on him, shall not be ashamed. 12 For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek: for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him. 13 For whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord, shall be saved.

Observe here, How the apostle proclaims Jesus Christ a common and universal Saviour of all mankind who believe in him, without any discrimination or difference between Jew and Gentile: Whosoever believeth on him, shall not be ashamed: and whosoever shall call upon his name, shall be saved. Where by believing on him, and calling upon him, must be understood such a faith in him, as is the parent and principle of obedience to him. For the devil himself may as well pass for a believer, as a disobedient soul. If our works be no better than the works of devils, our faith is no better than theirs neither, in the account of God. He believes, so as not to be ashamed, who lives as he doth believe. In vain is it to expect salvation by Christ, if we do not yield subjection to him. Lord! how many are there that desire thou shouldst suffer for their sins, so they may have the satisfaction to commit them; content that thou shouldst bear the blame, so they may have the liberty to commit the faults? If they may but live in their sins, they take it kindly that Christ will die for them; but the design of Christ's death was to deliver us not only from the danger, but from the dominion of our sins; to free us not only from the wrath of God, but from the rage of our lusts.

14 How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher? 15 And how shall they preach except they be sent? as it is written, How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the gospel of peace, and bring glad tidings of good things!

The scope of the apostle in these words is to prove, that there was a necessity of preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, as well as to the Jews, in order to their believing on Christ; and his way of arguing is very forcible, demonstrative, and convincing. Thus "God has by the prophets promised salvation to the Gentiles; but without calling on him, there is no salvation; and without faith, there is no calling upon him by prayer; and without hearing, there is no faith; and without a preacher there is no hearing; and without solemn mission; or sending by Christ and his ministers, there can be no preacher." And the apostle's manner of speaking is by way of interrogation, which is equivalent to a negation? How shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? That is, it is impossible to do it, and it would be impious and wicked to do it. None must be the object of our prayers, but he that is the object of our faith and trust; now it is God alone that is the object of our faith and trust, therefore he alone must be prayed unto. And if so, then the practice of the papists in praying to angels and saints departed, is very blame-worthy and abominable in the sight of God. How can they pray unto them, unless they believe in them, and trust in them? And if they trust in them, that curse falls upon them, Cursed is that man that trusteth in man; that is, in any creature. The truth is, if Christ himself were a mere man, and not God as well as man, we should sin by worshipping of him; but it is one good argument to prove the divinity of Christ, that the scripture represents him as the object of faith, and religious invocation. From the whole, observe, That the only way to heaven is by Christ, the only way to Christ is by faith, the only way to faith is by the word, it cometh by hearing; the only way, that is, the only ordinary way. What becomes of those that never heard of Christ in the preaching of the gospel, God only is fit to judge. This is certain, that all men at the great day shall be judged according to the law that they were under, and obliged by, and no other. Now promulgation being of the essence of a law, the gospel cannot be a law to them to whom it was not promulged, and made known: but a practicable belief of the gospel is indispensably necessary to the salvation of them to whom it is revealed. Observe farther, The great reverence and high esteem which is due and payable to the preachers of the gospel, and that by the approbation of God himself. He commands us to admire the very feet of them that preach the gospel of his Son unto us, and bring glad tidings of good things, How beautiful are the feet of them, &c. And for great reason should it be thus, because the ministers of the gospel are the messengers of Christ; they receive both their mission and commission from him; they are instructed by him, they negotiate for him, they speak in his name, they act in his stead; and whatsoever they either promise or threaten in God's name, he stands ready and resolved to perform it. Isa. xlv. 26. He confirmeth the word of his servants, and performeth the counsel of his messengers. Lord! how beautiful and blessed are the feet of thy messengers and ministers in thy account? Let them be so in thy people's estimation also. Learn hence, That nothing ought to be so welcome to us, and so joyfully entertained by us, as the preaching and preachers of the gospel. How beautiful are the feet of them, &c.

16. But they have not all obeyed the gospel. For Esaias saith, Lord, who hath believed our report?

Here an objection is tacitly implied and answered; some might say, "If the gospel be thus excellent, and the feet of them that preach it so beautiful, whence was it that the Jews, to whom it was first preached, did not receive, and yield obedience yield obedience to it?" The apostle answers, that this infidelity and obstinacy of the Jews were foretold by the prophets of old, particularly by Isaiah, who complains, chap. liii. 1. Lord, who hath believed our report? Learn hence, 1. That the faith of the gospel is not common to all that hear the gospel. True, the hearing of the word is necessary unto faith, but faith doth not necessarily follow the hearing of the word: 2. That the prophets of God did foresee, and by a spirit of prophecy foretel, what small success the preaching of the gospel would have to and amongst the Jews. 3. That yet the prophet's prediction was not the cause, but the consequence of the Jews rejection of the gospel: It was not because the prophet said so, that they did not believe; but because they believe not, therefore the prophet said so: They have not believed the gospel: for so Isaiah saith of them.

17 So then faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God:

As if the apostle had said, "It is very evident, and these testimonies shew, that faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the preaching of the word of God." The grace of faith is wrought by the Spirit in the act of hearing; and the matter heard by which this faith is wrought is the word of God preached. Persons must hear, that they may hear. A non-peaching minister, then, is no minister; he is like a bell without a clapper, or a cryer without a voice; he neither answers the design of his commission, nor the end of the gospel's institution, which was to be the instrumental mean of faith, Faith cometh by hearing.

18 But I say, Have they not heard? Yes verily their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world,

It was no less than a miracle, that the gospel, in the space of a few years, should be preached in all nations, and planted in the remotest parts of the world; and yet thus it was: Which makes St. Paul here apply that to the preaching of the apostles, which David applies to the preaching of the heavens, Psal. xix. 4. The gospel of Christ, like the sun in the firmament, casts its beautiful and glorious beams all the world over. For upon the commission given out by Christ to his apostles, to go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature, the apostles divided themselves into the several quarters of the world, for the speedy performance of this service, namely, the carrying of the light of the gospel, as the sun doth his light, unto all the nations of the earth. As if St. Paul had here said, "Like as the voice of the heavens are gone through the world, so is the voice of Christ, and the light of his gospel, which doth much more declare the glory of God, than the sun and the moon in the heavens can do." Some observe, That there was hardly any one considerable nation in the world, but within forty years after Christ's ascension, had the glad tidings of the gospel preached to it. Hence the apostle tells us, Tit. ii. 2, That the grace of God, which bringeth salvation, hath appeared unto all men: That is, the gospel without restriction was tendered to all nations, Jew and Gentile; to all persons, bond and free; honourable and ignoble. Behold! the goodness and mercy of God, in enlightning the dark corners of the world, with this glorious light from heaven. Behold! the great power and efficacy of the word, under the quickning influences of the Holy Spirit. Behold! an example of laborious diligence and industry in ministerial service! What pains did the apostles take? What hazards did they run? What journeys did they undertake, to preach Jesus Christ, to plant and propagate the everlasting gospel? Shall not we attend our flock, and travel from house to house to visit our charge which falls within the compass of a few miles, when the apostles compassed sea and land, travelled far and near, laboured night and day, to transmit the gospel to the ends of the world? Lord! how does their indefatigable diligence shame our supine negligence!

19 But I say, Did not Israel know? First, Moses saith, I will provoke you to jealousy, by them that are no people, and by a foolish nation I will anger you. 20 But Esaias is very bold, and saith; I was found of them that sought me not; I was made manifest unto them that asked not after me. 21 But to Israel he saith, All day long I have stretched forth my hands unto a disobedient and gainfaying people.

Did not Israel know, that is, of the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles, and of their own infidelity in rejecting it? This they might have known, both from the testimony of Moses and Esaias. First from Moses's testimony, Deut. xxxii. I will provoke you (Jews refusing to believe) unto jealousy by them that are (yet) no people (of God); and by a foolish nation, (so the Gentiles were accounted by the Jews) I will anger you. When God preferred the Gentiles before the Jews, the hearts of the latter were vexed with jealousy and anger, to behold all their privileges taken from them, and given to the former, whom they accounted a people most vile and despicable. The second testimony is that of Esaias, who the apostle says was very bold; that is, very plain and express, in foretelling God's calling of the Gentiles, and rejecting of the Jews? calling the Gentiles by his free grace, and seeking them that first sought him not; and casting off the Jews, who, after all his forbearance and long suffering, did continue obstinately to reject the offers of his grace, and the tenders of his mercy. Here note, 1. The holy courage of this evangelical prophet Isaiah; in the discharge of his office: With great boldness and freedom he foretells the calling of the Gentiles; and casting off the Jews, although it cost him dear, even his life, being sawn asunder by a wooden saw, as some affirm. There ought to meet in the ministers and messengers of God, both courage and impartiality; courage in fearing no faces, impartiality in sparing no crimes. 2. What little cause of reason the ministers of God have to sit down in despondency; after so many unwearied attempts made in vain to reclaim sinners from their wicked ways: when they consider the infinite patience of God towards them, who stretches forth his hands all the day long to a disobedient and gainfaying people; that is, patiently contends with their obstinacy and perverseness. Lord! why should we, that are sinners ourselves, think much to bear with sinners? Let us rather intimate thy example in waiting upon them with the offers of grace and mercy, and follow them with our melting intreaties and passionate importunities, till we either overcome their obstinacy, or leave them totally inexcusable.

C H A P. XI.

The design of our apostle in this chapter is twofold: 1. To keep the Jews from dejection and despair. 2. To preserve the Gentiles from presumption and pride. And for this end he thus bespeaks them both:

I Say then, Hath God cast away his people; God forbid. For I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin.

Our apostle having shewn, in the end of the foregoing chapter, that the Jews would be rejected, and the Gentiles called, begins this chapter, by answering a great and popular objection. Some hereupon might be ready to say, "If this be so, then God has cast away his covenant people, violated his covenant promise, and forgot the seed of Abraham his friend." He answers, by his accustomed form of denial, God forbid, and then proceeds to shew, that the rejection of the Jews was not total; God did not reject them all, but the unbelieving part of them only. And this he proves by producing himself as an instance in the case, I myself says he am an Israelite of the seed of Abraham of the tribe of Benjamin. As if he had said, "I am myself a Jew by nature and nation; not a profelyte converted to the Jewish faith, but a Jew by lineal descent, of the seed of Abraham, according to the flesh; yet am not I cast off by God; therefore God has not cast away all his people." Learn hence, How many unbelievers soever God rejects, he will not cast away one soul that sincerely believes in his son, and gives up himself to the obedience of the gospel. Believers are God's jewels; he will not cast them away. They are his children, his portion, his inheritance; he will never cast them off. They are united to him by the bond of the Holy Spirit, and he has engaged himself to them by the bond of an everlasting covenant. Believers love God and his truth forever, and the God of truth will love them forever. God has not cast away his people.

2 God hath not cast away his people, which he foreknew.—

Here we have a second argument, to prove that God would not wholly cast off the Jewish church and people: namely, because he had foreknown them; that is, had chosen the body of them to be a special and peculiar people to himself, above and before all the people of the earth: And has also foreknown, that is, foreseen, that many of them would, through the assistance of the Holy Spirit, savingly believe on the promised Messiah. God never did, never will cast away such, either among Jews or Gentiles.

—Wot ye not what the scripture saith of Elias? how he maketh intercession to God against Israel, saying, 3 Lord, they have killed thy prophets, and digged down thine altars; and I am left alone, and they seek my life. 4 But what saith the answer of God unto him? I have reserved to myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee to the image of Baal.

Another instance is here produced, to prove that God had not suffered all the Jews to apostatize and fall away through unbelief; and that is the instance of Elias, in whose days there was such a general revolt among the Jews from the worship of the true God to Jeroboam's idolatry, that he thought himself alone. But God assures him, that there was not such a dearth of saints as he feared, he having reserved to himself seven thousand true and faithful worshippers of himself, who had never bowed knee to the image of Baal. Learn hence, That even in times of universal apostasy and epidemical degeneracy, God has a number to stand up for, and witness to his name and truth, and that the number of them is more than we either imagine or believe. God has ever had, and always will have a seed to serve him, which shall be accounted to him for a generation; and although the number of revolters be great, yet the number of the righteous is not small,

5 Even so then at this present time also there is a remnant according to the election of grace. 6 And if by grace; then it is no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace: otherwise work is no more work.

Here we have St Paul making application of the foregoing example to the present case. As Elias was not alone in the corrupt state of Israel then, so neither was the apostle alone now, in this time of general rejection of the Jewish church and nation. God had a remnant then, he has a remnant now, which, according to his free and gracious purpose, are brought to believe in his Son. Although the Jews who believed were few, in comparison of them that were rejected, called therefore a remnant, which is but small and little in respect of the whole piece; yet there were many thousands of them that did believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and obtained, no doubt salvation by him: Acts xxi. 20. Thou seest, brother, how many thousand Jews there are which do believe. Observe, farther, The conclusion which the apostle doth infer and draw from the fore-mentioned assertion: "If a remnant be saved according to the free purpose and gracious election of God, then it is not upon the consideration of the merit of their own works; they are not justified and accepted for the works of the law, otherwise grace is no more grace: for what need is there of grace, where men have continued in all things written the law to do them? For the man that doth these things shall live in them: But, on the other hand, if it be of works that we are justified and accepted, then it is no more of grace, otherwise work is no more work." Learn hence, 1. That such as are chosen in Christ to be a people near unto God, are put into this state by mere grace, and unmerited favours. 2. That grace comes in to supply the defect of our works, and to procure pardon for the non-performance of them, according to the rigor of the law. God was good to man before his fall, in making him his creature; he is gracious to man since his fall, in recovering him to the divine favour, by restoring him to the divine likeness. The fabric of grace in the hearts of his people, goes up, as did the building of the second temple, with shouts and acclamations, Grace; grace; and every stone in the building of our salvation, from the foundation to the superstructure, is free-stone, otherwise grace is no more grace.

7 What then? Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for; but the election hath obtained it. and the rest were blinded: 8 According as it is written, God has given them the spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear, unto this day.

Observe here, 1. What the apostle affirms concerning the main body of the Jewish nation, they obtained not what they sought after; that is, deliverance by the Messiah, justification and righteousness by the works of the law. This they sought, but found not; yet the election hath obtained it; that is, the chosen generation of believers, seeking righteousness and life in the gospel way, namely, by faith in Christ the Mediator have obtained it. And the rest were blinded. But who and by whom? Ans. 1. By their own sin and prejudice; and then, 2. By the just judgment of God, leaving them to their own ignorance and obstinacy, for shutting their eyes against the clear light of the gospel; and by giving them over to Satan, the god of this world, who blindeth the eyes of them that believe not, 2 Cor. iv. 4. Observe, 2. The direful judgment which followed upon this dreadful sin; they shut their eyes, and say, they will not see, God closed their eyes, and said, they shall not see. Because they would not obey the Spirit of God, which would have awakened and enlightened them, God gave them up to a spirit of slumber, stupidity, and blindness; that is, he permitted them to continue and lie under those prejudices against the true Messiah, which they had taken up and entertained in their minds. Learn hence, That no greater judgment can befall a people, than sottish stupidity of mind, and insensibility of spirit; whereby they are drowsily careless of their salvation, and know not the things belonging to their peace, although they be before their eyes. This was the case with the chief body of the Jewish nation, and continues to be still their case: They have eyes, and see not, ears, but hear not, until this day.

9 And David saith, Let their table be made a snare, and a trap, and a stumbling-block, and a recompense unto them. 10 Let their eyes be darkened that they may not see, and bow down their back alway.

The apostle proceeds here to declare unto us that the general unbelief and hardness of heart which was found amongst the rejected Jews, was not to be wondered at, because it was prophetically foretold by holy David, in the person of the Messiah, of whom he was a type, that his own people the Jews should extremely injure and wrong him, oppress and vex him: For which wickedness, he foretells what dreadful and tremendous judgments should come upon the Jews; namely, That their table should be made to them a snare, a trap, and a stumbling-block; that is, that all their pleasant and delightful things should become the instruments of their destruction, That their eyes be darkened, and they may not see. The darkening of their eyes signifies the taking away of the judgment and understanding from a people. And the bowing down of the back always, intimates and implies their grovelling upon this earth; their relishing and favouring nothing but earthly things, never lifting either hand or heart to God. Now all this which David spake of the wicked Jews in his time the apostle applies and adapts to the incredulous and unbelieving Jews in his days, to whom the very preaching of the gospel was an occasion of obduration and hardness of heart. Learn here, 1. That to the obstinate and obdurate enemies of God, the best things become baneful, and, through their own corruption, become the instruments and means of their own destruction: Let their table be made a snare, a trap, and a stumbling block. 2. That to be deprived of the use both of our judgment and understanding, especially in things pertaining unto God, is a very dreadful judgment: Let their eyes be darkened, that they may not see. 3. That imprecations are to be used very warily, and only in weighty matters. These, and other expressions of David, which look like imprecations, may as well be accounted prophetic predictions, foretelling what will come upon obstinate sinners, rather than praying that evil may come: Great is the sin and danger of using imprecations lightly, either upon ourselves or others. Some persons use them to gain credit to what they say; but this will not do with wise men, who frequently observe, that persons most guilty are most apt to call for vengeance upon themselves, that they may be thought guiltless. Lord! how do some sinners wish and call for that at which the devils tremble! I mean damnation. Alas! it slumbereth not; within a moment or two thou shalt feel what thou wilt not fear.

11 I say then, Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but rather through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy.

Our apostle had in the preceding verses proved the rejection of the Jews not to have been total; here he proves that it shall not be final, but they shall be generally called before the end of the world. Have they stumbled, says he, that they should fall. that is, "Have they so stumbled and fallen as never to rise more? Are they utterly forsaken and cast off? No such thing; but God in his just and righteous judgment hath permitted them to fall, that they having obstinately refused the gospel, it might be preached to the Gentiles; and their receiving of the gospel God will, in his infinite wisdom, make use of, to provoke the Jews to jealousy and emulation, seeing themselves so far outstrip: by those whom they so contemned and despised, and in the close, make this jealousy and emulation a mean and occasion of the Jews conversion." Learn hence, That emulation and jealousy doth heighten and heighten the mind of man to an eager pursuit of the best things. Observe it in the instance before us; the salvation of the Gentiles had emulation in the Jews: "What! say the Jews, shall the Gentiles go away with heaven alone whom we thought the vilest people upon the earth? Come, let us put in for a part and share in gospel mercies and privileges with them." Thus they were provoked to emulation, and this emulation occasioned their conversion.

12 Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness?

As if the apostle had said, "If the casting off the Jews was so profitable to the Gentile world; if the Gentiles have been such great gainers, by occasion of the sin and fall of the Jews, how much more when they shall become Christians, will they add to the fulness, the glory and greatness of the Christian church?" Note here, The wonderful wisdom, the astonishing goodness, the overruling providence and power of God, in causing the fall of the Jews to be the occasion of God's manifesting his abundant grace in the conversion of the Gentiles, and spreading the plentiful knowledge of Christ over all the world; and also, in causing the general conversion of the Jews towards the end of the world, to confirm the faith of the believing Gentiles.

13 For I speak to you Gentiles, inasmuch as I am the apostle of the Gentiles, I magnify mine office;

14 If by any means I may provoke to emulation them which are my flesh, and might save some of them. 15 For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead?

Note here, 1. The honourable office which St. Paul was called to; namely, to be an apostle, and the apostle of the Gentiles. 2. The honour which God put upon him in the faithful execution of that office: (1.) In making him instrumental, for calling many of the blind and ignorant Gentiles to the obedience of the faith: And, (2.) In provoking the Jews (whom he calls his own flesh, because of his own nation) not to suffer the Gentiles alone to go away with the privileges of the gospel, but to put in for a share with them: If by any means I may provoke to emulation: As if the apostle had said, "O that I could once see an holy emulation take hold of my countrymen: That rather than not believe at all, and be saved, I might see them at last believe for anger, or for very shame, and go to heaven in a holy chafe!" 3. What an argument the apostle makes use of, why all persons should greatly desire the general conversion, both of Jews and Gentiles, to the faith of Christ. As the casting away of the Jews at present, will be the reconciling of the world? that is, to be an occasion of sending the gospel to the Gentiles all the world over, whereby they become reconciled unto God; what will the receiving of the Jews again, into the grace and favour of God, and the communion of the visible church, be to you Gentiles, but even as life or resurrection from the dead? Learn hence, (1.) That the conversion of the Jews, and the calling of the fulness of the Gentiles, are mercies much, very much, to be desired, and earnestly prayed for (2.)

That such will be the blessed state of the church, when the fulness, both of Jews and Gentiles, are brought into it, that it will be looked upon as a new life, or resurrection from the dead.

16 For if the first-fruit be holy, the lump is also holy: and if the root be holy, so are the branches.

Here the apostle produces another argument to prove the universal restoration of the Jews unto the grace and favour of God, before the end of the world; and it is drawn from the covenant of God made with Abraham, (as the root of the Jewish nation) which said, I will be thy God, and the God of thy seed. Now, the argument runs thus: "As the branches follow the nature of the root, so do the Jews follow the condition of Abraham, and the holy patriarchs, with respect to the outward privileges of the covenant. Was the root holy, so are the branches holy, not inherently, but federally holy, being called, consecrated, and separated from the world unto the service of God. If then Almighty God, by entering into covenant with Abraham, hallowed to himself all his posterity, even as the first-fruit; hallowed the whole lump; in like manner, will God, in his own good time, be so mindful of the Jews, the posterity of Abraham, as to bring them again nigh unto himself, in remembrance of his holy covenant: So that they shall be his people, and he will be their God." Learn hence, That the Jews though at present cast off by God, are still an holy people; they are under an hereditary dedication to God, they have federal holiness, as descending from holy progenitors, with respect to whom the love and compassion of God are towards them, and they shall, in his own time, be called and converted by him: And therefore, in the mean time, the Jews are not to look upon themselves with desperation, nor should the Gentiles look upon them with disdain. The first-fruits being holy, the lump is also holy: The root being holy, so are the branches also.

17 And if some of the branches be broken off, and thou being a wild olive-tree wert grafted in amongst them, and with them partakest of the root and fatness of the olive-tree; 18 Boast not against the branches: but if thou boast, thou hearest not the root, but the root thee. 19 Thou wilt say then, The branches were broken off, that I might be grafted in, 20 Well; because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest by faith. Be not high-minded, but fear. 21 For if God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he also spare not thee.

The design and scope of our apostle in these words, is to exhort the believing Gentiles not to despise and reproach the rejected and unbelieving Jews: And he draws an argument from the condition of the Gentiles, both past and present: in their past condition, they were like a wild olive tree; in their present condition they were grafted into the true olive. Here note, That by the olive tree we are to understand the visible church of God; by the root, he means Abraham; he was the root of the olive tree, the Jewish church, But, how so? Ans. Not the root by way of communication, but in a way of administration; not by way of communication, as if either Jew or Gentile did receive any sap or spiritual life from him, as branches receive a natural life from the root: for thus Christ alone is the root of the church. But Abraham was the root of the olive tree in a way of administration, the Lord calling him forth as the first man with whom he was pleased to treat, and enter into that covenant with. Again, by the fatness of the olive tree, we are to understand all outward privileges and ordinances, all spiritual benefits and blessings which belong to the Jewish church. By the branches of the olive tree, we are to understand the members of the Jewish church; and by the wild olive, the Gentile world. Now, though the Gentiles, through rich grace, were inserted in the privileges of the Jews, yet the apostle foresaw, that instead of thankfulness to God, for the favours received from him, they would be puffed up with pride; and accordingly, he advises them, not to be high-minded, but fear: As if he had said, "O ye Gentiles, your state is high, let your hearts be humble. The Jews are fallen, and unless you walk in holy fear, you cannot stand: Unbelief ruined them, take heed that pride doth not ruin you; for the just and holy God is no respecter of persons. He that spared not the natural branches, will no more spare thee." From the whole learn, 1. That man is naturally a very proud creature; and although he has nothing but what he has freely received, yet he is prone to boast. 2. That man is especially apt to magnify himself, and to glory over those who are fallen before him, either into sin, or under affliction. 3. That the best preservative from falling, is humility and holy fear. If ever we stand in the day of trial, it is the fear of falling that must enable us to stand. Take heed they do not fall, by thinking it impossible to fall. Be not high-minded, but fear. Timor tuus, securitas tua; Thy holy fear will keep thee from falling when others security and presumption will lay them on the ground. Let not a man that stands on the top of a tree boast of his height, but look to his hold.

22 Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity; but towards thee, goodness, if thou continue in his goodness: otherwise thou also shalt be cut off. 23 And they also, if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be grafted in. For God is able to graft them in again, 24 For if thou wert cut out of the olive-tree which is wild by nature, and were grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree; how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive-tree?

Our apostle, in these, and the following verses, proceeds in his exhortation to the Gentiles, not to insult over the rejected Jews, but to carry it towards them with great modesty and Christian humility; and he useth several arguments by way of motive, to excite and quicken them thereunto. The two first are drawn from the severity of God in cutting off the Jews, and the goodness and bounty of God in calling of the Gentiles: Behold the goodness and severity of God, &c. Justice and mercy, goodness and severity, are attributes or qualities eminently found in God; and contrary only in their effects upon men. The same God is merciful and severe, with respect to different persons, and different qualifications. All mercy is not a virtue, but that which is consistent with other perfections of wisdom and righteousness. The next argument is taken from the condition upon which the Gentiles hold their present standing in the favour and grace of God; namely, If they continue in this goodness, that is, if they walk worthy of this favour from God, and suitably to such a kind and gracious dispensation; otherwise, they, the Gentiles, shall be cut off and cast away, as well as the stubborn and unbelieving Jews. The Lord is with a people only whilst they are with him: If they serve and seek him, he will be found of them; but if they forsake him, he will cast them off forever. The next argument to suppress arrogance and pride in the Gentiles, and to prevent their insulting over the fallen Jews, is taken from the hopes of the Jews restoration; Which the apostle proves to be both possible and probable. They shall be grafted in if they abide not in unbelief; for God is able to graft them in again. As if the apostle had said, "The same God that rejected them, is able to restore them, and re-ingraft them; the only obstacle is their unbelief, and this God is also able to remove." Lastly, He shews the probability as well as the possibility of the Jews conversion; namely, because God had done that which was more unlikely already, to wit, ingrafting the Gentiles, who were wild olives, into the true olive, which was more difficult and unlikely, than to graft in the Jews again, which were natural branches. The argument runs thus: "If the Gentiles, which were a kind of wild olive branches, were grafted into a good olive tree, (the church of God) which is contrary to nature, seeing men use to graft a good scion into a wild stock, and not a wild scion into a good stock; how much more shall the Jews, which are the natural branches of the good olive, be grafted again into their own olive tree, to which they formerly did belong? The one is according to the order of nature, but the other is against, and contrary to nature." Learn hence, How improbable and unlikely, how difficult and impossible soever, the conversion and calling of the Jews to the Christian religion, may seem to us, it is neither contrary to right reason, nor true faith. The greatest obstacle in the way of the Jews conversion to Christianity, it is to be feared lies in the wicked and scandalous lives of those that call themselves Christians.

25 For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest you should be wise in your own conceit, that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. 26 And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, there shall come out of Sion a Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness From Jacob. 27 For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins.

Here the apostle fully proves, that the rejection of the Jews was neither total nor final; not total, because blindness in part only, happened unto Israel: That is, part of the Jews only are left in unbelief; and under the power of spiritual blindness; nor is their rejection final, but for a time only, namely, till the fulness of the Gentiles be come in; that is, till the Gentile churches be advanced to an honourable state and fulness. And then all the Israel of God, the faithful seed of Abraham, and the main body of the Jews, shall make up the catholic church, and be saved from their unbelief; according to that gracious promise, Isa. lix. 20, 21. The Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob; and this is my covenant with them, my Spirit shall not depart from thy seed, nor thy seed's seed from henceforth and for ever. Learn hence That there shall be a general calling of the Jews to the faith of the gospel before Christ's second coming, is not only possible and probable, but infallible, sure and certain and that from the prophecies and predictions of the prophets of God: Let us therefore believe it firmly, pray for it fervently, and live in the expectation of it continually.

28 As concerning the gospel, they are enemies for your sake: but as touching the election, they are beloved for the father's sake, 29 For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance.

Here we have two farther arguments to prove the general conversion of the Jews: The first is taken from the dignity of the Jews, they being the ancient people of God whose father Abraham he chose, and made his first covenant with him and his seed; and therefore, as to making the election of that nation to be an holy people to himself they are beloved by God for their father's sake; that is for the sake of Abraham their holy progenitor, who had the honour to be called the friend of God. Though grace descends not from parent to child, yet many times the children of godly parents are very large sharers in outward privileges and blessings for their gracious parents' sake. The Jews are here said to be loved of God for their father Abraham's sake, whilst, for their unbelief and contempt of the gospel, they had rendered themselves the deserved objects of God's hatred. The second argument is drawn from the immutability and unchangable nature of God; His gifts and calling are without repentance; that is, although the Jews have rendered themselves unworthy of the favour of God, yet the covenant having been once made with their fathers, and they having had the honour to be his special and peculiar people, God will never repent of his kindness to them, nor of his covenant made with them but will certainly restore them to their former privileges, and happy state: For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance. Take the words relatively, and the note is this, "That the gifts and calling of God, whereby he was pleased to adopt the posterity of Abraham, and to engage himself by covenant to them are inviolable, and such as shall never be reversed or repented of." Observe lastly, The sad and deplorable condition which the Jews are at present in and under; they are enemies to the gospel, As concerning the gospel they are enemies for your sake: That is, because you Gentiles receive the gospel, therefore the Jews reject it, and for that reason are rejected by God. But this happened well to the poor Gentiles; for upon the Jews refusal, the gospel was brought the sooner to the Gentiles, and they were converted by it.

30 For as ye in times past have not believed God yet have now obtained mercy through their unbelief; 31 Even so have these also now not believed, that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy.

Here we have the conclusion of the apostle's arguments to prove the conversion and calling of the Jews towards the end of the world. The argument is drawn from a comparison of equals: "If God, after a long time of disobedience, received the Gentiles to mercy, he will also, after a long time of infidelity, receive the Jews to mercy. If God hath called the Gentiles to his grace after long idolatry, though God never promised to be their God, how much more will he recall his covenant people from their infidelity in his own appointed time?" So that the argument is from the less to the greater: If the infidelity of the Jews was an occasion of mercy to the Gentiles, much more shall the mercy shewed to the Gentiles be an occasion of mercy to the Jews; and consequently their present infidelity shall be no obstacle to their conversion afterward.

32 For God hath concluded them all in unbelief that he might have mercy upon all.

That is, "Almighty God hath in wisdom and righteousness suffered both Jews and Gentiles successively, for some time, to remain under the power of unbelief and disobedience, that so he might in his own time fulfil the great counsel of his goodness, in shewing undeserved mercy to all both Jew and Gentile. Now from all the foregoing arguments for the calling of the Jews, summed up together in this chapter, we may collect and gather, that the conversion of the Jewish nation to the Christian faith has good foundation in the holy scriptures, and has been the received doctrine of the church of Christ in all ages of the church.

33 O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!

Here the apostle concludes the chapter with an awful admiration at the depth of the abundant grace and goodness of God in bearing with the infidelity of the Jews, and the obstinacy of the Gentiles; as also of the unsearchable wisdom in making first the rejection of the Jews a mean of calling the Gentiles, and then working upon the obstinate Jews by his mercy shewn unto the Gentiles. By judgment here, some understand the decrees and determinations of God's will; by ways, the administration of his providence, in order to the execution of those decrees: Both which are secret, unsearchable, and unfathomable. There are mysteries of providence, as well as mysteries of faith, and both of them transcend our human understanding.

34 For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor? 35 Or who hath first given to him, and shall be recompensed unto him again?

As if the apostle had said, "No creature ever did, or ever can pierce into the mind of God, nor was ever called to be of his council. No creature ever did or can advise him, nor can any creature challenge God, as if he were indebted to him. Who ever gave any thing to God, that he did not first receive from him? Or who can merit any thing at his hands, seeing he owes us nothing? And if so who hath reason to complain that God deals hardly with the Jews, in rejecting them, and preferring the Gentiles before them! Surely Almighty God may dispense a favour to some, which he owes to none." Learn hence, That in those discriminating favours which God dispenses toward some of the children of men, no other reason can be assigned but his own good will and pleasure. This particularly appears in his ordering matters relating to the Jews and Gentiles, recorded in the foregoing chapter.

36 For of him and through him, and to him are all things. To whom be glory forever. Amen.

That is, "All things are of God, as the author and efficient cause; all things are through him, as the providential director, and preserving cause; and all things tend to him, as the ultimate end and final cause; therefore to him all praise, honour, and glory, ought for ever to be ascribed." Learn hence, That God is the first cause and last end. He is the first cause; that is, he is the cause of all things besides himself, the fountain and original of all created beings; nothing was before him, but all things created by him, and dependant upon him: And as he is the first cause, so he is the last end; that is, all things tend to him as their ultimate end; their design and aim was the illustration of God's glory, and the manifestation of his divine perfections. And if God be the first cause, let us with humility and thankfulness acknowledge him, admire and adore him, love and serve him, who is the author of our being, and the cause of all other beings. And if he be the last end, let us refer all our actions to his glory; in all our natural actions, our civil actions, but especially in all our religious actions, let the glory of God be our supreme aim and ultimate end. For if we do not now live unto him, we can never expect hereafter to live with him.

C H A P. XII.

Our apostle having finished the doctrinal part of his discourse, begins here to make application of it. In the former part of his epistle, he had copiously handled the doctrinal points of faith, justification, sanctification, &c. Now from hence to the end of the epistle, there is contained an exhortation to religious and moral duties, as an argument of their sincerity, and as an ornament to their profession.

I Beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service.

Note here 1. The apostle's loving and courteous compulsion brei. r. n.; so he calls the believing Romans. They were brethren by place and nation, and brethren by religion and profession: Eodem sanguine Christi conglutinati, cemented together by the blood of Christ, and by the bands of love. 2. The manner of the apostle's exhortation; it is by way of obsecration and intreaty, I beseech you, brethren. It imports great lenity and meekness. The apostle did not want authority to command, but uses such humility as to intreat. The ministers's work and office is not only to be a teacher, but a beseecher. He must not barely propound and recommend the doctrine of the gospel to his people's understanding, but must endeavour to work upon their wills and affections to embrace and entertain them. The understanding is the leading, but the will the commanding faculty. 3. The exhortation itself; Present your bodies a living sacrifice. Present your bodies, that is, dedicate your persons, devote yourselves, your whole man, soul and body to the service of God and his glory. Christians are priests, or a royal priesthood; they offer up themselves in sacrifice unto God as a whole burnt offering. 4. The properties of the Christian sacrifice: it must be voluntary, Present yourselves. It must be a living sacrifice, an holy sacrifice, a reasonable sacrifice, otherwise it will find no acceptance with God. 5. The argument or motive which the apostle makes use of, to persuade persons to present and give up themselves to God, and his service, and that is drawn from the mercies of God; I beseech you brethren by the mercies of God. Learn thence, That the mercies of God revealed in the gospel, are the most proper, powerful and effectual argument to persuade with, and prevail upon sinners, that have not given up and devoted themselves to God, to do it: and those that have done it, to do it more and more: I beseech you by the mercies of God, that ye, &c.

2 And be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God.

Note here, 1. The apostle's dehortation, be not conformed to this world. That is, do not fashion or accommodate yourselves to the corrupt principles and customs, to the sinful courses and practices of the men of the world." The Christian is to walk singularly, and not after the world's guise: He must not cut the coat of his profession according to the fashion of the times, or the humour of the company he falls into. 2. An apostolical exhortation: Be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind. That is, "be ye regenerated and changed in your whole man, beginning at the mind or understanding, by which the Spirit of God worketh upon the inferior faculties of the soul." Every converted person is truly and really changed, thoroughly sanctified and renewed, endowed with new dispositions and affections; yet this conversion and renovation is not a substantial, but a qualitative change, a change, not in the substance of the faculties of the soul, but in the quality of those faculties. And the renewed Christian is sanctified totus, but not totaliter; he is sanctified thoroughly in all faculties, but not perfectly in all degrees. There is in a renewed man's understanding too much blindness and ignorance, in his will too great obstinacy and perverseness, in his affections too much irregularity and sensuality. Yet such is the indulgence of the gospel, as to call him an holy person, a person transformed by the renewing of his mind. 3. The reason of the apostle's exhortation: Be ye transformed, &c. that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God: That is, that ye may discern and approve what the will of God is under the gospel, which requires not what is ritually, but what is substantially good and consequently always acceptable to him. Note here, That in opposition to the Levitical ceremonies and ritual injunctions, the apostle styles the gospel institution, the good and acceptable, and perfect will of God; and as such may we love and embrace it, and be found in the delightful practice of it.

3 For I say through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself, more highly than he ought to think; but to think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith.

The apostle having exhorted to an holy life in general, verse the first, and to a spiritual renovation of mind, in order to it, verse the second, comes now to a close exhortation to more particular duties; the first of which is modesty and true humility of mind. This he recommends especially to such who bear any public office in the church, and had received some peculiar and special gifts to fit and furnish them for the discharge of that office. St. Paul here particularly enjoins them, by virtue of his apostolic office, to watch against pride and haughtiness of mind; not to think themselves wiser or better than they were, but to think soberly and modestly of themselves, according to the truth, and to the degree of faith and wisdom given unto them of God: Plainly intimating, That such as are exalted to a degree of eminency in the church above others, are in great danger of the sin of pride, which it is their duty to watch and pray against, and to be found in the exercise of that humility and lowliness of mind, which is so greatly ornamental to their persons and profession. Let not any man think of himself more highly than he ought to think, but let him think soberly.

4 For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office: 5 So we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another.

Here the apostle lays before us a special reason why the officers of the church should exercise humility towards, and employ their gifts and talents for, the general good and benefit of the church: The argument is drawn from a comparison between the natural body and the mystical body. "As in the natural body there are many members, and every member has its distinct office; the eye to see, the ear to hear, the hand to work, the foot to walk: In like manner, in the mystical body, the church of Christ, there are many members; but each member must keep his own place, and not invade the duty, or usurp the office of another, but every one employ his own proper gift to the benefit and comfort of the whole, without disdain or envying one another." Learn hence, 1. That the church of Christ is one body. 2. That though the body of the church be one, and the head one, yet the members are many, united to Christ their head by faith, and to one another by love. 3. That all believers, which are members of this body, have every one his particular gift, his several function, his proper office, which they are duty to execute and perform, without encroaching upon others by proud curiosity, or busy meddling: But as all the members of the body labour jointly together for the preservation of the whole, so ought all the officers and members of the church to keep their distinct stations, and employ and improve regularly their several talents for the mutual edification and benefit of each other, without encroachment or intruding upon the offices of each other God is a God of order, and hates disorder in his church.

6 Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophecy according to the proportion of faith; 7 Or ministry, let us wait on our ministring: or he that teacheth, on teaching: 8 Or he that exhorteth, on exhortation: he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity; he that ruleth with diligence; he that sheweth mercy, with cheerfulness.

As if our apostle had said, "Seeing it has pleased God to appoint distinct officers in his church, and to furnish those officers with various degrees of gifts, and not to make all equal either in gifts or office, let every one in general faithfully execute his office, and keep within the limits of his calling, neither neglecting his own duty, nor invading another's; in particular, let him that prophesith, that is, expoundeth the scriptures in the church, do it, according to the proportion of faith, or according to what is taught plainly and uniformly in the whole scriptures of the Old and New Testament, as the rule of our faith." We must not rack nor wrest the scriptures, to make them speak what we please, but what the prophets and apostle's taught, whom we interpret; otherwise we do not expound according to the analogy and proportion of faith. "Let him that ministrereth, teacheth, or exhorteth, attend upon that work with all diligence; and he that performs the office of a deacon, who are called helps (1 Cor. xii. 28.) and is employed to relieve the poor out of the church's stock, and to take care of strangers orphans, aged, sick, and impotent persons, let him do it with simplicity, that is, without partiality and respect of persons: And with cheerfulness, that is, with alacrity of heart, with gentleness in words, with pleasantness in countenance, bearing with the infirmities of the aged, with the loathsomeness of sick and diseased, and administering with delight to the necessities of all that want." Now, from the whole, note, 1. That God of his free bounty has beautified his church with divers offices and gifts. 2. That those whom God has bestowed ministerial gifts upon, ought humbly and faithfully to approve them to the church's benefit and edification.

9 Let love be without dissimulation. Abhor that which is evil, cleave to that which is good. 10 Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love; in honour preferring one another;

The foregoing exhortations respected church officers in particular; these that now follow concern all Christians in general, and acquaint them with their duties in common conversation. He begins with the grace and duty of love: that being a radical grace, the root from which all other graces and duties spring and flow. This love to one another, the Holy Ghost requires that it be without dissimulation, that is, sincere and unfeigned, not in word and in tongue only, but in deed and in truth: Also, that it be an affectionate and tender, as well as an unfeigned and sincere love. Be kindly affectioned one to another: The word signifieth such an affectionate tenderness as a mother bears to the fruit of her womb, and as creatures bears to the fruit of their young; and no wonder that such a fervent love is required, when laying down our lives for the brethren is commanded, 1 John iii. 16. Likewise, that our love to others do incline us to give preference unto others; really conceiving others to be more worthy of honour than our selves, and rejoicing to see them placed in a more useful and honourable post than ourselves. Yet note, Though our love must be hot towards our neighbour, it must not hinder us from abhorring that which is sinful and evil in our neighbour: Love without dissimulation, and abhor that which is evil. When we love the persons, we must hate the vices of men. The love of our friends must not make us in love with their faults; nor must the hatred of men's vices draw us off from delighting in, and cleaving to that which is good in any man: abhor that which is evil and cleave to that which is good.

11. Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord.

The next duty referred to, is diligence and industry in all our duties both to God and man, but particularly in the duties of our calling. We must avoid the two extremes, of slothfulness on the one hand; and excessive drudgery on the other, in the management of our secular affairs and worldly business. But in the service of God we must be fervent, as in the service of the world we must not be slothful: What is done by the world, is best done with indifference; but what is done for God, is best done with warmth and fervency, or not done at all. Our most ardent affections and active powers must be employed in his service; for, to be cold and careless therein, disparages his excellency, and will defeat our own expectation. We must be fervent in spirit, serving the Lord; and may not be slothful in business, serving the world.

12. Rejoicing in hope; patient in tribulation; continuing instant in prayer;

The apostle next directs the converted Romans how they should manage themselves under afflictions; namely, to endure them patiently, to rejoice in hope of present deliverance, or future happiness; and, in order to both, to be much in the duty of prayer. Learn hence, That hope, patience, and prayer, are powerful supports under all afflictions, and will render them not only tolerable, but joyous. But patience we possess ourselves; by the hope we possess God; by prayer we are enabled unto both.

13. Distributing to the necessity of saints: given to hospitality.

The next duty exhorted to, is that of charity and almsgiving to the poor members of Jesus Christ, especially, when under persecution; showing hospitality towards them, and giving entertainment to them, when they seek it of us. Learn 1. That charity to all persons, but especially to the persecuted members of Jesus Christ, is a necessary and important duty. 2. That hospitality is an eminent part of Christian charity: True hospitality, I mean, which is accompanied with prudence and sobriety. There is a wide difference between riotous house-keeping and true hospitality; the latter is always designed for the help of the poor, and particularly for the godly poor. There are great house-keepers, who are not good house-keepers, because their house-keeping is rather for the great than the good, not for the household of faith, especially not for the poor of that household. As to spirituals, God fills the hungry with good things, but sends the rich empty away; whereas, most men, as to corporals, fill the rich with their good things, with the fat and the sweet, but send the poor, if not empty away, yet relieved only with the sweepings as of their table. This is not according to the precept before us: Distributing to the necessities of the saints, &c.

14. Bless them which persecute you: bless, and curse not.

The apostle having taught us our duty to our friends in the former verse, teacheth us our duty here towards our enemies. Bless them that persecute you. That is, pray for them and wish well to them, whatever provocation you may have to the contrary. Learn hence, 1. That good men must make account of, and prepare for, persecution; either the persecution of the tongue or of the hand, or both. 2. That it is their duty ever to bless, never to curse, their persecutors and opposers. Bless and curse not. Where note, That the apostle doubles the exhortation. Bless your persecutors: Bless, and curse not. This doubling the exhortation, shews both the difficulty of the duty; how contrary it is to corrupt nature; and also the constancy of the duty, we must ever bless, and never curse; always wish well, never any ill to the worst of men. Take we great heed of giving way to secret wishes to hurt our enemy. God forbid we should hurt ourselves by sinful passion, because others hurt us by slander and false accusation: We are naturally prone to speak ill of others, and to wish ill to others with delight: This sin persisted in, shuts out of heaven as well as murder.

15. Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep.

The next duty required, is Christian sympathy and mutual affection between brethren, both in prosperity and adversity, to rejoice in the one, and to mourn together in the other, as being members of the same body. Teaching us, that it is a Christians duty to rejoice in those good things, whether inward or outward, which befall his brethren, and also to mourn and lay to heart all these afflictions and sorrows whether inward or outward, which come upon them. But, Lord! how far are they from this duty, who, instead of mourning for the sufferings of others, are glad at calamity, rejoice at the downfall of others? Oh! help us to lay the troubles of others to heart, when we ourselves are freest and farthest from trouble: Let us weep with them that weep, and rejoice with them, &c. The gospel acquaints us with the pity of God towards us, and presseth us to pity one another.

16 Be of the same mind one towards another, Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate. Be not wise in your own conceits.

These words, Be ye of the same mind one towards another, are an exhortation to unity among Christians: This is threefold, an unity of the head, or an unity of judgment and opinion; an unity of the heart, or an unity in love and affection; and an unity of the tongue, which is an unity of expression. Happy we! when in all these respects we are of the same mind one towards another. Note next, The hindrances of mutual concord and unity among Christians, and they are two: (1.) Pride, Mind not high things. Arrogancy, Be not wise in your own conceits. Mind not high things. That is mind not preferment, nor riches, nor vain-glory, but be content with, and thankful for, a middle state and condition in the world; which is far more eligible and desirable than a state of riches, plenty and abundance, as being less liable to temptations. And be not wise in your own conceit; that is, entertain humble thoughts of your own knowledge, think it not greater than it is; take heed of an overweening opinion of your own wisdom, as if you wanted neither divine assistance and guidance, nor yet the advice and counsel of your brethren. Man is naturally a proud creature, but more proud of the endowments of his mind, than of those that adorn his body.

17 Recompense to no man evil for evil. Provide things honest in the sight of all men.

By evil here, we are to understand wrongs and private injuries: By not recompensing them, is meant not revenging them. Corrupt nature is very prone to return wrong for wrong, one ill turn for another; but Christianity sets a nobler pattern before us, even the example of him, who when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not, 1 Pet. ii. 23. Provide things honest in the sight of all men. Having exhorted them before to be careful of their conversations towards God, he now presses them to be watchful over their conversations before the world, that by honesty and innocency of life, they may cut off all occasion from the enemies of religion to speak evil of them, and their holy profession; that all their words and actions be justifiable and unexceptionable to that degree that the heathens may be in love with Christianity, by observing their lives and actions to be holy and honest. Learn hence, That a Christian must carefully look, not only to his conscience but to his conversation; that his conscience be holy and upright in the sight of God, and his conversation honest and unblameable before men men, The world cannot discern our hearts, but they can soon discover the errors of our lives, and will throw the dirt of our sins upon religion's face; therefore, we had need provide things honest in the sight of all men.

18 If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men.

Note here, 1. The duty directed and exhorted to, namely, peaceableness; Live peaceably, that is, be of a peaceable temper, and follow those things which make for peace. 2. The extent and latitude of this duty: With all men live peaceably; not with friends only, or with those of your own judgment and persuasion, but with men of disagreeing humours and interests, with men of different principles and apprehensions from you. Again, 4. A double restriction and limitation with which the duty is bounded; first, If it be possible, implying, that there is a sort of men in the world who make peace impossible; but for others, if it may be enjoyed upon honest terms, though upon hard terms, we must not stick at them, always remembering that peace and truth are two precious things, which can never be bought too dear, if they be not purchased with sin and baseness. The second restriction follows, As much as in you lieth; now this respects our endeavours, not our success: If we follow peace with all men, though we cannot overtake it, yet we shall not miss of our reward in pursuing of it. Peace is a more important duty, a singular benefit and blessing, which every Christian is bound to pursue and promote, and that with all men. If it be possible, &c.

19 Dearly beloved avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath. For it is written, Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord.

Note here, How the apostle reinforces his exhortation to all Christians to wath against the sin of private and personal revenge; he urged it before ver. 17. he reinforces it here ver. 19 thereby shewing how prone our corrupt natures are to commit this sin, and how hard the contrary duty is to flesh and blood. The heathens reckoned revenge to be a part of justice, and ranked it amongst the number of their virtues; but the scriptures require, that instead of revenging an injury, we remit and forgive it. Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, it follows, rather give place unto wrath: What wrath? or whose wrath? Ans. Give place to your own wrath, say some interpreters; give way a little, and turn aside from the person you are angry with, and do not suffer your anger to hurry you away to revenge. Give place to the wrath of those that wrong you, say others; decline their wrath, and give not word for word, which will but add fuel to the fire, and oil to the flame. But it seems best to understand it of God's wrath; leave the matter to God, he will right your cause; do not take God's work out of his hand, but suffer him to come in with his wrath upon your enemies, who wrong and injure you; rather give place to the wrath of God against them; for vengeance is his, and he will repay it. Learn hence, That such, who having suffered wrong, do seek to revenge themselves, take revenging work out of God's hand; whereas if they leave the matter with God, his justice will right them fully.

20 Therefore, if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if

if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head.

As if the apostle had said "Instead of revenge, render kindness, return courtesies for injuries, affability for affronts; If thine enemy hunger feed him." The words, as some critics observe, signify to feed cheerfully and tenderly, as birds feed their young ones. So doing, thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head. By coals of fire (1.) Some understand, an heart-melting fire; as if the apostle had said, "By this kindness thou wilt melt and mollify his spirits towards thee, as hardest metals are melted by coals of fire; it must be a very stony heart indeed, that this fire will not mollify: Clemency will melt an enemy, and even force him by a sweet compulsion to become a friend, though of a rough and rugged disposition." (2.) By coals of fire heaped upon the head, others understand a sin-punishing fire. Thou shalt heap coals of fire, that is, the fire of divine vengeance upon his head, by making his malice and hatred against thee more inexcusable. Learn hence, 1. That to conquer and overcome an enemy by love and kindness, is a noble conquest and a glorious victory, to melt him down a noble conquest, and a glorious victory, to melt him down by obliging favours into a good affection. 2. That if an enemy, after such kind offices, will persevere in his enmity against us, the event will certainly be this; by our patience towards him, and forbearance of him, we shall engage the wrath of God against him, and heap coals of fire, that is, the divine vengeance upon him. Therefore if thine enemy hunger feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head.

21 Be not overcome of evil but overcome evil with good.

Learn hence, That every Christian should not only take heed that he be not overcome of evil; but also labour and endeavour what in him lieth to overcome evil for good. Quest. What are we to understand by evil? Ans. Any unkind or injurious dealings from others, any mischief or ill turn which our neighbour has done us. Quest. What is it to be overcome of evil? Ans. 1. When we dwell in our thoughts too much, too often, and too long upon the injuries and unkindnesses we have met with: This is, as if a man that was to take down a bitter pill, should be continually champing of it, and rolling it under his tongue. 2. We are overcome of evil, when we are brought over to commit the same evil, by studying to make spiteful returns in a way of revenge, for the injuries we have received. Question. Wherein consists the duty and excellency of overcoming evil with good. Answer. It renders us like to God, who does good to us daily, though we do evil against him continually; hereby we imitate God in one of the choicest perfections of the divine nature; hereby we overcome ourselves; hereby we overcome our enemies, and make them become our friends. Question. How should we overcome evil with good? Answer. By doing good for evil, by returning courtesies for injuries, speaking well of others, although they speak hardly, yea very ill of us. Be not overcome of evil, &c.

CHAP. XIII.

The apostle having treated of moral duties in the former chapter, treats of political duties in this, proving that magistracy is God's ordinance, for the good of human society, and enforcing the duty of subjection unto magistrates, in obedience to the commandment of God.

LET every soul be subject unto the higher powers, for there is no power but of God: the powers that be, are ordained of God.

Note here, 1. The title given to the magistrates, they are powers, the higher powers, that is, persons invested with power, and placed in supreme authority over us. All mankind is not of one rank, doth not stand upon an equal level. Magistracy is an eminency or superiority of some persons above others. 2. The original fountain from whence all power is derived, and that is God himself; there is no power but of God; that is, all power is derived from God, and is to be used for God; the magistrate acts by his authority, and consequently is to act for his interest, honour and glory. It is agreeable to the will of God, that there should be such a thing as magistracy and government in the world; and it is his appointment that men should be governed by men, deriving the power and authority from him: the powers that be are ordained of God. 3. The apostle's strict injunction for the subjection unto magistracy, as a divine ordinance; Let every soul be subject, that is, every person be he of what rank or in what station he will, high or low, honourable or ignoble, rich or poor, clergy or laity, he must be subject to God's ordinance. Where note, That Christ is a friend to Cæsar, and Christianity no enemy to loyalty; the best Christians are always the best subjects; none so true to their prince, as they that are most faithful to their God: Obedience to magistrates is both the duty of Christians, and the interest of Christianity.

2 Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation.

The forementioned duty of subjection unto magistracy, insisted upon in the foregoing verse, the apostle urges and enforces upon all Christians, by sundry arguments in this and the following verses: As, namely, (1.) From the sinfulness of resistance; they resist the ordinances of God: they make war upon God himself; he that rebelleth against his prince, is a rebel also to his God. (2.) From the danger of resistance: They shall receive to themselves damnation. That is, 1. Temporal judgment from the hand of the magistrate, to whom the sword is committed, as Korah, Absalom, and others did experience. 2. Eternal punishment from the hand of God, who will plead the cause, and vindicate the honour of his vicegerents and representatives here upon earth, and cast those into hell, who pour contempt upon them, if sincere repentance by a timely interposition prevent it not.

3 For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power? do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same :

Here we have a further account for subjection to rulers and governors, drawn from the end of the magistrate's office, which is to punish vice, and to promote virtue: Rulers are not a terror to good works; that is, they ought not, and they ordinarily are not: they were not ordained for that end, and it is not their place so to be, namely, a terror to the good, but to the bad only; for God giveth no authority against himself, or his own righteous laws, which require the punishing of the bad, and the rewarding of the good. Learn hence, 1. That magistrates by virtue of their place, ought to be a terror, or exceeding terrible, to evil works and evil workers. 2. That magistrates are not terrible, but amiable to good men; they fear rulers, but it is with a fear of reverence, not with a tormenting, servile fear. Do that which is good, and thou shalt not be afraid of the power.

3 For he is the minister of God to thee for good. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doth evil.

Here our apostle subjoins a reason, why a magistrate is not to be unadly dreaded and feared by his subjects who live well; for he is by his institution the minister of God to thee for good, if thou beest a doer of that which is good. Learn hence, That the magistrate is the minister of God for the good of them over whom he is set, especially of them that are virtuous and good; he is a shield to the golly, a husband to the widow, a father to the orphan, a patron to the poor, and a refuge to the oppressed. Note farther, How the magistrate is set forth with the ensign of terror to evil-doers; he has a sword put into his hand by God himself, a sword to wound, not a wooden dagger to scare offenders barely; and a sword not rusting in the scabbard but drawn and whetted; he must shew it, and strike with it upon a just occasion, and make those feel it who are not awed with the sight of it: He beareth not the sword in vain. Again, Though the magistrate is said to bear a sword, yet he is never called a sword, but a shield often; a shield is for defence, a sword for destruction, intimating that the magistrate's power should rather be executed in protection, than destruction; magistrates have swords, but they are shields, and not swords; they have a sword to cut off evil doers; God help them to draw it upon atheism and blasphemy, upon vice and immorality: One hearty stroke of the magistrate's sword would smite error and vice more than a thousand sermons. Lastly, The magistrate is said not to snatch or take the sword, but to bear the sword: He doth not wrest it out of the hand of another, but it is put into his hand by God himself: the commission to bear the sword is from God; the magistrate doth not hold his authority by virtue of the sword, but he holds his sword by virtue of his authority: When he draweth the sword, it is not merely backed with an arm of flesh, but with a warrant and commission signed by God himself; He beareth the sword.

5 Wherefore ye must needs be subject not only for wrath, but also for conscience sake.

Here the apostle doth again assert the necessity of subjection to the civil magistrate, seeing that magistracy is God's ordinance, for the good of human society; seeing that the sword in the magistrate's hand is backed and edged with God's authority, therefore there is a necessity of subjection unto magistracy and magistrates; and that for a double reason; for fear of wrath and punishment from man, and from a principle of conscience, in obedience to the command of God: We must be subject, not only for wrath, that is, not only for fear of man's wrath, but for conscience sake; that is, with respect to the command of God, which has made subjection our indispensable duty.

6 For, for this cause pay you tribute also: for they are God's ministers, attending continually upon this very thing.

From the duty of subjection unto magistrates, the apostle proceeds to urge and enforce the duty and necessity of paying tribute to them, or allowing them an honourable maintenance, for and towards the support of the government which they sustain and bear. The payment of taxes and tribute to the supreme magistrate is necessary upon several accounts: 1. As it is an acknowledgment of the power which God hath set over us: 2. As it tends to the support of the government which we live under: 3. As it is a small recompense for the governor's continual care and industry, he attending, that is, watching perpetually, and taking pains continually, for procuring and maintaining the good and happiness of his subjects; and therefore, both duty and obligation, both religion and gratitude, do bind and engage us to assist him, and, so far as it is in our power, to requite and reward him for his care of the common safety, and regard to the public good.

7 Render therefore to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; custom, to whom custom; fear, to whom fear; honour, to whom honour.

A twofold duty towards magistrates is here laid down by our apostle, namely, maintenance and reverence: (1.) There is due unto them maintenance. Tribute and custom is payable to them for that purpose, and not without great reason and obligation; for he is the minister of God for our good, that is, an instrument under God to preserve our blessings to us; and farther, because such supplies are necessary to defray those vast expences, which they are constrained to bear, for the security and welfare of their subjects. Taxes, tribute, and custom, are not so much gifts, as due debts to princes, which by the command of God are to be justly and cheerfully paid unto them, and which cannot, without sin and injustice, be denied to them, or perjured from them: To cheat our prince is as great a sin in the sight of God, as to rob our father though few think it so: Render tribute to whom tribute is due. Again, (2.) There is reverence as well as maintenance due to magistrates; itates; Render fear to whom fear, and honour to whom honour is due. Fear denotes inward reverence, and honour outward respect. Fear is the magistrate's due by reason of his authority, and honour by reason of his dignity. Here note, That the apostle is thus particular and express in asserting the rights of princes, and assigning the proper duties of subjects towards them, because the Jews held opinions which were destructive of all civil government; as namely, that they being the only people of God, God alone was to be owned as their Lord and Governor, and none under him, but such as should be immediately chosen by him; and as a consequent of this, they refused to pay tribute to Cæsar looking upon that as a token of subjection to him. Therefore the apostle here presses the Christians at Rome to shew their freedom from, and opposition to all such pernicious principles, and to give the world a convincing proof that Christianity makes the best men, the best magistrates the best subjects of any religion in the world.

8 I Owe no man any thing, but to love one another: for he that loveth another, hath fulfilled the law.

Our apostle having finished his exhortation to duty towards our superiors, comes now to enforce the duties which we owe unto our neighbours; the first of which is, to render and pay every one what is due unto him. Moral duties are mutual debts which we owe one another; one of which, namely, that of love, we can never fully discharge but must ever be paying, yet always owing. Owe nothing to any man, but love, implying that we must be always owing. The truth is, this debt of love is so far from a possibility of being paid on earth, that it is due in heaven to God, angels, and saints: There abideth charity, 1 Cor. xiii. 13. All other debts but this may be paid whilst we live. Note, The argument, reason, or motive, to excite unto this duty, and that is drawn from the excellency of this grace of love: He that loveth, hath fulfilled the law; that is, he that loveth his neighbour as he should and ought to do, indeed and in truth, out of a pure heart fervently, he hath fulfilled the law, that is, the law relating to his neighbour; the duties of the second table are fulfilled by him.

9 For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. 10. Love worketh no ill to his neighbour: therefore love is the fulfilling of the law.

Two particulars are here observable, namely, a proposition asserted, that love is the fulfilling of the law; and this proposition proved by an induction and enumeration of particular duties belonging to the second table. Observe, 1. The proposition asserted and maintained by the apostle, ver. 8, 10. namely, that love is the fulfilling of the law. "But can the law be said to be fulfilled by us? If so, in what sense?" Ans. By the law here, we are certainly to understand that branch of the moral law which respects our duty to our neighbour. All our duty to men is virtually comprehended in loving them as ourselves; as no man will hurt himself, so neither will he hurt his neighbour, if he loveth him as himself: Thus love is the complement or fulfilling of the law relating to our neighbour. The church of Rome would infer from hence, that a person may keep the law of God perfectly, and without the least deficiency. But note, He that loveth keepeth the law: How keepeth? Even as he loveth: If he loveth perfectly, he keepeth the law perfectly; but if his love be imperfect, (as is the best on this side heaven) then he is fulfilling of the law imperfect also: Perfect fulfilling of the law is what we should labour after, but whilst in an imperfect state we cannot attain unto: yet such is the grace of God in the gospel, as to account sincerity in stead of perfection, and to esteem unfeigned love to our neighbour the fulfilling of the law, or all the duties of the second table. Observe, 2. This proposition is proved by an induction and enumeration of particular duties belonging to the second table; Thou shalt not commit adultery; thou shalt not kill, thou shalt not steal, nor bear false witness, nor covet; where all injury is forbidden to be done to our neighbour, in his name, in his estate, marriage-right, &c. and this is called the fulfilling of the law. "But how can that be? Is the law fulfilled by mere negatives, by doing no hurt to our neighbours? Is not doing them all the good we can required also?" Ans. Yes, no doubt: When the apostle says, Love worketh no ill to his neighbour, it is implied, that love doth all possible good to his neighbour, as well as worketh no ill; though the negatives are only mentioned, yet the affirmatives are also included.

11 I And that, knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep: for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed.

Here begins the last part of the chapter, which treats of our duty towards ourselves, namely, sobriety, temperance, mortification of sin, and all the works of darkness, such as rioting and drunkenness, chambering and wantonness, and the like, and the argument or motive which the apostle uses in this verse to excite and quicken the converted Romans to the last mentioned duties, is drawn from the consideration of their present state and condition; they were believers, the gospel light was risen upon them, and they were nearer salvation now, than when they first believed: Now is your salvation nearer than when you believed. This, by the way, is a meditation full of comfort to a gracious person; every breath he draws, draws him a degree nearer to perfect happiness; he is nearer heaven, nearer his reward than when in the infancy of his faith; therefore let him gird up the loins of his mind, and be more cheerful and more laborious in his Lord's work. Lord! how transporting is it to thy faithful ones to consider how small a matter is betwixt them and their complete salvation! No sooner is their breath gone, but the full desire of their souls is come; their salvation is near, very near, much nearer than when they first believed. But, oh! what a meditation of terror to a wicked person! his damnation is nearer, and every hour nearer and nearer; there is but a puff of breath betwixt him and hell; ere long his last breath and his last hope will expire together. Lord! give sinners hearts to confide, confide, that a graceless man ere long will be a hopeless man; the state he was born in was sad, the state he is now in is worse, but the state he will shortly be in, without conversion, will be unspcakably worst of all; his damnation is near, it slumbereth not.

12 The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light. 13 Let us walk honestly as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying.

Note here, 1. The apostle puts the Romans in mind of their former state before conversion, when the night of heathenish ignorance and darkness was upon them, when they spent their time and strength in rioting and drunkenness, in lasciviousness and wantonness. Where mark, The odious character wherewith sin is branded; it is darkness, a work of darkness; so styled, because sin originally springs from darkness, because it naturally delights in darkness, because it ultimately leads to eternal darkness. Note, 2. How he puts them in mind of their present state and condition since the day-star of the gospel did dawn upon them: the night is far spent, and the day is at hand; that is, the night of heathenish ignorance, blindness, and darkness, is in great measure past and over, and the day of grace and salvation is come unto you; the gospel light is among you, illuminating grace and saving knowledge is now found with you. 3. The duties enjoined answerable to the privileges enjoyed, and that is, to walk as the children of day, soberly, righteously, and godly, abstaining from all intemperance and excess in every kind, and being clothed with all Christian virtues and graces, which are called armor of light; armor, because they defend us against the attempts of sin, Satan, and the world, and all our spiritual enemies whatsoever; and armor of light, because such christian graces are bright and shining in the eyes of the world. Learn hence: 1. That the enjoyment of gospel light lays a person or a people under special obligations to cast off the works of darkness. 2. That such as enjoy the light and liberty of the gospel, ought to walk as becometh the gospel which they do enjoy, that is, according to the precepts and commands of the gospel, answerable to the helps and supplies of grace which the gospel affords, and answerable to those high and glorious hopes which the gospel raises the Christian up to the expectation of: This is to cast off the works of darkness, &c.

14 But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof.

Observe here, The apostle doth not say as the moral philosopher would have said, "Instead of rioting and drunkenness, chambering and wantonness, put on temperance, put on sobriety, put on chastity, and so let a single virtue against a single vice;" but, "Put on the Lord Jesus Christ, seek by faith union with him, that so you may derive virtue from him, to enable you unto holy walking before him. Set the doctrine and life of Christ continually before you; follow every instruction, and imitate all the parts of his holy conversation; even as the garment is commensurate to the body, Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ:" May not the expression imply, 1. That the soul of man, since the fall, is in a naked state, destitute of those divine graces of the Holy Spirit, which were its original clothing in the day of undefiled innocency? 2. That Jesus Christ is our spiritual clothing? (1.) In his righteousness, to pardon and justify us: He is our clothing, to cover the guilt of sin out of God's sight. (2.) In his grace, to sanctify us, by which he cleanses us from our sins, pollution, and filthiness. (3.) That Jesus Christ, in order to our spiritual clothing, must be put on by faith: An unapplied Christ justifies none, saves none. It was not sufficient under the law, that the blood of the sacrifice was shed, but it was also to be sprinkled, in order to the expiation of guilt. The personal application of Christ's blood by faith on our part, is as absolutely necessary to salvation, as the shedding of blood on his part, in order to our remission and salvation. Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ: It follows, and makes no provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof. Note, The apostle doth not say, Make no provision for the flesh, to fulfil the necessities, and the necessary desires thereof: But to fulfil the lusts or the inordinate desires thereof. Then only is provision for the flesh sinful and unlawful, when it is sought more to satisfy its appetite, and to gratify inordinate desires, than to strengthen and fit us for our duty to God and man. In this latter sense, to make provision for the flesh, is to furnish our enemy with arms and ammunition to fight against ourselves. Interpretatively, he makes provision for his lusts, that doth not provide against them; he feeds his lusts, that doth not starve them; he nourishes and strengthens his lusts, that doth not mortify and kill them: Explicitly and directly, men provide for their lusts, by entertaining such thoughts in their minds, as do kindle, excite, and stir up lust; and when those thoughts are gratified with desires, and those desires accompanied with endeavours; but worst and saddest of all it is, when men's desires to gratify their lusts are turned into prayers unto God Almighty, in order to that end. Thus the apostle, James iv. 3. Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts. Learn hence, 1. That a sober and moderate use of the creatures which God has given us, not barely for necessity, but delight, is allowable, and a commanded duty. 2. That to make use of the comforts of life, not to satisfy our natures, but to gratify our lusts and inordinate desires, is a perverting of God's intention, in bestowing the supports of life upon us, and a very heinous sin. Make we then no provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof.

C H A P. XIV.

The apostle, in this chapter, treats of things of an indifferent nature, neither commanded nor forbidden by any divine law, and speaks of the right use of our Christian liberty. The Gentiles looking upon the Jews as superstitious, and the Jews censuring the Gentiles as profane, St. Paul admitts the believing Jews, not to condemn the believing Gentiles; and exhorts the believing Gentiles, not to refuse communion with the believing Jews; and thus, by a mutual forbearance, to hold the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

HIM that is weak in the faith receive you, but not to doubtful disputations.

Observe here, 1. The person described, whom the apostle recommends to their charity and forbearance; Him that is weak in the faith: Not him that is sick unto death through fundamental error, but one that is sound in the faith, though weak in judgment: men of honest hearts, but weak heads. Observe, 2. Here is an injunction of charity and Christian forbearance towards these weak ones; Receive them, take them into your houses, yea, into your hearts; receive them into your society, into your communion, and let not difference in judgment cause any distance in affection. 3. The limitation of this injunction; Receive him, but not to doubtful disputations; that is, "Do not quarrel or contend with him about his opinions, or fill his head full of curious and intricate questions, or trouble him with doubtful disputes." Learn hence, That Christians are to receive such as are weak in the faith, into their hearts by love, without troubling their heads with perplexing disputes. Weak Christians cannot well judge of arguments: And practical piety, and Christian love, will much sooner rectify the judgment of the weak, than fierce argumentations.

2 For one believeth that he may eat all things: another, who is weak, eateth herbs. 3 ¶ Let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not; and let not him which eateth not, judge him that eateth; for God hath received him.

Here the apostle declares the ground of difference that was between them; namely, the difference of meats. One thought all meats to be lawful under the gospel; another, rather than eat any meats forbidden by the law, will eat only herbs. Where observe, How the church of God, in all ages, has been strangely divided about little and indifferent things. What jars and stirs were there between the Eastern and Western churches, about the observation of Easter? About the celebrating the Lord's supper with leavened or unleavened bread? And verily, the fatal evils which our hot contentions have occasioned amongst ourselves, only about indifferent rites and ceremonies, tears of blood are not sufficient to bewail. Note, next, the apostle's exhortation to the two contending parties, not to villify or set at nought one another, condemning each other as humorous and scrupulous, much less as obstinate and wilful; but especially not upon this occasion to separate from, or break communion with each other. Let not him that eateth all kinds of meats, despise him, that through weakness durst not eat of any. As if the apostle had said, "Whilst there is error in our understandings, weakness in our judgments, narrowness in our faculties, differences will arise in the church of God: But take care, that where there is no compliance, that yet there may be peace: Despise not, judge not one another." Observe, lastly, The reason our apostle offers, why they should receive their weak brother; because God hath received him. God, that is most holy, and hateth sin, receiveth such; therefore, so must you, if you please God. Why should you refuse to hold communion with such who hold communion with God?

4 Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? To his own master he standeth or falleth. Yea, he shall be holden up; for God is able to make him stand.

Another reason is here produced, why we should not rashly censure or judge our brother differing in judgment from us about lesser things; namely, because he is God's servant, and it is God's sentence, and not our's, which he must fall or stand by: and if these differences shall not hinder God's acceptance of him to salvation, why should they hinder us in accepting of him into our communion? To love, is our duty; to judge, is God's prerogative: Let it be more in charity, and less in censure. Learn, That the scripture forbids us to judge one another, as having no grace, for the doing or not doing of those things, which are consistent with a present state of grace.

5 One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. 6 He that regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it. He that eateth, eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks; and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks.

The second case, as to indifferent things, is about the observation of days. Many of the believing Jews could not be taken off from solemnizing those feasts which were of God's own founding and instituting among the Jews. Another looked upon them truly as abrogated by Christ. Now, the apostle advises, that neither the one nor the other, neither he that regardeth, nor he that regardeth not those days, should be judged or hardly censured for so doing, because he acts therein according to the direction of his conscience. He that, according to his light, doth either eat or not eat such meats, keep or not keep such days, intends or designs it as an act of obedience to God; praying for, and giving thanks unto, Almighty God for his acceptance. So then, if they both aim at the same end, they ought not to condemn one another for each other's act. Learn hence, That persons, disagreeing with us, and differing from us in lesser things, from a real principle of conscience, firmly persuaded, that what they do, or refuse to do, is for the glory of God, and out of a sincere desire to please him, ought not to be judged by us, but left to the righteous judgment of the heart-searching God.

7 For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself. 8 For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live therefore or die, we are the Lord's.

Here our apostle proves what he had before asserted, that Christians, in their particular actions, have a special regard to the Lord and his honour, because they devote themselves, selves, living and dying, to the service of him and his glory : None of us, Christians, lives unto himself, but we spend our lives in his service ; neither do we die unto ourselves, nor when we please, but when he appoints : Therefore, living or dying, we are his. From the words absolutely considered, we may learn, That the best evidence we can have that we are Christ's servants, is this, when we make our aim and scope, our design and care, to live and die unto Christ our Lord, and not unto ourselves. Quest. " But when may we be said to live unto the Lord, and die unto the Lord?" Ans. When we do not frame our lives after our own wills, but according to the word and will of God, making that the rule and ground of all our actions ; when the great end why we desire life, is to do service for Christ on earth, and to be fitted by him for the fruition of him in heaven. Finally, then, we live and die unto the Lord, when we are willing to be at the disposal of God ; both for life and death ; and this as to time, manner, and means ; yea, all circumstances whatsoever, both of life and death. When a man is willing to lay down his life for the Lord, or at the call of the Lord, it is a certain evidence, that he liveth and dieth to the Lord.

9 For to this end Christ both died and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living. 10 But why dost thou judge thy brother ? or why dost thou set at nought thy brother ? for we shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ. 11 For it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God. 12 So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God.

Three things are here observable : 1. that Jesus Christ, by virtue of his meritorious passion, and glorious resurrection, was constituted Lord of all things, and has power to judge all persons. To this end Christ died, rose again, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living ; That is, be the judge and rewarder of all mankind. 2 That to this supreme and absolute Lord every one of us must give an account of our actions, and from him receive our final doom : We shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ. 3. The argument which the apostle draws from hence to dissuade us from censuring and judging one another ; and that is drawn from the consideration of the last and final judgment, which we are all hastening apace unto. Why dost thou judge thy brother ? We shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ. As if the apostle had said, " Let there be a mutual forbearance among Christians : Do not rashly judge, and uncharitably censure one another, because in some little things you differ from each other. What though your brother cannot in conscience comply with your opinion and practice ? must you presently accule him of stomach, and condemn him for stubbornness, calling his non-compliance obstinacy and humour, pride and singularity, which he calls conscience towards God ? Remember the judge standeth at the door, and you must suddenly stand before the judgment-seat of Christ ; where every one of us must give an account of himself to God." Where note, The universality of the subjects rendering this account ;

every one of us : The subject-matter of which the account must be rendered ; and that is, of ourselves : As also the designation and description of the person unto whom this account must be rendered ; and that is, to the all-seeing and heart-searching God ; to God the Creator, but especially to Christ the Lord, the Redeemer, who is such a judge as the power of the mightiest cannot daunt ; such a judge as the riches of the wealthiest cannot bribe ; such a judge as the subtlety of the wisest cannot delude ; such a judge as there is no appealing from, no repealing of his sentence : Therefore, judge nothing before the time, &c.

13 ¶ Let us not therefore judge one another any more : but judge this rather, that no man put a stumbling-block, or an occasion to fall, in his brother's way. 14 I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing unclean of itself : but to him that esteemeth any thing to be unclean, to him it is unclean, 15 But if thy brother be grieved with thy meat, now walkest thou not charitably. Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died. 16 Let not then your good be evil spoken of.

Observe here, 1. How the apostle advises persons to be very cautious in the use of their Christian liberty ; Put not a stumbling-block, or an occasion of falling, into your brother's way. Learn hence, That to use our Christian liberty when it may be an occasion of sin, by laying a stumbling-block before others, although we do not use it with an intent or purpose to make them stumble, is very sinful. 2. The apostle's final determination concerning those meats, which some of the Jews scrupled as unclean ; I am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing unclean of itself. The difference and distinction of meats, as clean and unclean, was taken away by our Lord Jesus Christ. 3. That although the apostle pronounces that there is no meat unclean in itself, yet notwithstanding this, to him that esteemeth any thing unclean, to him, as to the use of it, it is unclean. 4. With what tenderness the apostle directs all Christians to carry themselves towards their weaker brethren, even to the abridging themselves of their lawful liberty in the use of different things, rather than give the weak occasion of offence. If thy brother be grieved with thy meat, (though no meat be unclean of itself) yet in eating thou dost amiss, for three reasons : (1.) Because it is against the laws of charity so to act in things indifferent : If thy brother be grieved, now walkest thou uncharitably. (2.) Because it is the way to occasion him to sin, and consequently to do what in us lies to bring destruction upon him for whom Christ died : Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died. (3.) Because eating thus with offence to the weak, causeth Christian liberty, purchased by Christ, to be evil spoken of before the world : Let not then your good be evil spoken of. The sum of the whole is this, to show how uncharitable, unsafe, and unchristian a thing it is to make such an undue use of our Christian liberty, as may occasion our weak brother to fall or stumble drink, but righteousness; and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

That is, "The spiritual kingdom of God and Christ in the world, consisteth not in these little things of meat and drink, but in righteousness toward God and our neighbour; in peace, that is, in peaceableness of disposition, in Christian love concord and unity; and in joy in the Holy Ghost, that is in the joyful sense of the love of God, shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost. In these things Christianity consists." Learn hence, That the essence of Christianity and the life of religion, is far from consisting in little and indifferent things; and therefore, for persons to lay a mighty stress upon them, one way or the other, is neither wise nor safe. 2. That righteousness and holiness, charity and peaceableness, love and joy, and such-like fruits of the Holy Spirit; these are the great things wherein Christianity or the kingdom of Christ consists, and in which the life and soul of religion is found: The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness, and peace, &c.

18 For he that in these things serveth Christ, is acceptable to God, and approved of men.

He that in these things, that is, in righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, serveth Christ, is acceptable to God: That is, this shews and evidences that he is a person accepted of God and approved of men of wise charitable, and good men; yea, the natural consciences of men in general will applaud and approve what is done by him, notwithstanding the fore-mentioned difference in lesser things concerning meats and days. Learn hence, That the love and practice of religious duties, such as righteousness and peace, is a clear and strong argument of a person's acceptance with God. Learn, 2. That such as are for those things accepted by God, ought by no means, for differing from us in lesser things, to be disowned of us and cast out of communion by us.

19. Let us therefore follow after the things which make for peace, and things wherewith one may edify another.

This verse is an inference drawn from the foregoing discourse, "seeing the kingdom of God, or our common Christianity, doth not consist either in the doing or declining of these little indifferent things, let us by no means hazard the peace of the church, or break communion with such as in their sentiments differ from us; much less let us despise and set at nought: each other, upon the account of these small, yet unhappy differences: But let us earnestly pursue the things that make for the common peace of all Christians, and the things by which we may further each other's edification and salvation. Learn hence, That in case of any emergent differences amongst Christians, it ought to be the joint care and endeavour of all and every one to pursue the things which make for peace, and that this peace be such as will consist with, and greatly help forward the good of the church: Let us follow after the things which make for peace, and things wherewith one may edify another.

20 For meat destroy not the work of God. All things indeed are pure; but it is evil for that man who eateth with offence.

That is, "For meat destroy not thou the work of God. Do not thou, for so inconsiderable a matter as eating is, endanger the Christianity of thy brother, or hazard the peace of the church, and cause any through scandal to fall off from their Christian profession. If any of you say, that all meats are clean, and therefore lawful; in answer, they are certainly so in themselves, but yet it is your sin, if you use them to the scandal and offence of others, that are not satisfied with the lawfulness of them." It is most certainly the duty of Christians to deny themselves the use of their Christian liberty in some things; when by making use of it, they may endanger many of their brethren, by causing them to fall from their own steadfastness.

21 It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor any thing whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak.

It is not good; that is, it is not charitable to make use of any part of our Christian liberty, when by so doing any weak Christian is offended, discouraged, and driven from his profession, and brought to any kind of sin. And if it be a Christian's obliged duty to forbear the use of indifferent things, when it is a scandal to the weak; how much more is it a duty to avoid obtruding and imposing such things, to the scandal, offence, and hurt of others?

22 Hath thou faith? have it to thyself before God. Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth.

Here the apostle answers an objection, Some might be ready to say, "That they had faith, that is, a firm and full persuasion, that it is lawful for them to eat those meats, which others judged to be sinful; and therefore it is necessary that they profess it, and own it, and assert their liberty." The apostle answers, "Hast thou more knowledge than he, to believe those things to be lawful, which he apprehends to be sinful? Keep thy knowledge and belief to thyself, to justify thy actions before God, but use it not to the hurt and prejudice of others; for he is a happy man, that when he knows a thing to be lawful, doth so use his liberty about it, as not to offend others, or condemn himself; for that is a sad kind of knowledge which is used to destroy others, and condemn ourselves. Such Christians as have different sentiments from their brethren, as to the matter of indifferent things especially, ought to keep their judgement and opinion to themselves, and not to hazard the peace of the church by an imprudent publication: Hast thou faith? Have it to thyself.

23 And he that doubteth, is damned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith: for whatsoever is not of faith is sin.

That is, "He that doubteth whether he should eat or no, and yet eats, is condemned of himself, because he doth a thing when he is not satisfied of its lawfulness; for whatsoever is not done of faith, that is, with a persuasion that it is lawful, is to him that does it undoubtedly sinful.

Whatever

Whatever a man does, believing it to be a sin, is certainly a sin in him. Here observe, That an erring conscience binds us to do nothing against it. A scrupulous conscience is a troublesome one, but it is better than a presumptuous conscience. As we must not nourish our scruples and doubts, so neither must we act against our scruples and doubts. In short, no man is to act contrary to his own conscience; but then it is as much his duty to inform his conscience, as to follow his conscience. To act against conscience, is a very great sin; but a man may act according to his conscience, and yet be a very great sinner. St. Paul, when he was a bloody persecutor, tells us he acted according to his conscience: Acts xxxvi. 9. I verily thought with myself, that I ought to do many things against the name of Jesus of Nazareth. Pray we then for a conscience rightly informed by the word of God; and that we may so follow the dictates and directions of it whilst we live, that it may neither reprove nor reproach us when we come to die.

C H A P. XV.

Our apostle in the former part of this chapter proceeds upon the same argument, and prosecutes the same design, as in the foregoing chapter, exhorting the stronger Christians, to bear with the infirmities of their weaker brethren; and this from the example of Jesus Christ; And accordingly he bespeaks them thus:

WE then that are strong, ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves. 2 ¶ Let every one of us please his neighbour for his good to edification. 3 For even Christ pleased not himself; but, as it is written, The reproaches of them that reproached thee fell on me.

Observe here, 1. A great doctrine asserted, and a special duty declared, namely, that the strong, that is, such as do thoroughly understand their Christian liberty, should bear with the infirmities, the ignorance, frowardness, and scrupulousness of the weak, and also forbear the doing of that which may scandalize and hurt the souls of men who have not the same measures of knowledge with ourselves: The strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak. 2. The universality of the duty: We, that is, not only all private Christians, but all church-governors: He puts himself into the number, that he may propose himself as an example of the following duty; We, that are the officers, the pastors and governors of the church, like parents who bear with children in their waywardness, so must we bear, though not with heresies in doctrines, or ceremonies in practice, yet with such errors and mistakes, in both, as proceed from ignorance, or common infirmities. 3. A farther duty urged and enforced, namely, not to please ourselves, but others; Let every one of us not please ourselves, but our neighbours; that is, not please ourselves by insisting upon the use of our lawful liberty, but rather, for the sake of others, depart a little from our own rights. Yet, 4. The limitation and restriction of this duty, for his good to edification. It is not simply and absolutely said, "Let every one please his neighbour." The heretic, the drunkard, and others, would like that well, to have every one speak and act as they do. But the rule is, to please every man for his good to edification; thus far we may please them, but no farther. Edification is the rule, scope, and boundary of all our complacency in, and compliance with others. 5. How the apostle urges and enforces this duty, from the example of Jesus Christ: He pleased not himself, therefore such as profess faith in him, must study to be as he was: Nothing was more remote from Christ when here on earth, than self-seeking and self-pleasing; he did not consult his own ease or satisfaction, but rather respected others benefit than his own; yea, he was so far from pleasing of himself, that he did willingly expose himself to all the reproaches and contumelies of men, in obedience to his Father's will; and was so tender of God the Father's honour, that all the reproaches which fell upon the one, afflicted the other: The reproaches of them that reproached thee fell on me. Now from the whole we note, That Christians ought to be very tender towards one another in the use of their lawful liberty: they must not do whatever they please in things of an indifferent nature, without shewing any regard to others; much less should they please themselves in a proud reflecting upon their own knowledge, and in contemning those that have not so great a latitude and liberty as themselves: We that are strong, ought to bear the infirmities, &c.

4 For whatsoever things were written afore-time, were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope.

The apostle here informs us what is the general use of the holy scriptures, and what is the particular reason for which they were written: namely, 1. For instruction, they were written for our learning; all the precepts, promises, threatenings, rewards, and punishments, recorded in the scriptures, are for our information, conviction, and direction. 2. They were written for our comfort and consolation also, that we through patience and comfort of them might have hope; that is, that we through patience in bearing the like censures and reproaches, which we find the scripture-saints have borne before us, might have hope of being rewarded as they were for it: Learn hence, That the great end for which the holy scriptures were written, was the informing of our judgments, and the directing of our practice, that by the examples which we find there of the patience of holy men under sufferings, and of God's relieving and comforting them in their distresses, we might have hope, yea, comfort and assurance, that God will also comfort and relieve us, under the like pressures and burdens.

5 Now the God of patience and consolation grant you to be like minded one towards another, according to Christ Jesus: 6 That ye may with one mind and one mouth glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Observe here, 1. How the apostle concludes his foregoing exhortation, with vetive supplications, and fervent prayer: the ministers of God must follow the word they deliver with prayer: they must not only wrestle with their people but they must wrestle with God for, and in behalf of their people, if they ever hope to overcome. 2. The prayer and supplication supplication itself, and that is, for concord and unity among Christians; That they may with one mind and one mouth, glorify God; that in their Christian assemblies they may all worship God after the same manner; and not one this way, and another that. Unity among Christians in common conversation, but especially in church-communion, is a very desirable mercy, and much to be prayed for, by the ministers of God. 3. How the apostle addresses himself in prayer to God for this mercy under a double title. As a God of patience, The God of patience grant you to be like-minded; intimating, (1.) What great need there is of patience, in order to maintain love and unity among Christians; And, (2.) That God must be applied to in prayer, who is the author of it, to produce and work this grace of patience, in order unto peace and unity among Christians: The God of patience grant you to be like-minded. The unity of the saints greatly depends upon the exercise of patience one towards another: and that they might attain it, he begs the God of patience to give it. (3.) Our apostle joins with this another title, namely, the God of consolation; wherein he points them to that abundant comfort, which would refuse to themselves from such a blessed unity, continued and maintained by the mutual exercises of patience and forbearance one towards another; The God of patience and consolation grant you to be like-minded one towards another. Observe, 4. The great pattern and example which he lays before them to excite and quicken them to this duty, namely, the example of Christ himself; according to Christ Jesus, that is, according to the example of Christ Jesus: As if the apostle had said, "Let us consider how the Lord Jesus bears with us, how many thousand infirmities and failings doth he find in the best of us, yet he is pleased to maintain communion with us; and shall not we after his example do the like, that thereby God may be eminently glorified by us?" 5. How God is called the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, ver. 6. (1.) As he begat him by an eternal and ineffable generation. (2.) As he was man, so he created him, St. Luke i. 35. (3.) As Mediator, so he appointed him to, and qualified him for that office. And eternally magnified be omnipotent love, that the comfort of this compellation redounds to us! for, as he is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, so he is in him our Father also, our merciful, our gracious and loving Father: May we ever demean ourselves towards him as dutiful and obedient children!

7. Wherefore receive ye one another, as Christ also received us, to the glory of God.

Here our apostle concludes the argument which he had hitherto insisted upon in this and the former chapter, namely, That all christians, both strong and weak, should mutually forbear one another, and that both Jew and Gentile should receive each other into fellowship and communion, without contention about things of an indifferent nature; Wherefore receive ye one another. And, to enforce his exhortation he propounds the example of our Lord Jesus Christ: Receive one another, as Christ received us; that is, after the example of Christ, who puts no difference between Jew and Gentile, but receives both, and bears with the infirmities of both: Which action in Christ and the imitation of faith in us, will much redound to the glory of God; his declarative and manifestative glory being much promoted by this concord and union with and among all his members, of what denomination soever they are, whether believing Jews or Gentiles, Learn hence, 1. That the Lord Jesus Christ has given full and ample demonstration of his great and wonderful love unto his church and people. 2. That this love of Christ towards all his children and people ought to be improved by them, as an argument to love one another; Receive one another, as Christ received us. 3. That christians receiving, embracing, and loving one another, and bearing with one another's weaknesses and infirmities, according to Christ's example and command, will contribute exceedingly to the honour and glory of Almighty God, and to the abundant consolation and satisfaction of each other: Wherefore receive ye one another, as Christ also received us, to the glory of God.

8 Now I say that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers: 9 And that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy: as it is written. For this cause I will confess to thee among the Gentiles, and sing unto thy name, 10 And again he saith, Rejoice, ye Gentiles, with his people. 11 And again, Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles; and laud him all ye people. 12 And again Esaias saith, There shall be a root of Jesse, and he that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles: in him shall the Gentiles trust.

The apostle had, in the foregoing verse, propounded the example of Christ, in receiving both Jew and Gentile to his grace and favour, as an argument to persuade all christians to receive one another: Now, in the verses before us, he declares how, and after what manner Christ received both Jews and Gentiles. As for the Jews, first, whom he calls the circumcision, the apostle telleth us, that Jesus was their minister; that is, he was circumcised like them, conversed generally with them, and exercised his ministry among them, according to the many promises which God had made to the Jewish patriarchs; and thus he shewed his love and mercy to the Jews in the days of his flesh. Then, secondly, As to the Gentiles; he affirms, that, according to the several prophecies and promises in the Old Testament, they were called and received to mercy by our Lord Jesus Christ, the partition-wall being by him broken down, and Jew and Gentile become one sheep-fold, under one Shepherd. Now, from the truth and faithfulness of Christ towards the Jew; and from his love and tenderness, mercy and compassion towards the Gentiles; and from his divine indulgence towards both, the apostle very fitly draws this inference and conclusion, That all christians, how differing soever from one another in their judgments and opinions as to lesser things, ought to receive one another into fellowship and christian communion; and instead of biting and devouring one another, be once at length so wise and happy, as to hold the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

13 Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost.

Note here, 1. How the apostle closes his exhortation to brotherly concord and unity with a pithy and pathetic prayer; his example herein is instructive. 2. The title or appellation which he gives unto God in prayer: The God of hope: Sometimes he styles him the God of grace, sometimes the God of peace, sometimes the God of patience, here the God of hope; he being so objectively, the only object of our common hope; and also effectively, as he is the author and producer of hope in us. 3. The mercies he prays for, (1.) That they may be filled with all joy and peace in believing, that their hearts may overflow with peace from God, and one towards another, and with all that joy which results from both. (2.) That they may abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost; where, by hope, understand the good hoped for, namely, heaven and eternal life, a firm expectation of which is wrought in us by the Holy Spirit. Learn, 1. That God is the object of a Christian's hope, and if so, the sin of despair is a most unreasonable sin; for why should any despair of his mercy, who is the God of hope, who commands us to hope in his mercy, and takes pleasure in them that do so? Psa. cxlvii. 11. Learn, 2. That the grace of hope, together with joy and peace in believing, are wrought in the Christian's heart through the power of the Holy Ghost, that is, through the sanctifying influences of the Holy Ghost, enlightening the understanding; inclining the will, rectifying the affections, and reducing all the rebellious powers and faculties of the soul (in concurrence with our endeavours) under the government and dominion of reason and religion.

14 And I myself also am persuaded of you, my brethren, that ye also are full of goodness, filled with all knowledge, able to admonish one another. 15. Nevertheless, brethren, I have written the more boldly unto you, in some sort, as putting you in mind, because of the grace that is given to me of God. 16 That I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost. 17 I have therefore whereof I may glory through Jesus Christ in those things which pertain to God.

Our apostle being now about to conclude his epistle to the church at Rome, excuses himself that he had written so largely, and with such freedom to them, believing that they abounded in grace and knowledge, and were very fit and able to instruct and direct one another; however, he thought fit to write unto them, having had the honour conferred upon him by Christ, to be called to the apostolical office, and particularly to be the ambassador of Christ to the Gentiles; most passionately desiring that he might present and offer them up unto God, as an acceptable sacrifice through the power and assistance of the Holy Ghost; and that his success in the conversion of the Gentiles would be matter of abundant glory in him. Note, 1. How the apostle, in preparing the Gentiles for the obedience of the gospel, compares himself to a Levitical priest, conversant about his sacrifice, and fitting it to be offered up to God. 2. That the Gentiles dedicated by the apostle's ministry to the service of God, were the apostle's sacrifice and oblation. 3. That the Holy Spirit is a libamen poured on this sacrifice; by which it is sanctified and rendered acceptable unto God. 4. That such an oblation, or offering up of a people in this manner unto God, is matter of rejoicing, yea, matter of glorying to the ministers of Jesus Christ: I have therefore whereof I may glory through Jesus Christ.

18 For I will not dare to speak of any of those things which Christ hath not wrought by me, to make the Gentiles obedient, by word and deed. 19 Through mighty signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God; so that from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the gospel of Christ. 20 Yea, so have I strived to preach the gospel, not where Christ was named, lest I should build upon another man's foundation; 21 But, as it is written, To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see; and they that have not heard shall understand.

Note here, 1. the indefatigable industry and pains of the holy apostle in order to the conversion of the Gentiles: From Jerusalem round about unto Illyricum, he fully preached the gospel of Christ. This, according to Pareus's computation, was little less than a thousand miles. The industry of the apostles, in planting and propagating the gospel of Christ, was almost incredible. Lord! what pains did they take? What hazards did they run? what difficulties did they contest and contend with, in that great work? 2. That although their industry was great, yet their success was greater than their industry, and beyond all human expectation. This appears by the vast spreading of the gospel in so short a space: From Jerusalem round about unto Illyricum. Within thirty years after our Saviour's death, the gospel was not only diffused through the greatest part of the Roman empire, but had reached as far as Parthia and India. 3. That the gospel or doctrine of Jesus had likewise a wonderful power and efficacy upon the lives and manners of men: The apostle tells us, that the Gentiles who were converted to Christianity, were obedient by word and deed: Upon the change of their religion, followed the change of their conversation, and whole course of life. 4. The reason of all this wonderful success which St. Paul and other apostles had in preaching the gospel; and that was the extraordinary power of the Holy Ghost, in enabling them to work miracles for the confirmation of the gospel, ver. 19. Through mighty signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God. Such was the miraculous power of healing diseases, of casting out devils! of inflicting corporal punishment upon scandalous persons! all which did serve in general for the confirmation of the gospel, and did in particular support the honour and authority of the apostles, and supply the want of the magistrate's power, which the Christians could not expect whilst the Roman emperors continued Heathen: not that all these miraculous powers were given to every one of the apostles, or that they which had them could exercise them at all times, or whenever they pleased; but only as was most expedient for the use and benefit of the church. 5. That the apostle, in preaching the gospel, chose to go to such dark and blind places as never heard of the gospel before, rather than amongst them where Christ had been named, that so he might lay the foundation of Christianity himself, and not build upon another man's foundation: And likewise that in his ministry, the prophecy of Esaias might be fulfilled, chap. lii. 15. To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see: and they that have not heard, shall understand.

22. For which cause also I have been much hindered from coming to you. 23 But now having no more place in these parts, and having a great desire these many years to come unto you; 24 Whenever I take my journey into Spain, I will come to you. For I trust to see you in my journey, and to be brought on my way thitherward by you, if first I be somewhat filled with your company.

The apostle having, in the former verses, excused himself for dealing so plainly in his writings with them, affirming that the true reason why he did not visit Rome, was this: He looked upon planting of churches as more necessary than watering of them, and the preaching of Christ where he had never been named, to be the most needful work. Now at Rome there had before been a church planted, and elders ordained to build upon that foundation; for this reason he had hitherto declined coming to Rome: But now, having no more place in these parts, that is, having no more churches to plant hereabouts, he signifies both his inclinations and fixed resolutions to visit them at Rome, as he took his journey into Spain, and to stay some time with them, that they might be mutually filled and satisfied with and refreshed by each other's company. Here note, 1. That the Romans were very early converted and called to the Christian faith, soon after Christ's ascension; for the twentieth year after it, did Paul write this epistle. But he had a desire of seeing the Romans many years before he wrote unto them, and therefore many years before they were converted to the faith. 2. That our journeying from one place to another, is not according to our purpose, but God's disposal. The apostle, no doubt, intended to go into Spain when he wrote this; but God over-ruled the matter beyond the apostle's expectation. The travels of the apostles from place to place, in order to the planting and propagating of the Christian faith, were under the special influences and direction of the Holy Ghost. Acts xvi. 7. They assayed to go into Bithynia: But the Spirit suffered them not. Note 3. The great end why the apostle was so desirous of the sight and enjoyment of the Christians at Rome; it was that he might be refreshed, nay, filled with their company. Lord! How desirable is the communion of saints, and how beneficial the society of sincere and serious Christians! Their company is filling, (not empty, vain and frothy, as the company of most is, but) administering both grace and comfort to them that enjoy it; I desire to see you in my journey, that I may be filled with your company.

25 But now I go unto Jerusalem to minister unto the saints. 26 For it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain contribution for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem. 27 It hath pleased them verily: and their debtors they are. For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things. 28 When therefore I have performed this, and have sealed to them this fruit, I will come to you by Spain. 29 And I am sure that when I come unto you, I shall come in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ.

Here the apostle acquaints them with his present intended journey to Jerusalem; as also with the occasion of it; namely, to carry the charitable contribution of the Greek churches in Macedonia and Achaia, into Judea, and up to the poor saints in Jerusalem, whose necessities required it, and unto whom they were in a sort indebted for it; the Gentiles having been made partakers of their spiritual things (receiving the gospel from Judea) they are obliged in gratitude to minister to them carnal things. He farther assures them, that as soon as he had finished his journey and performed this charitable office, he would come to them, and that in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of peace. Note here, 1. The title given to the poor Christians at Jerusalem: They are called saints; I go to Jerusalem to administer to the saints necessities. Saints they were by baptismal dedication, by visible profession, and many, yea most of them, it is to be hoped, by inward sanctification also. 2. That poverty and sanctity are not inconsistent; the saints at Jerusalem are poor, but God provided a purveyor for them; he stirs up the apostle, and the hearts of the Macedonians, to administer to the necessities of these poor saints. 3. How the saints in one church did succour and relieve the poor Christians in another; those in Macedonia and Achaia send relief into Judea, and to the poor saints which were at Jerusalem; teaching us, that it is our obliged duty to extend our charity to the churches abroad and beyond the seas, when their wants and necessities require it, and our capacities enable us unto it. 4. The nature of this charity declared: It was a free and cheerful contribution performed with much pleasure: It pleased them to make a contribution; it was not extorted or squeezed from them, but given with cheerfulness by them: Contributions must not be compulsions, but voluntary oblations. 5. How this charity is called fruit; when I have sealed this fruit: because it was the fruit of their faith, liberality and love; because as fruit, it would redound both to the benefit of the giver and receiver. Charity and alms are fruit, redounding to account in the great day of account. 6. The great integrity and fidelity of the apostle in securing of this charity: When I have sealed, or secured, unto them this fruit

fruit. The church's charity is a sealed treasure, not to be diminished and embezzled, but applied to the uses to which it is devoted. Lastly, the assurance which he gives them that when he comes among them, he shall come in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of peace unto them; that is, with a full impartment of spiritual gifts and gospel blessings, much knowledge, grace and comfort.

30 Now I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love of the Spirit, that ye strive together with me in your prayers to God for me; 31 That I may be delivered from them that do not believe in Judea: and that my service which I have for Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints; 32 That I may come unto you with joy by the will of God, and may with you be refreshed.

Here in the close of the epistle, our apostle most affectionately recommends himself to the prayers of the Christian Romans unto whom he wrote: I beseech you, brethren strive, &c. Where note, 2. The apostle's courteous compellation, brethren: There is a threefold brotherhood, which the scripture takes notice of: (1.) Betwixt Christ and believers; Heb. ii. 11. He is not ashamed to call them brethren. (2.) Betwixt believers themselves, they are brethren by grace; 1 Pet. ii. 17. Love the brotherhood; that is, the collective body of believers. (3.) Betwixt the ministers of Christ, and their beloved people, there is also a brotherhood, Rev. i. 9. I John your brother. Teaching the ministers of the gospel to carry it towards their people with love and gentleness, and the people to make reciprocal returns of love and affection. 2. The manner of the apostle's request: it is by way of supplication and intreaty: I beseech you brethren. Though as an apostle he might have enjoined them, yet for love's sake he rather intreats them. 3. The request itself, that they strive together in their prayers for him. The original word signifies to strive together as wrestlers do, who exert all their power and might in that bodily exercise. 4. Our apostle's sincerity, and holy ingenuity in this request which he makes unto them; he desires them to strive with him in their prayers to God for him: He doth not, with some, beg the prayers of others, and neglect to pray for himself, but is willing to draw with them in the same yoke. 5. A double argument which the apostle makes use of, to enforce his supplication and request: (1.) For the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, for the sake of him who is so dear both to you and me. (2.) For the love of the Spirit; that is, if the grace of love be wrought in you by the Holy Spirit of God, show it by your fervent prayer for all saints in general, and for myself a minister of Jesus Christ in particular. Note, 6. The particulars concerning which he desires their supplications: (1.) For preservation in his journey to Judea; that the unbelieving Jews, which were prejudice against him, might have no power to hurt him. (2.) That his person, and his performance for the poor saints at Jerusalem, might find acceptance with the Christian Jews, to whom he was not over acceptable he therefore begs their prayers, that the believing Jews at Jerusalem might be reconciled both to believing Gentiles that sent this alms, and also to himself that brought it: That my service for Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints. (3.) That he might have a prosperous journey to him by the will of God. Where note, How much is it our duty always, and in all things, to refer ourselves, our intentions and actions, to the pleasure and providence, to the wisdom and will of God. And observe, lastly, The special reason why he was so desirous to visit and come unto them, that he might be refreshed with them, and by them; that the company and conversation of each other may be to their mutual refreshment and satisfaction: That I may come unto you with joy, by the will of God, and may with you be refreshed.

33 Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen.

The apostle had desired their prayers for him; here he concludes with a fervent prayer for them: In which note, The title or attribute given unto God, the God of peace: the lover, the author, and giver of peace. The apostle having exhorted the believing Romans to be at peace among themselves, and not to contend about indifferent things, implores the dispenser of this grace to be with them, to dwell among them, and to pour out the great and invaluable blessings of peace and unity, of love and concord, upon them; The God of peace be with you all. Amen. As we honour the God of peace, whom we serve; as we love the Prince of peace, in whom we believe; as we hope for the comfort of the Spirit of peace; and as we tender the success of the gospel of peace, let us preserve it where it is and pursue it where it flies from us.

C H A P. XVI.

This chapter, which closes our apostle's epistle to the Romans, is chiefly made up of charitable and friendly salutations and commendations of some particular persons: according to the earliness and strength of their several graces, and their labour of love for the interest of Christ and his church.

I commend unto you Phebe our sister, which is a servant of the church which is at Cenchrea: 2 That ye receive her in the Lord, as becometh saints, and that you assist her in whatsoever business she hath need of you: for she hath been a succourer of many, and myself also.

The first person here mentioned is Phebe; who, going upon some occasion to Rome, St. Paul is supposed to have sent this epistle to the Romans by her: "I commend, says he, to your care and affectionate regard, Phebe, our sister in the faith, who served the church at Cenchrea," in the quality of a deaconess, as some think or as others, who spent her time in receiving and harbouring poor Christians that were driven out of their own country, and who had been a succourer and supporter of the apostle himself. He exhorts them to receive her in the Lord; that is, with Christian love for the Lord's sake, and to be assistant and helpful to her in her outward affairs and business. Learn hence, What honour God puts upon the female sex, in making use of some of them to be assistants to the apostles and taking care that their offices of love and service for and towards the ministers and members of Christ, should not be forgotten, but had and kept in everlasting remembrance. The services which Phoebe did, are here recorded, to posterity transmitted, and to our imitation recommended.

3 Greet Priscilla and Aquila my helpers in Christ Jesus: 4 Who have for my life laid down their own necks: unto whom not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentiles. 5 Likewise greet the church that is in their house.—

The first persons at Rome, whom St. Paul salutes by name, are Priscilla and Aquila. The woman is named before her husband, and shews, that they were all one in Christ Jesus, in whom there is neither male or female. Here, by the way, it appears how weakly the papists argue for St. Peter's primacy, because placed first in the catalogue of the apostles. By the same argument, the woman is the head of the man, because here named before the man. 2. The honourable title which St. Paul puts upon these two persons, Aquila and Priscilla; he calls them his helpers in Christ Jesus. They were his assistants in propagating the gospel by private instruction, though not by public preaching, Acts xviii. 26. Note, 3. The Christian courage which was found with this holy woman Priscilla, and her husband Aquila: They laid down their own necks for the apostle; that is, exposed themselves to the hazard of their own lives for his preservation. 4. The thankful resentment which the apostle and all the churches of the Gentiles had of this their great and noble service, in hazarding their own lives for his: To whom I give thanks, and all the churches of the Gentiles. Because St. Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles, and his preservation redounded to the benefit of them all; therefore were the churches of the Gentiles so sensible of and thankful for, the apostles preservation. Lastly, The salutation sent to the church that was in their house. By which some understand their household, their Christian family, which he calls a church, because of the pious order and religious worship which was there observed. O happy houses! and thrice happy householders; whose families are little churches for piety and devotion. Others understand by the church in their house, the number of Christians which used there to assemble for religious worship. Be it the one or the other, our apostle forgets not to send kind and Christian salutations unto them.

—Salute my well-beloved Epenetus, who is the first-fruits of Achaia unto Christ. 6 Greet Mary, who bestowed much labour on us. 7 Salute Andronicus and Junia my kinsmen and my fellow-prisoners; who are of note among the apostles, who also were in Christ before me.

Three persons are here saluted by name: The first, Epenetus, whom he calls the first fruits of Achaia: that is, the first person that embraced Christianity, or the faith of Christ, in the region of Achaia; the second is Mary, a common name, but the person here intended was of special note, having bestowed much pains upon, and done many good offices for, the preachers of the gospel; the third is Andronicus, noted for his sufferings and services among the apostles, as also for his early embracing the Christian faith. He was in Christ before me: that is, converted to Christianity before myself. Learn hence; 1. That seniority in grace is a very great honour: And to be in Christ before others, is a transcendent prerogative. 2. That God will have the good works of all his saints, and the services especially which are done to his ministers and ambassadors by any of his people, to be applauded, valued and recorded. Mary's labour bestowed on the apostle, is here mentioned with respect.

8 Greet Amplias my beloved in the Lord. 9 Salute Urbane our helper in Christ, and Stachys my beloved. 10 Salute Apelles approved in Christ. Salute them which are of Aristobulus' household. 11 Salute Herodian my kinsman. Greet them that be of the household of Narcissus which are in the Lord. 12 Salute Tryphena and Tryphosa, who labour in the Lord. Salute the beloved Peris, which laboured much in the Lord. 13 Salute Rufus chosen in the Lord, and his mother and mine. 14 Salute Afyncretus, Phlegon, Hermas, Patrobas, Hermes, and the brethren which are with them. 15 Salute Philologos, and Julia, Nereus, and his sister, and Olympas, and all the saints which are with them.

Here note, 1. How the apostle salutes the Christians at Rome, not in general, but particularly, and by name, that they might be convinced how particularly mindful he was of them. And as he mentions them by name in his salutations, it is not improbable, but that he might mention them also by name in his supplications and private addresses to God. No doubt, he bore them, and all converted by him, upon his heart, whenever he went in and out before the Lord. A spiritual Father can never be forgetful of his spiritual children. 2. The persons saluted by the apostle are not men of fame in Rome, noted for their dignity and greatness, or for their wealth or riches, but for their piety and goodness for labouring in the Lord, and for labouring much in the Lord, for being in Christ, approved in Christ, and helpers in Christ; that is, assistants in propagating the gospel of Christ, and serviceable to those whose work and office it was so to do. It is religion that renders persons renowned, and no persons deserve so well to be remembered by us, as those who are most persevering and laborious in their services for God. 3. Here are several women, as well as men, remembered and saluted, and their services for Christ and his ministers recorded. God will have none of his faithful servants forgotten, nor any of their good deeds buried in oblivion. 4. That in all this roll of salutations, there is no mention made of St. Peter's name. Had he now been at Rome, as the papists will have him, and bishop of that see, it had been morally impossible for our apostle to have forgotten him in his salutations, when so many of his inferiors were remembered by him.

16 Salute one another with an holy kiss. The churches of Christ salute you.

Note here, How the apostle proceeds, from greeting the saints at Rome himself, to persuade them to salute one another. There had been much dissention among them about meats and days; he therefore craves of them for the future to embrace each other with cordial love, and affectionate kindness; and, as a token and symbol of it, to salute one another with an holy kiss, the usual expression of friendship in those times. The primitive Christians, at the end of their prayers, before the celebration of the sacrament, did salute one another with a kiss, and then the bread and cup was brought forth; and some observe, that it was done by the men apart, and the women apart. But this custom being afterwards abused, was gradually laid aside. That which is lawful in its use, and innocent in its own nature, may and ought to be laid aside, when it becomes matter of scandal and just offence.

17 Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which we have learned; and avoid them, 18 For they that are such, serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly; and by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple.

Note here, 1. How the apostle takes his leave and farewell of these Romans, with an admonition to them, to take heed of persons that there were erroneous in doctrine, and scandalous in practice. It is probable he means, either those Jews who pleaded the necessity of circumcision, and the observation of the Mosaic rites, as necessary to the salvation of the Gentiles; or the Gnostics, to whom the following characters do well agree. Whoever they were, they were dangerous seducers, and to be avoided. 2. The character which our apostle gives of these persons; They serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly. Note, That seducers are always self-seekers; they are designing men: They aim at themselves, under a pretence of acting for Christ and his glory. They serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly. Note, 3. The arts and methods which they use to delude and deceive: By good words and fair speeches they deceive the simple. Seducers have smooth and glossing tongues; and innocent harmless men are misled by their fine pretences, and fair speeches; and thus they impose upon the simple. 4. The double advice which the apostle gives, in order to their being preserved and secured from the poison and contagion of these seducers; namely, to mark them, and avoid them. (1.) To mark them: The word signifies such a marking, as a watchman useth when he standeth upon a tower to descry an enemy, which is performed with great accuracy. (2.) To avoid them as a sound person would shun him who has the plague on him. Where note, The apostle advises to mark them, in order to the declining of them, not destroying of them; to cut them off by excommunication, not to cut their throats, or burn their bodies for heresy. Mark them which cause divisions, and avoid them. Note, 5. The persons whom this exhortation concerns, who they are that should judge of the doctrines and seducers. They are the common people, the Romans, the saints or Christians at Rome, to whom he was now writing; to them the apostle allows a judgment of discretion, a power to try and examine the doctrines delivered by persons pretending to infallible inspiration: I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions contrary to the doctrines which ye have learned. Christians are by no means to be led by their teachers blindfold, but ought to see with their own eyes, to take nothing upon trust, but all upon trial, to examine the doctrines they are taught, and to observe and mark the teachers of them. I beseech you, says our apostle, mark them.

19 For your obedience is come abroad unto all men. I am glad therefore on your behalf: but yet I would have you wise unto that which is good; and simple concerning evil.

As if the apostle had said, "I do not accuse you, but advise and warn you only: I acknowledge that you, the Christians at Rome, are famous for your obedience to the apostolical doctrine, and that you walk in faith and love, in unity and concord, to the credit of the gospel, and the honour of your holy religion. But I would have you know, that you are not wholly out of danger of being infected by these jadaizers: I wish you therefore wisdom to escape their snares; the Lord make you wise as well as zealous; that you may discern that which is good, and decline that which is evil." Learn hence, That the holiest, best, and wisest of Christians, must not look upon themselves as secure from the snares of seducers, but stand in need of all the cautions and warnings, of all the advice and counsel of their spiritual guides, in order to their preservation from the poison of their principles, and the contagion of their example.

20 And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.

These words may be considered either relatively or absolutely; if relatively, or with relation to the context, then by Satan is to be understood seducers and false teachers, whom he had warned the Romans of, in the preceding verses: Mark them which cause divisions &c. Learn hence, 1. That all corrupters of divine truths, and troublers of the church's peace, are Satan's instruments: God shall bruise Satan, that is, Satan in his instruments, under your feet. Learn, 2. That divine evangelical truth shall be finally victorious; no weapon formed against it shall prosper; the head of error shall fall low at last at the feet of truth. Seducers may bluster for a time, but shall be bruised at last; the God of peace shall bruise Satan shortly. Consider the words absolutely, and we have a victory proclaimed; the author of that victory declared, the God of peace; the enemy conquered, Satan; the conquest, or manner of conquering, by bruising; the time of the conquest, not presently, but shortly. The God of peace shall bruise Satan shortly under your feet. Learn, 1. That the reconciler of the world shall be the subduer of Satan; and in subduing Satan, he conquers all his instruments: He saith not, God shall bruise seducers and heretics under your feet; but Satan, and, in him, all that belong unto him; as the fall of the general puts the whole army to the rout. 2. That

Almighty

Almighty God, in his own time, will make believers complete conquerors over Satan, and all their spiritual enemies. Note, That it is by virtue of Christ's conquest over Satan, that believers become conquerors; for the promise here refers to the original promise, Gen. iii. 15. That Christ, the seed of the woman, shall break the serpent's head: So then it is by virtue of that act of Jesus Christ, bruising the serpent's head, yea, breaking it, that Satan is bruised under our feet. As Christ bruised him under his own feet, so in his own time he will bruise him under our feet. The personal, as well as the representative seed of the woman, shall break the serpent's head. Remember, poor tempted Christian, for thy comfort, the God of peace will tread Satan under thy feet, shortly; thou shalt see thy foot on the neck of thy enemy; and when once thy foot is over the threshold of glory, thou shalt cast back a smiling look, and say, "Now Satan, do thy worst: through grace I am where thou shalt never come."

21 Timotheus my work-fellow, and Lucius and Jason and Sosipater my kinsman, salute you. 22 I Tertius, who wrote this epistle, salute you in the Lord. 23 Gaius mine host, and of the whole church, saluteth you. Erastus the chamberlain of the city saluteth you, and Quartus a brother.

Our apostle had, in the former part of the chapter, saluted divers persons himself; here he sends the salutations of those that were with him to the saints or Christians at Rome: Hereby shewing that mutual love and amity, that happy concord and unity, which is and ought to be between all the sincere disciples and followers of Jesus, when, though not in body, yet in mind, they should be present, with one another, and though distant in place, yet undivided in affection. The two principal persons here sending joint salutations with the apostle to these Romans, were Timothy and Gaius. The former St. Paul calls his work-fellow, or fellow-labourer Timotheus my work-fellow.—Where note, The great humility of the apostle in dignifying so young a man as Timothy then was, with this title. What greater dignity, then to be a fellow-worker with the apostle, in planting and propagating the gospel of Jesus Christ? The latter was Gaius, whom the apostle calls his host; and the host of the whole church; that is, a person employed by the church of Corinth to entertain Christian strangers. To perform the meanest offices of love and service for the persecuted or distressed saints and servants of Jesus Christ, to entertain them in our houses, yea, to wash their feet, is an honourable and acceptable service.

24 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

Here again our apostle, from the abundance of his affectionate heart towards them, repeats his benediction of them, that the mercy, grace and goodness of the Lord Jesus Christ may abide upon, and ever more continue with them. Where note, The fountain and original spring from whence all grace doth rise and flow; namely, from Jesus Christ: The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. It is so called, because he purchased it for us, because he applies it to us.

25 Now to him that is of power to establish you according to my gospel and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret since the world began, 26 But now is made manifest, and by the scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known unto all nations for the obedience of faith. 27 To God only wife, be glory through Jesus Christ for ever. Amen.

Our apostle here concludes his excellent epistle with a solemn doxology or thanksgiving to God: In which he first describes God, and then ascribes eternal glory to him. He describes him, both by his power and by his wisdom. By his power first, To him that is able to establish you according to my gospel; that is, to establish you in grace and truth, in faith and holiness, and to keep you from falling into sin and error. Such is our weakness, and Satan's power, that unless God confirm and establish us, we shall soon run into sin and danger. Note farther, The instrumental means which God makes use of, for his people's establishment, and that is the gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ, the doctrine of the gospel which Christ and his apostles taught and delivered. This is called a mystery, kept secret since the world began, and now made manifest for the obedience of the faith; that is, that it may be believed and obeyed. The second attribute in the description of God, is his wisdom: he is called the wise, the only wise God; not to exclude the Son and Holy Ghost, but the wisdom of the creature only: He is only wise originally, his wisdom is of himself; yea, his wisdom is himself: The wisdom of God is not a quality, separable from himself, but is his very essence and nature. He is only wise, because he is incomparably wise; there is none that for wisdom can compare with him. He has wisdom in such a degree and eminency, that the very angels are chargeable with folly before him. In a word, he is only wise, because all wisdom is derived from him; all the wisdom of angels and men is but a ray from his light, a drop from his ocean. And if so, then let the wisdom of God, in all his dealings with us and our's be admired and adored by us: for all his works of providence are as orderly and perfect as his works of creation, though we perceive it not.

Now unto him that is able to keep us from falling and, To present us faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy, to the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty: dominion and power, now and ever. Amen.

9 But as it is written, eye has not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. 10 But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God. 11 For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God.

These words, Eyes have not seen, &c. do not immediately respect the happiness of heaven, and a future state, though very often they are so applied, but they are primarily spoken of the gospel state, and of the blessings to be enjoyed by them that love God here: From whence a good argument may be drawn to prove the inconceivable happiness of the saints hereafter. Though they have felt and tasted joys unspeakable and full of glory, in the actings of their faith and love upon God at present, yet all that they have seen and heard, all that they have tasted and felt in the way to heaven, falls infinitely short of the perfection and blessedness of that place and state. Lord! how will thy immediate presence, when we come into it, be a great surprise to those of us that have now the greatest acquaintance with it! Farther, The care and kindness of God towards his servants, in revealing to them by his Spirit those great and good things prepared for them which surpass man's understanding. Though eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor heart conceived, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him, yet God has revealed them to us by his Spirit. There is a twofold revelation of the happiness of a future state. Revelatio fidei, and revelatio visionis, a revelation of faith, and a revelation by vision and light; the former, believers have by the help of the Holy Spirit in this life, as viatores, the latter they shall ere long enjoy in heaven, as comprehenses, where they shall see as they are seen, and know as they are known. Lastly, That the Holy Spirit, which thus revealeth hidden counsels to man, and searcheth the deep things of God, is omniscient, and really God. Mark, (1) He searcheth deep things; he is not only acquainted with, and privy to the surface and outside of things, but searcheth things to the bottom. And, (2.) He searcheth not only the deep things of man, as of kings and princes, whose hearts are a great deep, but the deep things of God; therefore the Spirit is God; for as the apostle argues, ver. 11. No man knoweth the things of a man, &c. even so the things of God knoweth no man but the Spirit of God, or he that is with God, in God, yea, God himself, as intimate with him as the soul is in the body. If the spirit that is in man were not man, it could never know the deep things of man; and if the Spirit of God were not God he could never search and know the deepest things of God.

12 Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God. 13 Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth, comparing spiritual things with spiritual.

Note here, 1. The apostle declares what spirit they had not received, namely, the spirit of the world: We have not received the Spirit of the world; that is, the spirit which suggests worldly wisdom, and favours only worldly things, which acts and influences only worldly men. In the whole generation of worldly men, there is the same worldly spirit and this spirit of the world is an earthly spirit; it is a low, a little, and narrow spirit: Earthly things, which are present and visible, such a soul gapes after, and grasps hard; but future and invisible things, which are far off, and out of sight, are neither believed nor sought after. 2. The apostle declares what Spirit they had received, namely, the Spirit which is of God. And of what use that Holy Spirit is unto them: It teaches them to know the things which are freely given of God; that is the Holy Spirit of God are; we are enlightened with the knowledge of that grace and goodness of God which is discovered to us in the gospel; we know both divine mysteries and divine mercies both what God hath done for us, and what he hath wrought in us, which are the things that are freely given us of God. Note, 3. The apostle declares, he preached these spiritual things after a spiritual manner, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; that is, in the words, and after the manner now counted by the Gentile philosophers to be learned and wise, but in the very words and after the very manner which the Spirit of God teacheth us. Where learn, That the holy apostles spake and writ by the immediate inspiration of the Holy Ghost, as well as the prophets of old time, and delivered nothing as from God, to what God revealed to them by his Holy Spirit; and accordingly, some interpret those words, Comparing spiritual things with spiritual; that is, say they, comparing the things which were writ by the Spirit in and under the Old Testament with what is now revealed to us under the New.

4 But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.

Note here, 1. The subject spoken of, the natural man; not sapienter, the sensual, but vernus, the animal man, who acts only by the principles of human reason and worldly wisdom; who though well furnished with intellectual and moral improvements, is yet destitute of the enlightening Spirit, and the renewing grace of God. 2. What is here affirmed of the natural man, with reference to spiritual things. (1.) That he receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God. (2.) That he cannot know them. Where note, That it is not said, That he knoweth not the things of God, but the things of the Spirit of God; for there are some things of God, which a natural man may know, but the things of the Spirit of God, as truths purely evangelical, these he receiveth not, neither in his understanding, nor in his will. Note, further, It is not barely said that he doth not, but that he cannot know them. Natural reason alone, by what helps soever assisted and improved, is altogether insufficient, without spiritual illumination, to apprehend supernatural and evangelical truth; not but that the Spirit of God, in the work of illumination and conversion, makes use of our reason; that flower of the soul is not blasted, but more opened by the blowing of the blessed Spirit. Christianity doth not command us to throw away our reason, but to subjugate it; not to deny or disown our reason, but to captivate it to the obedience of faith: But the sense of the apostle is, that a person of the most exquisite natural accomplishments, and one that has improved his reason to the highest pitch, cannot behold evangelical mysteries in their proper light, or embrace them in their verity and beauty, without the superadded aids and assistances of the Holy Spirit. 3. The reasons declared, why the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit, because they are foolishness unto him; that is, he accounts them foolishness when propounded to him, because he doth not see them proved from principles of natural reason, and by philosophical productions which is the only wisdom that he seeks after. The reason is also added, why he cannot know them, because they are spiritually discerned; that is, the natural man cannot know divine things by that wisdom which he alone will be conducted by; and spiritual things must be spiritually discerned; for being mysteries, they are not knowable by human reason, but by spiritual revelation. And if the wisdom of the world, that is, the learned and wisest men in the world, were thus unable, by the sharpest light of reason, to discover evangelical mysteries; Lord! how endearing are our obligations for the benefit of supernatural revelation, whereby the hidden wisdom of God is made known unto us.

15 But he that is spiritual, judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man.

As if the apostle had said, "Although the natural man, who acteth only by principles of human reason, receiveth not the things of the Spirit, nor can know them by any study of his own, because they are spiritually discerned; yet he that is spiritual, that is, who hath the revelation and illumination of the Spirit of God, judgeth, or discerneth, and trieth all things, that is, all spiritual matters: yet he himself is judged of no man, that is, discerned by none who hath no higher principle, than that of nature to discern things by." Learn hence, That such Christians as are enlightened and renewed with, guided and conducted by the Holy Spirit of God, are the only proper judges of spiritual matters, able to understand their duty, and to discern between good and evil. He that is spiritual judgeth all things.

16 For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ

That is, "What man, without divine revelation and spiritual illumination, ever knew or understood the mind of God so well, as to be able to instruct, direct, and inform the spiritual man about it? But we who are spiritual, have the mind of Christ, and so are able to discern and direct, to guide and instruct others about it." Learn hence, That none are fit and sufficient to interpret the mind of God unto others, who are not acquainted with it themselves:

We have the mind of Christ, saith the apostle of himself and his fellow-labourers in the gospel: His meaning is not only this, that they had the mind of Christ written in a book, but that they had a clear understanding of it, and so were fitted to interpret it to others. There is no such knowledge as the knowledge of experience, no teaching like unto experimental teaching.

CHAP. III.

Our apostle having reproved the Corinthians for their contentions and divisions, for the factions and parties which were found amongst them; here shews what a scandal their dissensions were to religion, and a reproach to themselves.

AND I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, even as unto babes in Christ,

As if the apostle had said, "My brethren, although I speak the highest wisdom amongst them that are perfect, yet could not I speak unto you as unto spiritual persons, but as unto carnal, because the works of the flesh are found with you, and at the best you are but babes in Christ." Learn hence, That even amongst those who are the true and real members of the visible church, some are spiritual, and some are carnal, some are men, some are babes. The apostle doth not call them absolutely carnal, as if they were wholly given up to the works of the flesh; but comparatively so, having too much carnality and corruption in them, and favouring too much of the flesh, though for the main truly pious; and therefore he uses the word as, for mitigation sake: I could not speak unto you but as unto carnal.

2 I have fed you with milk, and not with meat: for hitherto ye were not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able.

With milk, that is, with easy and common truths; not with the mysterious part of gospel knowledge; with the first principles of the doctrine of Christ, and not with the higher doctrines of Christianity, which neither then, nor now, are ye able to bear. Learn hence, That it is great prudence and wisdom in the ministers of Christ to instruct people in the first principles of religion, in order to their regular advancing higher in Christianity. Ministers are spiritual nurses; they first must feed with milk, then with meat, otherwise they will not nourish, but destroy.

3 ¶ For ye are not carnal; for whereas there is among you envying and strife and divisions, are ye not carnal, and walk as men?

That is, "Ye are in a great measure carnal; for your envy, strife, and divisions, prove you to be so, and that you live according to the corrupt nature of man." They had the seed and root of grace abiding, and yet the relics of corruption remaining in them. There is a vast difference between weak grace, and no grace: between the presence of sin, and the power of sin. But how could the apostle here call the Corinthians carnal, and babes in Christ, when in chap. i. ver. 5. he affirmed that they were enriched with all knowledge and utterance? Ans. That might be true as to some particular persons amongst them who had those extraordinary gifts of tongues and miracles given them for the confirmation of the gospel; and yet what is here said, be true, as to the generality of them, that they had too much carnality and unmortified corruption remaining in them: ye are yet carnal. Next, What proof he gives of it, namely, ocular demonstration; for, says he, there are among you envying, strife, and divisions. Envy, as the root bears strife; and strife breeds divisions and factions. Envy is a pestilent lust, yea, a devilish lust; it makes another's good our grief. The devil envies God and man their happiness; he rejoices at the destruction of sinners, though he has no advantage by it; nay, though it increaseth his torment, because they were tempted by him to sin. There is nothing so like the devil as an envious man, with his cloven foot, to make division wherever he comes. Learn hence, 1. That envy is the cause and companion of strife. 2. That strife and contention, differences and divisions, are often found in the churches of Christ, and among particular Christians: 3. That so far as these prevail in and among any, it evidences that they are carnal, and walk as men.

4 For while one faith I am of Paul, and another, I am of Apollos, are ye not carnal?

That is, one faith, in opposition to another, I am the disciple of Paul; and another I follow Apollos: and thus probably, they call themselves after the names of their admired preachers, factiously crying up one minister above another. Hence learn. That although it be a people's duty to have a great and high esteem of the ministers of Christ, yet must not their respect degenerate into a sinful admiration of their persons; for the factious affecting of one minister above another, is both sinful and dangerous. When the gifts and abilities of one minister are cried up to the contempt of others, it occasions enmity and dissension amongst ministers themselves, and their people also: Are ye not carnal, when one faith, I am of Paul, and another, I am of Apollos? It is added, chap. i. 12. And I of Christ: That is, they factiously said they were of, or for Christ in opposition to his ministers. They pretended to the immediate teachings of Christ, and had no need of the ministry, either of Paul or Apollos. Learn hence, That although Christ only is to be relied upon, as head of his church, yet it is not his will we should despise his ministry, or contemn his ministers under that pretence.

5 Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave to every man?

As if the apostle had said: "Neither Paul or Apollos were the authors of your faith, but only ministerial helpers of it, as God is pleased to furnish them with gifts, and to give a blessing to their ministerial endeavours." Your ministers give out to you as God gives in to them, and therefore, you ought not factiously to boast of their gifts, nor to make parties upon that account. Learn hence, 1. That the ministry of the word is the instituted mean and instrumental cause, which God hath appointed for working faith in the hearts of men. 2. That God has furnished his ministers with variety of gifts and abilities; all which he makes use of, in order to that end. 3. That therefore, the ministers of Christ ought neither to be despised nor nullified, neither to be cried up, nor trodden down; we are not efficient causes, but only instrumental means of faith. Render therefore unto God the glory of the author, and unto ministers the honour of the instrument, Who is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers.

6 I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase.

I planted: That is I first preached the gospel among you, and first instructed you in the principles of Christ: I converted you to Christ. After me came Apollos, and watered the seed which I had sown; but God it was, and God alone, that caused the seed which I sowed, and Apollos watered, to fructify and increase, Learn, 1. That it is an act of discriminating grace and favour in God, to send out his ministers plant the gospel amongst a people that never before heard of it, 2. That it is an act of farther favour and grace in God, to follow a people with a succession of ministers, in order to the watering of the seed formerly sown among them. 3. That all that ministers can do, is to plant and water; they cannot give increase, nor procure the success of their ministerial endeavours. Blessed be God, that he doth not require the success of our labours at our hands. Wo unto us, should he say, "Either reconcile my people to me, or I will never be reconciled unto you." Diligence and endeavours in our's, the blessing and success is God's: He will never blame us for doing his work.

7 So then, neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watered; but God that giveth the increase.

The sense is, "Neither is he that planteth to be esteemed as any thing, nor he that watereth as any thing, but the glory of all must be ascribed to God that giveth the increase." Yet must we understand the apostle speaking thus not absolutely; but comparatively; "They are not any thing, that is, not any thing of themselves alone, without the concurrence of the Spirit; what excellent gifts soever they have, they cannot of themselves make the word they preach effectual." Lord! how many souls do find both the ministry and ministers to be nothing as to them? If it be any thing to purpose to any soul, it is God; and not his ministers, that makes it so. The best and ablest ministry is nothing to any saving purpose, without God's power giving the increase.

8 Now he that planteth, and he that watereth, are one; and every one shall receive his own reward, according to his own labour.

He that planteth, and he that watereth, are one: that is, in their design and scope, in the aim and end of their ministry: therefore, they should not be factiously divided, either among themselves, or by their hearers. Although there is a variety and diversity in the gifts of Christ's ministers, yet the intent and design of their ministry being one, they all ought to agree as one. They should be one in doctrine, and one in affection, aiming at one and the same mark; namely, the glory of God, and men's salvation, as they are one in their office, institution and end. It follows, Every man shall receive his own reward, according to his own labour. Thence learn, that every man, especially every minister, is sure to receive a proportionable reward hereafter, according to his labour and working for God here. 2. The approbation and distinction of this reward: He shall receive his own reward; implying, that there are degrees of reward and glory in heaven, according as men have laboured more or less for God here on earth: According to this gradual diversity shall be gradual degrees of glory. 3. The measure and rule of this reward; according to his labour, not according to his success; according to his industry, not according to the fruit of his ministry: If he labours faithfully, God will reward him proportionably, though few or none have believed his report.

9 For we are labourers together with God: ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building.

Note here, 1. The honourable title put upon the ministers of God; they are labourers, or workers together with God. But in what sense are they so? Ans. Not so by any power of their own, to produce any spiritual effect, as if they without God could work faith and repentance in the hearts of sinners; but they work only by an external application of the ministry of the word, and the means of grace to the souls of men. They are under-labourers to God, and God honours them by working by them, and working with them, for the conversion of men. 2. The honourable relation in which the church stands to God: The church and people of God, are his husbandry, and his building: Ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building. Which phrase implies, (1.) Power and goodness in making them so: A building is not of itself, nor is a field clothed with gondly corn of itself. (2.) It implies dominion and absolute sovereignty: The master is the orderer of the house and the husbandman the disposer of his ground. (3.) It denotes propriety and interest, that we are not our own, but God's. The house is the owners, not its own. God is their's, and all that God has is their's also.

10 According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise master-builder I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon.

Note here, 1. The character which St. Paul assumes to himself, namely, that of a master-builder, yea, of a wise master-builder. But was it not vain-glorious in the apostle thus to describe himself? Is not Christ the great and wise master-builder of his church? Yes, undoubtedly: But the apostles were instruments in his hand, which he honoured with success; for which reason, St. Paul thus speaks. Learn hence, That in some cases it is not vain-glory, but a necessary duty, for the ministers of Christ to magnify their work and office received from Christ. 2. The special work performed by St. Paul, the wise master builder, he laid the foundation; that is, he first acquainted them with the rudiments and fundamental principles of the Christian religion, which they had never heard of before. Learn thence, that it is a special part of divine wisdom in a minister to lay at first a good foundation of scripture knowledge in the minds and understandings of his people. Unless we have a knowing people, we are not like to have a gracious people. All our sermons will be dashed to pieces upon the rock of our people's ignorance, if they be not well catechised and instructed in the fundamentals of Christianity. 3. How very careful our apostle is to ascribe all our strength, his assistance and success as a master-builder, to the grace of God: According to the grace of God given to me. Learn thence, That it is the property of every godly man, much more of every gracious minister, to attribute all that good which is either received or done by him to the grace of God. What man ever received more grace from God, or did more service for God, than St. Paul? And so enlarged is he upon all occasions, in magnifying the grace of God, that he is never satisfied in exalting of it: Not I, but the grace of God that was with me, &c. 4. The cautionary direction given by St. Paul to all succeeding ministers of Christ, to take heed that they lay no other foundation than what was laid by him; and that they build suitably upon that foundation: Let every man take heed how he build thereon. Learn hence, That the ministers of Christ are to take special care that they preach no other doctrine that what Christ and his apostles preached, and laid as the foundation of Christianity; and that they do not build upon that foundation any doctrine which may endanger their own or their people's salvation: I have laid the foundation, and let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon.

11 For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.

That is, no other true foundation can any man lay, than that which is already laid by me; namely, the knowledge of Jesus Christ, and faith in him. The ministers of Christ ought to lay no other foundation than Christ: They are to lead their people to, and build them upon, no other rock but Christ. All threatenings, promises, commands, duties, privileges, are to be preached, and pressed with respect to Jesus Christ: He is to be laid as the only foundation in respect of knowledge, in respect of faith, in respect of justification, in respect of intercession and acceptance with God. The minister's great work is to set Christ forth in all his glorious fulness, to represent him in all his offices, as a glorious object for the eye of our faith to look into, and fix upon.

12 Now if any man build upon this foundation, gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble: 13 Every man's work shall be made manifest. For the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. 14 If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward;

15 If any man's work shall be burnt, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so, as by fire.

In these words the apostle speaks of two sorts of preachers under the metaphor of builders: (1.) Some that are sound and orthodox, who hold the foundation, and build upon it gold, silver, and precious stones; that is, such sincere and wholesome doctrine as will bear the touch-stone and trial. (2.) Others that are unsound and erroneous, who hold indeed the foundation of Christianity, but build upon it such doctrines as will not bear the trial, expressed by wood, hay, and stubble, which are not proof against fire. Learn hence, 1. That the doctrine of Christ and the truths of the gospel are very excellent, and exceeding precious; compared to gold, silver, and precious stones; for their usefulness and preciousness. Learn, 2. That all errors and falsehoods in religion, all erroneous and false doctrines, though not fundamental, are yet no better than hay and stubble, vain and unprofitable, vile and contemptible. (3.) As a two-fold builder described, so a two-fold event declared: Some men's work, that is, their doctrines and practices, will abide the fire, others will be burnt up, and suffer loss; where, by the fire, understand the word and Spirit of God. A probatory, not a purgatory fire, is here intended; because it is said to burn not the person, but the action, and every action too of every man. Now the Popish purgatory fire tries not all persons, some are exempted as martyrs; and not all actions neither, but wicked ones only; whereas this fire shall try every man's work. The meaning is, that the light of God's word and Spirit will manifest the verity and vanity, the soundness or falseness of doctrines delivered by all preachers. Sound doctrine, that, like good metal, will endure the furnace, shall be rewarded; but such doctrines as will not endure the trial, shall miss of the reward. Learn hence, 1. That all the ways and works of wickedness in general, and all hidden and secret ways of false doctrine in particular, God will one day reveal and make manifest; Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it. 2. That the true and sincere doctrine of the gospel is firm and durable, and such as will abide the closest trial; yea, and will grow more illustrious and glorious thereby. 3. That men may hold the foundation, and maintain the fundamentals of Christianity, and yet may so superstruct upon it, and super-add so many things unto it, whereby they may greatly endanger their own and others salvation: They shall be saved, yet so as by fire; that is, with great difficulty, having exposed themselves to the utmost hazard and danger. The speech is proverbial, and signifies both the greatness of the danger, and the difficulty of escaping it; intimating, that errors in judgment, endanger a person's salvation, as well as ungodliness in practice. He that has a due care of his soul's salvation, will be as well afraid of erroneous principles, as he is of debauched practices: For error is as damnable a vice: The one is an open road, the other a by-path to hell and destruction.

16 ¶ Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?
17 If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.

Our apostle here, in the judgment of some interpreters, makes use of a farther argument to convince the Corinthians of the evil of their divisions. They are the church and temple of God, and therefore not to be profaned by divisions: Know ye not that ye are the temple of God? as if the apostle had said, "You Corinthians, by being converted to Christianity, are become a Christian church, an holy temple in which the Spirit of God doth dwell, and where the Spirit of division ought not to dwell; for if any man defile the temple of God, by dividing the church into factions and parties, him will God destroy; for the temple of the Lord is holy, and not to be profaned by your dividing lusts, which temple ye are." Learn hence, 1. That the people of God, met together to worship him, are the church or spiritual temple of God. 2. That the Spirit of God dwells in the church, or temple of God: and this dwelling implies propriety, familiarity, authority, residency, and fixedness of abode. 3. That such as defile the holy temple of God either by factious divisions, or erroneous doctrines, do provoke God to destroy them; that is, to punish them with temporal destruction, and, without repentance, with eternal damnation: If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy.

18 ¶ Let no man deceive himself. If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise. 19 For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God: for it is written, He taketh the wise in their own craftiness. 20 And again, The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise that are vain.

Observe here, 1. A word of caution; Let no man deceive himself. Self-deceit is the ground of all other deceit. Whatever deceit is abroad, it begins at home. A deceitful heart will not spare so much as itself; although this self-deceit be most unnatural and monstrous, most fatal and pernicious. 2. A word of exhortation, If any man seem to be wise, let him become a fool, that he may be wise; that is, "If any man seems to be wise in the wisdom and learning of this world, let him embrace the doctrine of Christ, which the world calls foolishness, and so become a fool to them, that he may be wise according to the wisdom of God." Learn hence, That all human and worldly wisdom cometh far off, and is but a mere shadow and appearance, compared with the wisdom of God manifested in the gospel. Observe, 3. A word of inforcement: For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. It is so in God's opinion and estimation; he accounts it so. If we compare wit with grace, learning with religion, a rational head with a gracious heart, the latter infinitely transcends the former in the account of God. All the admired wisdom of worldly men, is nothing but contemptible folly in the esteem of God. The world's wise man, is God's fool. 4. A double testimony which the apostle produces out of the Old Testament to prove his assertion, that the wisdom of the world is foolishness with God. The first is out of Job v. 13. He take the wife in their own craftiness. Learn hence, That no wisdom or craftiness of man can stand before the wisdom and power of God. The second testimony is taken out of Psalm xciv. 11. The Lord knoweth the thoughts of men, that they are vain; that is, the choicest and best thoughts of the wisest men are vain, yea, vanity.

21 Therefore let no man glory in men: For all things are yours: 22 Whether Paul, or Apollos or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours: 23 And ye are Christ's: and Christ is God's.

Here the apostle closes his discourse with an inference not to glory in any teacher whatsoever, either in Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, seeing they were all theirs; that is, all the apostles and ministers of Christ, from the highest to the lowest, from the greatest to the least, and all their ministerial gifts and labours, are all ordained and appointed by God for their use and service: All things are your's, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas. Learn hence, That all ministers, and ministerial abilities, are wholly for the church's service, and spiritual advantage; all their power is for the church's preservation, all their gifts are for the church's edification. Their message is for the church's comfort and consolation: Thus all things, in and belonging to the church, are our's. Next he mentions the things of the world as our's. Or the world; that is, all the good things in the world are our's, houses, lands, honours, friends, relations, so far as God sees them good for us. But are there not many that are Christ's, who want houses and friends, and other comforts, how then can they be said to have them? Ans. (1.) They have all things eminently and transcendantly in God and Christ, by whom they have a title to all things, Rev. xxi. 7. (2.) They have all things virtually in their contentment and satisfaction of mind which they do enjoy. (3.) They have all things eventually; they have the good of all things, when they have not the actual possession of all things; their very wants, in the event, work for good. Or life; this is our's two ways: The comfort of life is our's, and the end of life is our's, with the true use of it; for the sincere Christian only lives to purpose, by answering the great end of life, which is the promoting God's glory, and securing his own salvation. Or death; that which is in itself so terrible is for the believer's advantage, their friend, their privilege, their passage to heaven, their deliverer from sin, the perfecter of their grace; when we come at heaven, and not till then, we shall fully understand what this meaneth, Death is ours. Or things present; that is, all the events of providence which befall us, whether prosperity or adversity, health or sickness, riches or poverty, they are all sanctified to us, and are instrumental for the sanctifying of us. They are covenant-blessings, and dispensed in love to us. Or things to come; that is, all future things, which may befall us in this world, and in the world to come, shall be to our abundant advantage, whether they be merciful or good things, or grievous and sad things; particularly, death is to come, but to die is gain: Christ's death was the death of death; he has disarmed death of its sting; the believer fears not its dart; it is an hurting but an healing serpent: There is no venom or malignity in it; but that which was before in the number of threatenings, is now brought within the compass of the gospel-promises; all things are our's; life or death, things present, and things to come. And ye are Christ's; that is, not Paul's or Apollos's disciples or servants, but only Christ's, therefore glory in him. Consecrate all to the service of Christ, and resign up all to the will of Christ; ye are Christ's by donation, ye are Christ's by redemption, ye are Christ's by conquest; ye are therefore to glory in him, and in him only. And Christ is God's; that is, as you are Christ's and for his glory, so Christ, as Mediator, is God's, and for his glory. He is God's servant, to do his will, to execute his pleasure: He was begotten of his Father before all time: He received his doctrine from the Father in the fulness of time: He sought not his own but his Father's glory, in the doctrine which he preached, in the miracles which he wrought; but lived in an entire resignation to his Father's pleasure. Lord! how will it shame us thy servants to follow thy servant Christ, and to be called by his name, if we seek not his glory, and exact not his will, and live not to his praise, who died for us, and rose again.

CHAP. IV.

There are two extremes which persons are very apt to run into, with respect to the ministers of Christ; namely, to extol, and idolize some; and to depress, and vilify others. To preserve that due honour, and keep up that just esteem which is payable to all ministers, is the design of the apostle in this chapter.

LET a man so account of us as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God. 2 Moreover it is required in stewards that a man be found faithful.

As if the apostle had said, "Although I warned you in the foregoing chapter, against an undue esteem of your pastors, and against a factious preference of some before others, to the great scandal of religion, and the prejudice of the gospel: yet I speak not this to draw you off from paying that due honour and reserved respect which belongs to their character: but I desire you to account them all, neither more nor less, but as ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God." Here observe, 1. A double character given of an angelical pastor. He is, (1.) A minister of Christ; that is, a person deputed by the command, and invested with the authority of Christ, to administer in holy things, to preach the word, administer the sacraments, execute the church censures; being in all things an example to the flock: And the people are to account the office and work of the ministry, as a divine institution and appointment of Christ in his church: Whoever slight or opposes the ministry, sies in the face of Christ himself. (2.) He is a steward of the mysteries of God; and that in a two-fold respect. He is a steward of the truths of God. 2. Of the ordinances of God. Of the truths of God

God is a steward, to open and explain them for the spiritual edification of all Christians, and to defend and maintain them against the opposition of all adversaries: God's steward must not suffer vermin to destroy the provision of God's household. He is a steward of the ordinances of God also; which he is obliged to dispense in all faithfulness to his congregation: 1 Pet. iv. 10. As every man hath received the gifts, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God. Observe, 2. As the ministers of Christ are described, they are stewards; so the qualification of a steward is declared, and that is faithfulness: It is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful. What ground is there for trust, where there is no truth! Now this faithfulness in our stewardship, includes, (1.) Purity of intention: A pure end in all our services will give us abundance of comfort at the end of our service. (2.) Sincerity and integrity of heart: A faithful minister is a sincere hearted minister, who preaches his sermons first to himself and then to his hearers. (3.) Ministerial diligence: A slothful minister can never be a faithful steward: We must study the truths of God to plainness, preach them to faintness, maintain and defend them with steadfastness: We look for happiness from God, as long as he is in heaven, and he expects faithfulness from us as long as we are upon earth. (4.) Faithfulness in stewardship, includes impartiality in all the administrations of Christ's house: We must take the same care of, manifest the same love unto, attend with the same diligence upon, the poorest and meanest in our congregations, as we do the rich, the great, and the honourable: For all our souls are of one price, and rated at one value in our Lord's book. Oh! let us take care we be impartial stewards; for we must shortly give an account of our stewardship before an impartial God.

3 But with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man's judgment: yea, I judge not mine own self.

Not as if the apostle was unconcerned, whether the Corinthians had a good esteem of him or not; or were regardless of his reputation among men: But the meaning is, he did not much value himself upon the opinion and judgment which any persons had of him; knowing that his case would not be finally determined by any man's judgment, nor yet by his own. Therefore, says he, I judge not myself; that is, definitively, so as to acquiesce in that judgment: For I may be deceived in my judgment of myself, therefore I leave myself to the judgment of God. It is a singular support to all the members, but especially the ministers of Jesus Christ, that they and their actions have a more righteous judge to be examined and tried by, than either the world or themselves: The world's judgment may falsely condemn them, their own judgment may flatter and deceive them; but the judgment of God will deal impartially with them.

4 For I know nothing by myself; yet am I not hereby justified: but he that judgeth me is the Lord.

These words are not to be understood absolutely and universally, but relatively, and respectively; not as if the apostle knew no sin in himself, (for he went groaning under a body of sin to his grave) but with respect to his ministry: his conscience cleared him of all unfaithfulness and neglect of duty: Though I know nothing of unfaithfulness by myself, yet am I not hereby justified at God's tribunal, for he that judgeth me is the Lord. Note here, 1. St. Paul's justification of himself before men, he knew nothing by himself; that is, in general, his conscience did not accuse him of any gross prevaricating with God, and in particular did not charge him with any negligence or unfaithfulness, in respect of his office; he had not been an unfaithful steward of divine mysteries, nor guilty of any crimes that his adversaries could charge him with. 2. His disclaiming all justification thereby in the sight of God; yet am I not thereby justified; his sincerity did comfort him, but could not justify him. The righteousness of the holiest and best of men, is not pleadable before the righteous and holy God for justification. The reason given why the apostle did not, durst not, plead his own righteousness before God for justification; for he that judgeth me is the Lord; as, if he had said, "Were I to appear at man's bar, I doubt not but to come off well enough, for none knows me so well as myself; but I have to do with an heart-searching God, who knows me better than myself; and when God comes to look over my work, he will spy that which the most eagle-eyed person cannot spy. Therefore, there is no standing for me, a creature, before God, in any creature purity. Angelical perfection is imperfect in his sight: Angels though they have not the least spot of sin in their natures, yet are chargeable with folly; their nature being potentially sinful; the heavens themselves are not clean in God's sight.

5 Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man have praise of God.

Our apostle's design in these words, is not to condemn all judgment of persons, words or actions, or to oblige us to suspend our judging till the day of judgment; but only forbids rash censuring, unadvised, uncertain, and unseasonable judging of the hearts, and final state of men. We may judge what appeareth, but not what is hidden and unseen; for the judging of hidden things is referred to him from whom nothing is hidden. Learn hence, That to take upon us to judge the heart, or to judge that which doth not appear, it is to assume the office, and to take upon us the place of God; only he that is invisible can look into that which is invisible. Farther, The person spoken of, who makes manifest the counsels of the heart, and brings to light the hidden things of darkness; it is Jesus Christ: Judge nothing till the Lord come, the Lord Jesus Christ. A strong argument to prove the divinity of our blessed Saviour: He that has knowledge of the heart, of the secrets of the hearts of all men, and has all these subject to his judgment, is undoubtedly God. But Christ ascribes all this knowledge to himself, Rev. ii. 23. All the churches shall know that I am he which searcheth the reins and hearts; and I will give to every one according to his works; therefore he is essentially and really God. Observe, lastly, What will be the issue and consequence consequence of our Lord's knowing and judging the secrets of men; Then shall every one have praise of God; that is, every one shall have praise, that is, praise-worthy; every good man, though now dispraised and despised, though censured and condemned, though loaded with scandals and false reports, yet then every righteous man shall have praise from Christ the righteous Judge.

6 And these things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos for your sakes; that ye might learn in us not to think of men above that which is written, that no one of you be puffed up for one against another.

Here the apostle prosecutes his former argument afresh, that neither the Corinthians, nor any other Christian, should so overvalue and magnify some ministers, of the gospel, as to undervalue and despise others, making men of eminency the heads of factions and parties; but that they esteem all ministers as instruments, only in Christ's hand doing nothing of themselves, but assisted by the grace and strength of God, to whom therefore the success and entire praise of all their labours is due. This is to think of them according to what is written, chap. iii. 6. 8. Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers? Learn hence, That it is too usual, when people have a very great and high esteem of the ministers of Christ, to overvalue themselves by reason of their relation to them and dependance upon them; and whilst they honour and magnify some, to vilify and desert others. This is the fault which all long our apostle has been condemning since he began this epistle, and he has not yet done with it; for thus he proceeds:

7 ¶ For who maketh thee to differ from another? And what hast thou that thou didst not receive? Now, if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it?

As if the apostle had said, "Who is it that maketh one minister to differ from, and excel another? Is it not God? If so, then, let those ministers that have received the greatest gifts from God, whom the inspiration of the Almighty hath made most wise and understanding, to be most humble themselves; let none take occasion from thence to despise others who have received less." Learn hence, That ministers of great abilities, eminent for gifts and graces, are in great danger of being puffed up themselves, and their people also too prone to glory in them. There is a temptation in good things, yea, in the best of things, to pride; the best men on earth may be overheated by what they have received from heaven; and Satan may take occasion, even from our raptures in spirit, to puff us up with spiritual pride; therefore our apostle puts forth this soul-humbling and pride mortifying exhortation, What hast thou that thou hast not received? Who made thee to differ? There is nothing wherein one minister, or indeed one man, differeth, or is distinguished from another, or wherein he excelleth another, but it is given him from God; it is God, and not himself, that makes him to differ; it is an high degree of pride for any man to say, Ego discrevi meipsum, I of myself have made myself to differ.

8 Now ye are full, now ye are rich, ye have reigned as kings without us: and I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you. 9 For I think that God hath set forth us the apostles last, as it were appointed to death. For we are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men. 13 We are fools for Christ's sake; but ye are wise in Christ; we are weak; but ye are strong; ye are honourable, but we are despised.

These words are looked upon by interpreters as an ironical reproof given by St. Paul to the Corinthians, in which, with an holy derision, he rebukes the overweening and high opinion which they had of their present attainments and spiritual perfections. Now are ye full, &c. As if he had said, "Now ye think yourselves so full and rich in all kinds of knowledge, that you despise your spiritual fathers, myself and Apollos, who first converted you to the faith: we are looked upon as dull fellows, not worthy to be named in the same day with your new admired teachers. You advance yourselves as much above us, as a king is above his own subjects. I wish with all my heart, your happiness were real, that we might be sharers in it; but verily I fear that you are only puffed up with notions; I fear ye have little except in conceit, and there you have a great deal too much." Learn hence, That spiritual pride, that is, boasting of, and glorying in the gifts, graces, or privileges which are conferred upon us, is a sin which the devil strongly tempts, and professors are very prone, to the practice and commission of. Now ye are full, now ye are rich. Note, next, As the flourishing condition of the Corinthians is ironically described, so the afflicted and persecuted condition of the apostles is plainly declared: We are a spectacle to the world, and appointed to death. The original word is, We are set upon a theatre or stage, in public view; heaven, earth, and hell, are spectators; God, angels, and men, wait to see the glorious triumphs of our faith and fortitude. What a great solemnity is there at the sufferings of a saint! Bloody persecutors are for making all the members, especially all the ministers of Christ, a spectacle to the world; an allusion to the Roman spectacles, who carried those persons about for a sight who were to fight with wild beasts, and if they escaped, were only reserved for slaughter against another day: Thus the apostles in their martyrdom conflicted with all sorts of misery, and with death itself at last. Note, lastly, How the false professors of Christianity branded the apostles with folly, for exposing themselves thus to suffering and death for the sake of Christ: We are fools for Christ's sake, but ye are wise in Christ; that is, in your account we are fools, because we run so many hazards for the sake of Christ; but you are wise in your profession for Christ, because you have an art to profess him, and yet enjoy outward prosperity with him. The wisdom of suffering Christians, in hazarding all for Christ, and laying down their lives in the cause of Christ, has been always accounted weakness and folly by the men of the world: We are &c.

11 Even unto this present hour we both hunger and thirst, and are naked; and are buffeted, and have that blot and brand of ignominy and baseness upon the body which no other sin doth, degrading it from that excellent honour whereunto God advanced it in its natural condition, by making it the member of an harlot.

19 What, know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost, which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own.—

Here we have the apostle's fifth argument against fornication and uncleanness, and it runs thus: "Temples, which are peculiarly consecrated unto God and his service, ought not to be profaned or polluted; but the bodies of Christians are the temples of God, the Holy Spirit dwelling in them, and therefore they ought to be kept pure and undefiled. Know ye not that your bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost, as well as your souls?" Our bodies are called temples in the Holy Ghost, because he hath sanctified them for himself, for his habitation and for his service. From whence the divinity of the Holy Ghost, may be strongly inferred; a temple always supposes some deity to dwell in it; the tabernacle and temple are called God's habitation; Now if the Holy Ghost dwells in good men as a temple, he is truly and really God. In fine, since all Christians are become the temple of God, by virtue of his holy Spirit sent into their hearts, consecrating their bodies to his sacred service, let us not defecrate or pollute this temple by defiling it with filthy lusts, but make chastity the keeper of this sacred house, and suffer nothing that defileth to enter into it, lest that God, who dwelleth in it, being offended, should desert his house thus defiled.

—And ye are not your own? 20 For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in our body and in your spirit, which are God's.

Here we have the sixth and last argument which the apostle makes use of to flee fornication: Our bodies are not our own, but God's, they are by his creation, his by preservation, his by purchase and redemption: We are bought out of our own hands, as well as out of the hand of divine justice; therefore we sacrilegiously rob and wrong God, when we alienate any part of his own from him, and own him not, whose we wholly are, by the faithful service both of our souls and bodies, which are his. Learn 1. That Christians are not their own, but God's; not their own, and therefore not in their own power, nor at their own disposal, not to live after their own power, or by their own lusts, but according to the will and to the ends and uses of their principal Lord, whose they are. 2. That as Christians are not their own, so they must not act and live and dispose of themselves, of their souls and bodies, as if they were their own, as if they had an original propriety plenary possession, and a full dominion over themselves; a Christian must not make his own reason his supreme rule, nor his own will his chief law, nor his own interest his ultimate end, for he was neither made by himself, nor made for himself. 3. That all of us are God's, and therefore we cannot, without great sacrilege, invade his right, and give that body to an harlot which is consecrated unto him. 4. Though we are all God's, yet we have alienated ourselves from God, and withdrawn ourselves from his disposal. 5. That thus being alienated from God, he has once more bought us, bought us with a price, a great and full price, the blood of his Son; and we are now God's own again by redemption and purpose. 4. That our bodies and spirits being thus the Lord's, we should glorify him both in our souls and bodies, which are his; glorify him in our bodies by external purity, and exemplary sanctity, glorifying him in our spirits by internal purity of heart. Thus if we glorify him in our body, and in our spirits, in a way of obedience, he will at last fashion our vile bodies like unto his glorious body and make our spirits as the spirits of just men made perfect, in that great day, when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe.

CHAP. VII.

Our apostle in this chapter resolves divers cases of conscience, about which the Corinthians had written to him, particularly concerning marriage; not about the lawfulness of it, but about the expediency of it at that time, in the then afflicted state of the church.

NOW concerning the things whereof ye wrote unto me: It is good for a man not to touch a woman.

The first scruple or case of conscience which the Corinthians wrote to the apostle about, was concerning marriage. Amongst many other wicked opinions, which the Gnosticks, those ancient heretics, maintained, This was one, That marriage was from the devil. Our apostle elsewhere, Heb. xiii. 4. asserts marriage to be holy and honourable; here he determines first in general, that such as have the gift of continency, and can live chaste in a single state, do well; and, in particular, that a single life at that time was most advisable, and most agreeable to the calamitous and afflicted state of the church: So that when the apostle says in this verse, It is good for a man not to touch a woman, his meaning is, it is more agreeable to the present necessity, more convenient in regard of the persecuted state of the church as being a condition less distracted with cares, and less troubled with distraction; for marriage plunges men into an excess of worldly cares, it multiplies their business, and usually their wants and those wants are hardier supplied than in a single life, and more difficultly bore; it is much easier to bear personal wants, than family wants: With respect to all which, says the apostle, especially as the present state of the church stands, it is good for a man not to touch a woman, not that it is at any time simply unlawful, but at sometimes manifestly inexpedient.

2 Nevertheless, to avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband.

As if the apostle had said, "Such are the inclinations of human nature, that every man cannot always do that which is most for his own quiet and ease, but men find the strength of lust and the power of concupiscence so strong in themselves, themselves; that marriage, which is God's ordinance for avoiding fornication, and for the propagation of mankind, is of absolute necessity to some persons; therefore for avoiding fornication, and all sorts of uncleanness, (which was so common at Corinth) let every man retain his own wife, and every woman her own husband." Here note 1. The apostle's expression, he says, Quique et quaque, not quidam et quaedam; let every man and every woman marry, not some men and some women only: He excepts none neither priest nor nun, but every one is here permitted, yea, for avoiding fornication commanded to marry. Note farther, How the apostle directs every man to have his own wife, and every woman her own husband; more than one is forbidden, and polygamy, or the sin of having more wives, or more husbands at a time than one, is here condemned: To bridle and restrain men's extravagant lusts, the wisdom of God has directed every man to enjoy his own wife, and every woman her own husband. Let the church of Rome consider how she will answer at the bar of God for spitting in the face of this ordinance of God, for denying the lawfulness of marriage to her priests and nuns, when God has told her, Heb. xiii. 4. That marriage is honourable in all; and that all unclean persons God will judge; and such too often have their priests and nuns been one with another.

3 Let the husband render unto the wife due benevolence; and likewise also the wife unto the husband. 4 The wife hath not power of her own body, but the husband: and likewise also the husband hath not power of his own body, but the wife. 5 Defraud ye not one the other, except it be with consent for a time, that ye may give yourselves to fasting and prayer: and come together again, that Satan tempt you not for your incontinency.

Note here, 1. That matrimonial conversation, or the husband's and wife's performing towards each other all the duties of marriage which they promised, is an act of justice which they owe to one another: This is intimated in the word render, and consequently to deny the same is injustice and fraud; defraud not one another. Marriage takes away from persons that power which they had over themselves and their own bodies, and transfers it in some sort to the person they are married to. Yet note, 2. That persons in a married state may, and in some cases ought, (namely, for religious ends and purposes) by mutual consent, to abstain from a conjugal duty for some time. Defraud not one another, except it be with consent for a time, that ye may give yourselves to fasting and prayer. Note, 3. The apostle lays no obligation upon any single persons to take upon them a vow for a single life, nor doth he direct married persons to those perpetual divorces from the marriage bed, which the papists practise, under pretence of religion: For the apostle admits of no perpetual separation between husband and wife, upon any pretence whatever; no, not that they may give themselves to prayer and fasting, but only permits it for a time, upon condition that they come together again. So far was this holy man from laying a snare upon the consciences of any persons, either in a single or married state.

6 But I speak this by permission, and not of commandment. 7 For I would that all men were even as I myself. But every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that: 8 I say therefore to the unmarried and widows; It is good for them if they abide even as I: 9 But if they cannot contain, let them marry: for it is better to marry than burn.

As if the apostle had said, "Mistake me not, as if I imposed marriage upon all persons as a duty: No, but I declare it is permitted to all as a remedy against fornication: for so far am I from that, that I could wish all men were unmarried, even as I myself am, and that they had the gift of continence with myself; but God, who will have the world yet farther continued and increased, hath not given this gift to all nor to all alike in the same measure. Therefore to the unmarried I say, that so many are the advantages of a single life, that if they can abide chaste and single, as I do, it will be many ways for their advantage: But if they cannot, let them use God's remedy; which is marriage; for it is better to marry, than to burn in lust, to be perpetually assaulted with unclean desires, and subject to the ravings and insults of lust." Learn hence, (1.) That marrying or not marrying; is, according to several circumstances, matter of advice and counsel, but neither of them absolutely of precept. (2.) That second marriages are not only lawful, but an incumbent duty, if persons cannot contain themselves within the bounds and rules of chastity. To the widows I say, if they cannot contain let them marry.

10 And unto the married I command, yet not I, but the Lord. Let not the wife depart from her husband: 11 But and if she depart, let her remain unmarried, or be reconciled to her husband. And let not the husband put away his wife.

As if the apostle had said, "Although it be no sin to marry, yet it is a sin to depart when married; herein I lay the authority of God's command upon you, that you agree together, and that no difference which may arise between you, cause you to separate and live asunder. But to marry upon departure, is a double sin. Therefore if any disagreements and contentions between husband and wife cause you to live asunder for a time, think not either of you of marrying to another person; but be reconciled to each other, and live together in love, as becometh persons professing godliness." A civil war in families is fatal as well as in the commonwealth, Domestic contentions, especially betwixt husband and wife, are dangerous and destructive of love and peace. If at any time they arise to that height as to cause a separation betwixt them two, who are one flesh, yet nothing of that nature can warrant their divorce; nothing but death or adultery can untie the marriage knot, and release them from their obligations to each other.

12 But to the rest speak I, not the Lord, If any brother hath a wife, that believeth not, and she be pleased to dwell with him, let him not put her away.

13 And the woman that hath an husband that believeth believeth not, and if he be pleased to dwell with her, let her not leave him. 14 For the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband. Else were your children unclean; but now are they holy.

1. Here we have another case of conscience put by the Corinthians to the apostle; namely, whether such husbands as had heathen and infidel wives might put them away; and whether such wives as had infidel husbands; might not, and ought not to depart from them? The apostle resolves the case, That they ought, according to the intent and end of marriage, to cohabit and dwell together; and he assigns the reason for it, because the unbelieving or infidel wife is sanctified to the believing or christian husband. How sanctified? Not in her nature, but in her use; so that they might lawfully cohabit and converse together; being by marriage made one flesh with him on her that is holy; "And for your children, says he, they are not seminally unclean, like the children of heathens, but federally holy. How are they holy? Not with an inherent, external, personal holiness; for the holiest man's child is born in sin, and by nature a child of wrath; but with an external, relative, and federal holiness: they are not common and unclean like the children of infidels, but fit to be partakers of the privileges of the church, to be admitted into company with God, as belonging to his holy people: Else were your children unclean, but now are they holy. He doth not say, Else were your children bastards, but now they are legitimate, as the enemies of infant-baptism, those duri infantum patres, would make him speak; but else they were unclean, that is, heathen children, not to be owned as an holy seed, and therefore not to be admitted into covenant with God, as belonging to his holy people. If by holiness here the apostle mentions a matrimonial holiness, as the anabaptists dream then according to their interpretation of the word holy, the apostle speaks neither pertinently, nor truly: Not pertinently, (1.) For the the answer had been nothing to the purpose. The case put was concerning husbands and wives, not concerning men and whores; and the question propounded by the Corinthians, was, not whether a believing husband, and an unbelieving wife, were lawful man and wife together? nobody questioned that, but whether the christian husband might put away his heathen wife? The apostle answers He ought not, if she were willing to dwell with him, for she is sanctified to him; not sanctified in respect to her personal condition, but in respect of her conjugal relation other wise their children would be looked upon as unclean, like the children of heathens; but now are they holy, that is to be accounted visible saints, and, as such, to be admitted to church-privileges. (2.) According to this interpretation of the word holy, the apostle had not spoken truly; for the children of heathens, born in lawful wedlock, are no more bastards than the children of christians; for their parents marriage frees them from the charge of illegitimacy as well as others. Add to this, that in all the New Testament, though the word holy be used above five hundred times, yet it never once signifies legitimacy, but is always used for a state of separation to God: Therefore, to make it signify so here, is a bold practising upon scripture, a wracking and wresting of the word of God, to maintain a private opinion, to make the text speak what they would have, and not what the apostle intends. But the argument for infant-baptism from this text, runs thus: "If the holy seed among the Jews were therefore to be circumcised, and made federally holy, by receiving the sign of the covenant, and being admitted into the number of God's holy people, because they were seminally holy; for the root being holy, the branches were also holy: Then, by like reason, the holy seed of Christians ought to be admitted to baptism, and receive the sign of the Christian covenant; the laver of regeneration, and so be entered into the society of the Christian church,"

15 But if the unbelieving depart, let him depart. A brother or a sister is not under bondage in such cases: but God hath called us to peace. 16 For what knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? Or how knowest thou, O man, whether thou shalt save thy wife? 17 But as God hath distributed to every man, as the Lord hath called every one, so let him walk. And so ordain I in all churches.

Here another doubt is resolved by the apostle, in case the unbelieving party, either husband or wife, depart, that is, refuse to co-habit and dwell with their believing yoke-fellow, and so make void, as much as in him or her lieth, the marriage-bond, out of hatred to the faith; in that case if they will go, let them go; you are not bound to leave your family to follow them. However let every Christian husband or wife omit nothing, but endeavouring every thing to the utmost, to oblige and win, to incline and engage their unbelieving yoke-fellow, to live quietly with them; for God hath called us to peace; and therefore we must give no occasion of quarrel with, or separation from, so near a relation: And besides by the peaceable dwelling together, there is hope of, and a fair opportunity for, the gaining and bringing over the unbeliever to the faith of Christ, and of being the instrument of his or her salvation: But however that may be, let every minister discharge his duty in every relation in which God has set him. This order I appoint in all churches converted to Christianity, knowing it to be agreeable to the mind of God, "That no Christian should pretend his profession of religion, to excuse him from the duties of any relation."

18 Is any man called being circumcised? Let him not become uncircumcised. Is any called in uncircumcision? Let him not become circumcised. 19 Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God,

Here the apostle proceeds to exhort the Corinthians to be content with the lot and condition which God had distributed unto them, and to frame themselves to walk christianly in it. Particularly, he shews, That if any person amongst them were a native Jew, and so circumcised, and afterwards converted to Christianity, he should neither trouble himself to get off that mark from his flesh, nor affect the state of him, who, being a Gentile, had never been circumcised. On the other side if any of them were native Gentiles, and never circumcised, but now converted to Christianity, let him not affect the state of one who was a native Jew, and circumcised; for circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, that is, nothing now available to salvation, nothing that renders persons more or less acceptable in the sight of God; but the keeping of the commandments of God this is all in all: For God regards not men's outward condition, but obedience to his commands. Christianity consists not in a warm zeal, either for or against outward ceremonies, but in positive holiness, and a strict conformity to divine precepts.

20 Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called. 21 Art thou called being a servant? care not for it; but if thou mayest be made free use it rather. 22 For he that is called in the Lord being a servant, is the Lord's free-man: likewise also he that is called being free, is Christ's servant. 23 Ye are bought with a price; be not ye the servants of men. 24 Brethren, let every man whereia he is called, therein abide with God.

The apostle seems to intimate from these words, that some persons converted to Christianity in the primitive times, apprehended, that thereupon they must leave their worldly callings and employments, as if they were snares to them, or unnecessary diversions from better things. No, says the apostle, Let every one, in his calling wherein he is called, therein abide with God: that is, look in what honest civil calling they were found when they became Christians, let them keep to that calling still: For God doth not call us from our worldly employments and busines, but calls us to be holy in them; nor doth our serving God any whit acquit and discharge us from serving one another. But particularly it was the opinion of some servants converted to Christianity, that their spiritual freedom by Christ, exempted them from all civil service to their masters. The apostle therefore tells them, they are indeed freed by Christ from sinful slavery, but not from civil service and subjection; from Jewish bondage, but not from Christian obedience. Learn hence, That Christianity doth not free men from any civil obligations which before they lay under. Our advantages by Christ are not spiritual, and not secular; no man's outward condition is changed by his becoming Christian; though he be now the Lord's free-man, yet he is a servant still, if he was so before; nay, their Christianity did not exempt them from their secular relation to their Heathen and Infidel masters: As service to a man doth not exempt us from, nor is inconsistent with, the service of God: so our spiritual calling doth not make void our civil: Therefore let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called.

25 Now concerning virgins, I have no commandment of the Lord: yet I give my judgment as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful. 26 I suppose therefore that this is good for the present distress: I say that it is good for a man so to be. 27 Art thou bound unto a wife? seek not to be loosed. Art thou loosed from a wife? seek not a wife. 28 But if thou marry thou hast not sinned: and if a virgin marry, she hath not sinned. Nevertheless, such shall have trouble in the flesh: but I spare you.

The next case which our apostle comes to resolve, is concerning virgins; whether they, being at their own disposal, should marry, or keep themselves single. He tells them first, that he had no special command, whereby the state of virginity was either enjoined or prohibited, but he would faithfully give his advice, according to the best of his judgment: And this he doth in two particulars; First, That by reason of the present distress, and danger of persecution, which threatened the church, it was most convenient, that such as were single should continue so, if it might lawfully be done. Yet, secondly, He declares, that if they marry, they do not sin; only they will be exposed to more troubles, as the church's troubles do encrease. Here note, 1. That the apostle pronounces marriage lawful in all persons, of both sexes, and not sinful at any time, or in any state and condition whatsoever. 2. That he signifies to all persons, that the troubles of a married life are more than those which attend a single state; Such shall have trouble in the flesh. Marriage plunges men into an excess of worldly cares; it multiplies their business, and usually their wants; and these wants are far hardlier to be borne than in a single life. 3. That besides the ordinary inconveniences of a married life, which all persons are to expect, such as enter the married condition, when the church is under persecution, must prepare to meet with more than ordinary troubles. Such, that is, in those times of persecution, shall have trouble, that is, more trouble, in the flesh; But I spare you, that is, "I forbear to speak any more of that matter, lest I should seem to dissuade you from marriage, which is the ordinance of God, more than is fit, and be thought by any, to lay the yoke of celibacy, or a single life, upon you. I only tell you, that when Christians are under persecution and distress, it is much more for their ease and quiet to be single, than to have a wife and children to care for in poverty or flight."

29 But this I say, brethren, the time is short. It remaineth, that both they that have wives be as if they had none; 30 And they that weep, as though they wept not; and they that rejoice, as though they rejoiced not; and they that buy, as though they possessed not: And they that use this world, as not abusing it. For the fashion of this world passeth away.

As if he had said, "Let all persons, both married and unmarried, consider that the time of this life is short and passing; it is but a point of time we have to live, and shortly it will not be a pin to chuse, whether we had wives or not, or children or not; but before the expected fruit of the comforts be ripe, we ourselves may be rotten. It is therefore true spiritual wisdom, to look upon these things now, as they will be shortly; to be very moderate in the enjoyment of them, not to be too much affected when we have them, or too much afflicted when we want them." Observe here, 1. The apostle's proposition; the time is short. This is true in all the notions of it. Take it first for the whole duration of the world, from the day of its creation, to the day of its dissolution; compare it with what succeeds it, eternity: and it is very short, but a moment. Secondly, Take time for the whole duration of any one man's life, so it is shorter; so short, that it is nothing. Thirdly, Take time for the special season, either of doing or enjoying good in this life; so it is shortest of all. 2. The inference which the apostle draws from this proposition; therefore, let them that have wives be as if they had none, &c. Learn thence, That the consideration of the great shortness of time, and the uncertainty of human life, should keep our hearts in a great deal of moderation towards the best and sweetest of our outward comforts and enjoyments: That we neither love inordinately any mercy when we enjoy it, nor mourn immoderately for any contentment when we come to be deprived of it; They that weep as though they weep not, and they that rejoice as though they rejoiced not. 3. The advice which the apostle gives to such as have great possessions and revenues in this world. (1.) To take heed, that though they possess these things; that they be not possessed by them. (2.) That they so use them as not to abuse them, nor be abused by them. There is much evil in the world, yet we may, we must use it, and it will be our wisdom to make a good use of this world, while we are in it; otherwise we neither answer the end of God in sending us into the world, nor the design of God in trusting us with the good things of this world. 4. The reason assigned, why we should use the world in the fore-mentioned manner: because the fashion of this world passeth away. Here the apostle compares the things of this world to a scene which is presently changed, and vanisheth almost as soon as it appears. As fashions in this world alter, so doth the fashion of this world alter every day. There is a world to come, the fashion whereof shall never pass away; but the fashion or scheme of this world passeth away continually. This world is like a stage, persons interchangeably act their parts upon it; but they soon disapper, and the stage itself ere long will be pulled down. The fashion of this world passeth away. Thence learn, That this consideration, that all the comforts and conveniences of this life are fading and passing away from us, should be a strong inducement to us, not to set our hearts upon them.

32 But I would have you without carefulness. He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord: 33 But he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife. 34 There is difference also between a wife and a virgin, The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit: but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband. 35

And this I speak for your own profit; not that I may cast a snare upon you, but for that which is comely, and that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction.

Here our apostle subjoins another reason why a single life is to be preferred before a married life; namely, because single persons are comparatively more free from cares and distractions, and have commonly more time and leisure to attend upon the Lord in religious duties. For the unmarried man has but one care upon him, namely, how he may serve and please God: But the married man has another care upon him; to wit, how he may oblige and please his wife. In like manner, a married woman is incumbered with household affairs, disturbed with domestic cares, and concerned in lawful things to please her husband, and consequently has neither so much time nor freedom for holy exercises: But the virgin that has no family to care for, no husband to seek to please, has much more leisure to attend upon God in holy duties and religious exercises; therefore he advises them to chuse that state of life in which they may attend upon the Lord without distraction. Learn hence, 1. That a married condition is certainly and necessarily attended with many diversions and distractions, from which a single life is free. 2. That persons in a conjugal relation may and ought to seek the obliging and pleasing one another with their utmost endeavours, without violating their duty to Almighty God. 3. That persons in a single state have great advantages (may they improve them!) of serving God above others, in regard of their freedom from domestic cares, troubles, and temptations; they have time and leisure for pious performances, if the heart be disposed for them. 4. That it is, the duty, and ought to be the endeavour of all persons, both married and unmarried, not only to serve God in religious duties, but to attend upon him in them, as much as may be, without distraction. Distractions are the wandrings of the heart, mind, and thoughts, from God in religious duties. The nature of God requires, that we watch and strive against them: His majesty and greatness, his purity and holiness, his omniscency and all-seeing eye upon us, and within us, do oblige us to this careful endeavour; and the nature of his worship calls for it, which is a reasonable service, and a spiritual service; and the nature of distractions should make us dread them. They divide the heart, they deaden the duty, contract guilt, and provoke displeasure. Lord, help us in all the services we perform unto thee, to attend upon thee without distraction.

36 But if any man think that he behaveth himself uncomely towards his virgin if she pass the flower of her age, and need so require, let him do what he will, he sinneth not; let them marry. 37 Nevertheless, he that standeth stedfast in his heart, having no necessity, but hath power over his own will, and hath so decreed in his heart that he will keep his virgin, doeth well. 38 So then, he that giveth her in marriage, doeth well; but he that giveth her not in marriage doeth better.

The next case which our apostle speaks to, is concerning virgins, who are under the power of others, (and not at their own disposal) as parents and guardians; namely, whether it be best and most advisable for them to dispose of their virgins in marriage or not. The apostle answers, that in this case, particular respect must be had to particular circumstances; as, namely, if she be of marriageable years, and beyond them; if she has an inclination to, and be desirous of marriage, then he advises that she be disposed of: But if a parent be fully persuaded in his own mind, that he wrongs not his daughter in declining to marry her, if he has a perfect freedom in his own will, and his will is not contradicted by his daughter's desire, he doth well, yea, he doth best not to marry her; best with respect to the distressed condition of the church, best with respect to the troubles of the world, which she will be the more free from; and best with respect to the young woman's liberty and freedom for the service of God, and the exercises of religion. Learn hence, That although children are to be disposed of in marriage by their parents, yet parents have no such absolute power over their children, as to hinder them from marriage, or to compel them to it: To do either, is very sinful, very unnatural.

39 The wife is bound by the law as long as her husband liveth: but if her husband be dead, she is at liberty to be married to whom she will; only in the Lord. 20. But she is happier, if she so abide, after my judgment. And I think also that I have the Spirit of God.

The apostle concludes the chapter with a resolution of this case of conscience; namely, Whether second marriages of widows were lawful or not. He answers, They were. After the husband was dead, the widow might marry again, provided that she marry in the Lord; that is, with a believer, not an infidel; with one of the same faith with herself. It is very dangerous and sinful, for persons professing the true faith of Christ, to match with idolaters. There is far better ground of fear that they will pervert you, than there is ground of hope that you shall convert them. But though the apostle asserts it lawful for widows to marry again, yet he declares, that in regard of the present danger which the church was in of persecution, they would be more happy in their widowhood. So that the determination of the apostle as to the case of marriage and a single life, is concluded thus: "That ordinarily, where there is no necessity, a single life is more for a person's peace, more free from distractions in God's service, and therefore best."

CHAP. VIII.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing chapter, resolved several cases of conscience concerning marriage: here resolves that grand case touching the lawfulness of eating things offered to idols: The Heathens used to sacrifice to their idols, oxen, sheep, and other cattle, and to feast upon their sacrifices: Now, the question which the Corinthians put to the apostle to resolve, was this, Whether Christians, if invited to these feasts, might go and eat these meats, either in the idol temples, or in the Pagan houses, or might buy and eat of any such meat, if it were sold in the shambles? A resolution of which question, we have in this and the tenth chapter.

NOW as touching things offered unto idols, we know that we all have knowledge. Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth.

It was the opinion of the Gnostics and Nicholaitans, those early erroneous persons in the apostles days, that from the knowledge they had of their Christian liberty, they might either be present in the idol temples, or eat of the idol-sacrifices as they pleased. The apostle here tells them, that they knew many of them had a good degree of knowledge, but desires, that they might not be puffed up with it, but that their knowledge may be accompanied with charity, which respects the edification of others; and put men upon considering, not only what is lawful to be done in itself, and with respect to ourselves, but what is expedient or inexpedient in relation unto others. True love, or Christian charity, will put us upon consulting the good of our neighbours souls, as well as our own; and will not suffer us to do that thing which may offend our weak brother, that is, lay a stumbling-block before him, to tempt him into sin. Knowledge puffeth up; this is to be understood of a notional, literal, and speculative knowledge only; not of a spiritual, practical, and experimental knowledge. The more a gracious man knows, the more humble he is, because his knowledge shews him his own vileness and emptiness; but the more a carnal man knows, the more proud he is, because he knoweth not himself; his knowledge is not only a temptation to pride, but the very matter of his pride. Such knowledge doth not build up, but puff up; whereas charity edifieth; that is, applies itself to the instruction of others, and accommodates itself to the edification of others, and considers, not only what may lawfully be done, but what is fit and expedient to be done; as in the case here before us, eating things offered to idols.

2. And if any man think he knoweth any thing, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know.

That is, "If a man have ever so much knowledge, yet if it be not accompanied with charity and humility, if he improves not his knowledge to the glory of God, and the good of others, he knows nothing to any saving purpose, or as he ought to know." Learn that Christians should by no means content themselves with an empty speculative knowledge, but labour to know as they ought to know. Farther, The apostle says, He that thinketh he knoweth any thing, that is, he that is conceited in his own knowledge, that thinks of it with insolency and pride, and speaks of it with affectation and vain-glory; he who is thus conceited of his own knowledge, knows not himself; yea, he knows nothing as he ought to know. Learn hence, That it becomes us to have very humble thoughts of ourselves, and of our own knowledge, how much soever we really know: That man's wisdom is but conceit, who is only wise in his own conceit.

3 But if any man love God the same is known of him.

Note, The apostle doth not say, If any man know God; but if any man love God, the same is known, that is, allowed, accepted and approved of him: A man may know much of God in this world; and yet God may be ashamed to know him in another world; but the soul that sincerely loves God, is certainly beloved of him, and shall be owned and acknowledged by him. Now, true love to our neighbour, is a good evidence of our sincere love to God; and if we love our neighbour truly, we dare not scandalize our neighbour sinfully, nor offend our fellow brethren: Only here we must take notice, that by offending the weak is not meant displeasing them; but by offending them, is meant, laying a stumbling block before them, which may occasion their falling into sin.

4 As concerning therefore the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one.

One argument which the Gnostics used to prove the lawfulness of eating things offered unto idols was this, That an idol was nothing in the world; but how nothing? It was not materially nothing, for it was wood or stone; but formally it was nothing, it was nothing of God's creation, nothing that the idolator took it to be, there was nothing of a deity in it, and nothing of a deity could be represented by it; an idol is the vainest thing in the world, it is a mere vanity, a perfect nothing, (called therefore the vanities of the Gentiles) it is of no worth or value, it has no power or virtue. Some observe, That the same Hebrew word signifies both an idol, and sorrow, and labour, partly because idols are made and formed with much labour, and great exactness; the wood or stone, figuratively speaking, is put to pain, you must cut it and carve it, to make an idol or statue of it; partly because idols are served and worshipped with much pain and labour; false worship is more painful than true, the service of the true God is an holy and honourable service, a noble and ingenuous service, an easy and delightful service; but the service of idols is slavish, a toil rather than worship. Idols are troublesome both in making and worshiping; and, after all the bustle made about them, an idol is nothing in the world, because there is no God but one.

5 For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, (as there be gods many and lords many) 6 But to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ by whom are all things, and we by him.

Here the apostle tells them, that although the heathen idolaters acknowledged a plurality of gods, some in heaven, as the sun, moon, and stars; some on earth, as men and beasts, they have their celestial and terrestrial gods and lords, but these were only called gods, that is, in God's name, not in nature, not in reality: Yet says he, we christians do own and acknowledge but one living and true God, one in nature, not one in person, to whom all our prayers must be directed; and one Mediator, by whom all our prayers are to be offered. To us there is but one God, the Father. This text the Arians, and Socinians, and Unitarians, exceedingly boast of, as if it expressly confined the Deity to the Father, as distinct from Christ and the Holy Ghost. Thus they argue, (1.) "He who saith there is one emperor, to wit, Cæsar, says in effect there is no other emperor but Cæsar; so when St. Paul saith there is one God the Father, he doth (say they) in effect declare that there is no other God besides the Father." To this the Orthodox answer, (1.) "That God the Father is often put in scripture for the whole Deity, comprehending the three Persons; he being sons Deitatis, and fundamentum trinitatis, as the schoolmen speak: so that the application of the word God here unto the Father, doth not exclude the Son from being God, but only from being the fountain of the Deity as the Father is. In Rev. i. 17. Christ says, I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last: Will any conclude thence that God the Father is not Alpha and Omega? Is not he the first and the last, as well as Christ? Again, We call our Lord Jesus the only Saviour; do we therefore exclude God the Father from being a Saviour? Is he not styled the Saviour of all men? 1. Tim. iv. 10. Again, God the Father is called the Creator of all things, yet it is asserted that all things were created by Christ, the word, John i. 2. In short, we assert, as well as they, the unity of the Godhead, and that Christ is not another God, but only another person from the Father. We answer, (2.) Their own argument may be thus retorted: upon themselves; as the apostle says here, there is but one God the Father, so he adds in the next words, there is but one Lord Jesus Christ: Now if the saying that there is but one God, doth exclude Christ from being God, then the saying that there is but one Lord, doth exclude God the Father from being Lord; and if it be blasphemy to exclude God the Father from being Lord, it is no less to exclude Christ the Son from being God." Know then, That as Christians have in all ages of the church acknowledged one God only, even God the Father, so have they also owned that Jesus Christ was truly God, of the substance of the Father, God of God, very God of very God. The Lord keep us steadfast in this faith, seeing he that honoureth the Son, honoureth the Father that hath sent him; but he that denieth the Son, denieth the Father also.

7 Howbeit there is not in every man that knowledge. For some with conscience of the idol unto this hour eat it as a thing offered unto an idol; and their conscience being weak is defiled.

These words are brought in as a reason by the apostle, why strong Christians should not eat meat offered unto idols with respect to those that are weak; as if he had said, "Though many of you that know an idol is nothing, and that meat is neither sanctified nor polluted which is set before before it, and therefore, you can eat or not eat without any scruple as to yourselves, yet you should consider what is safest to be done with respect to others; for every man has not this knowledge that an idol is nothing, but some persons have a conceit of the idol being something, eat what is offered to it as a thing offered to an idol, that is, not as common meat, but as a sacred banquet in honour of the idol! and so his conscience being weak, that is, erroneous, is defiled." Learn hence, That an action which is lawful in respect of ourselves, may yet be a sin if done by us with respect to others; another, encouraged by our example, may do the same act, but not do it with the same intent, as in the case before us: The sight of one Christian's eating things offered unto idols, who knows that an idol is nothing in the world, may harden, embolden, and encourage others to do the same, who really intend some honour by it to the idol; the outward action is the same, but the opinion and intention wide and different.

8 ¶ But meat commendeth us not to God: for neither, if we eat, are we the better: neither, if we eat not, are we the worse. 9 But take heed, lest by any means this liberty of yours become a stumbling-block to them that are weak.

As if the apostle had said, "It is not the eating or not eating barely considered, that makes a man either better or worse, more or less acceptable in the sight of God, but we must take great heed lest by our example others take occasion to worship the idol; you therefore ought not so to eat as to give occasion to the fall of your weak brother." Still the apostle holds forth this truth unto us, That such a man certainly sins, who uses his liberty, so that it becomes a snare and a stumbling block to his weak brother, by emboldening and encouraging him into sin.

10 For if any man see thee which hast knowledge sit at meat in the idol's temple, shall not the conscience of him that is weak be emboldened to eat those things which are offered to idols; 11 And through my knowledge shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ died?

The meaning of the apostle seems to be this: "If any man with an erroneous conscience goes to these feasts, and there sees thee, who he thinks has more knowledge than himself, sit at meat in the idol's temple, will not his conscience be the more emboldened by thy example, to eat things offered to idols in the honour of the idol, or, as thinking it no hurt to worship the idol? And thus, by occasion of thy knowledge, a weak brother is in danger of perishing, for whom Christ died." An indiscreet use of that liberty, which our supposed knowledge teaches us to make use of, doth that, if we be not careful, which may be accounted a destroying of our weak brother, by causing him to fall into sin: By all which the apostle lets us know the obligation which lies upon every good Christian, not to use his liberty to the prejudice of other souls, by doing any action which may be let alone, but if done, may really become a snare to others.

12 But when ye sin so against the brethren, and wound their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ.

The apostle goes on to shew, that such an use of our Christian liberty as doth embolden and encourage others to do that which is evil, is both an act of uncharitableness towards our brother, and also an act of sin against our Lord Jesus Christ, in betraying a soul to ruin as much as in us lieth, and hindering his salvation for the saving of whom Christ died, wounding the members of his body, defeating the great end of his death, and destroying them whom he designed to save. Learn, 1. That Christ in dying for the weakest believers, hath shewn the highest degree of love imaginable unto them. 2. That such as will not abate or abridge themselves of their Christian liberty, when the use of it may probably be an occasion of sin, and the ruin of their brethren's souls, do at once wound their weak brethren, and sin against Christ:

13 Wherefore, if meat make by brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend.

A twofold sense and interpretation is given of these words. Some understand the apostle speaking thus: "If my eating meat offered to idols be a stumbling block to any persons, and confirms them in their sinful practice, or be an occasion of sin unto them, I will certainly deny myself the use of that liberty which may prove of such dangerous consequence to my fellow Christians." Others carry the thing higher, and understand it of a ll flesh in general; that rather than the apostle would offend his weak brother, he would not eat any flesh to his dying day; an hyperbolical expression, by which the apostle declares how far one Christian should condescend to another, to prevent each others sinning against God: As if the apostle had said, "Verily I do not make so light of another's sin, nor set so light by the soul of my weak brother, nor by the blood of my blessed Saviour, as for flesh, that is, for an unnecessary thing, to make use of my liberty, when it may prove a temptation unto sin." From the whole of the apostle's discourse in this chapter, we learn, That it is the duty of Christians, in matters, wherein they are at liberty by the law of God, to do a thing, or not to do it, to take that part which, they see, will give least occasion of sin unto their brethren, and to avoid that part, which, if taken, will certainly give occasion unto others to sin: Although we be ourselves never so well satisfied as to the lawfulness of the action, yet we ought not to deny ourselves in some things, rather than be an occasion unto others, to fall into sin; he forfeits the name of a Christian who will not abridge himself of his Christian liberty to preserve his brother from sin and temptation.

CHAP. IX.

Our apostle having exhorted the Corinthians to abridge themselves in the lawful use of their Christian liberty, when it will be prejudicial to weak Christians; here propounds his own example for their encouragement and imitation, who though he was an apostle, yet restrained restrained himself in several cases, which are recorded in this chapter.

AM I not an apostle? am I not free? have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord? are not ye my work in the Lord?

The first instance which the apostle gives of his freedom and liberty was this, That when he preached the gospel amongst them at Corinth, he had a liberty either to live on the gospel, and take maintenance of them for preaching, or to live upon his labour, following his trade of tent-making, according as he saw it best for the furtherance of the gospel: Am I not free? As if he had said, "Have not I as good a claim to freedom and Christian liberty as any man? For Am not I an apostle, or an extraordinary messenger of Jesus Christ? And though I never saw the face of Christ upon earth, yet have I not seen him, and heard him speaking to me from heaven? And is not the conversion of you, the Corinthians, to the Christian faith by my ministry, a fruit and seal of my apostleship? Now, if I be all this, certainly I have as great a right and claim to the use of Christian liberty, as any of you will pretend to have: Yet will I only make use of it for the benefit of others, and for the furtherance of the gospel." Learn we from the apostle's example, in abstaining from that liberty and power which God had given him for receiving maintenance from them to whom he preached the gospel, how much it is the duty and concern of all Christians to the end of the world, to abstain from the exercise of that liberty, and rightful power granted to them by Christ, for avoiding the scandal of the weak, and provoking men's spiritual welfare.

2 If I be not an apostle unto others, yet doubtless I am to you; for the seal of mine apostleship are ye in the Lord.

As if he had said, "Whatever others do, you of all men should not question my apostleship, for you were converted by it: You confirm and ratify my ministry, that it is of God, and that God is in it of a truth: The conversion of sinners, and the building up of saints, is God's seal to our ministry." Learn hence, That there is no such argument to prove a minister sent of Christ, as the success of his ministry in the conversion of souls unto God: This is God's seal to his office, that he is a minister called of God, and sent by God. Happy those ministers who can say unto their people, Ye are our work, and the seal of our apostleship are ye in the Lord. Yet must it not be concluded from hence that a person is not a true minister of Christ, because he cannot produce this seal: The good of our ministry is not always known to ourselves; much less published to the world: More good is done many times by the ministry of the word than the minister knows of: the seed sometimes lies long under the clods before it fructifies; what is sown in one minister's time, comes up in another's; so one soweth and another reapeth, but both he that soweth, and he that reapeth, shall rejoice together. But where this seal can be procured, it is a certain sign that such a minister is sent of God, and that God is with him, and owns him; yet it must be added, that though the success of our ministry to others is a seal of our office, and assures us that we are true ministers, yet it is the efficacy of the word we preach upon our own hearts and lives, that is the witness of our sanctification, and the seal of our salvation. Lord! how sad will it be for any of us to have been instruments for the helping others to heaven by the soundness of our doctrine and go to hell ourselves for the badness of our example, and the wickedness of our lives!

3 Mine answer to them that examine me is this:
4 Have we not power to eat and drink? 5 Have we not power to lead about a sister, a wife, as well as other apostles, and as the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas? 6 Or I only and Barnabas, have not we power to forbear working?

Here the apostle instances in another branch of his Christian liberty, and that was marriage, he could have taken a wife, as Peter and other apostles did, had he pleased and have put the church to farther charges in maintaining himself, a wife, and family, as did others, without blame: And he and Barnabas had power to forbear working for their living, and maintaining themselves with their own labour in tent-making; they had power to ask maintenance of the Corinthians, if they pleased. But they considered the low circumstances which the church was in and under at that time, and continued both in a single state, and wrought with their hands to maintain themselves, when they might have expected maintenance from the church. Have we not power to lead about a sister, a wife? That is, to marry, if we saw fit. Hence learn, 1. The lawfulness of the ministers of the gospel marrying, as well as other men; neither the prophets of the Old Testament, nor the apostles of the New did abhor the marriage-bed, nor judge themselves too pure for an institution of their Maker; the doctrine forbidding marriage to any, (which the apostle says is honourable in all) is called a doctrine of devils. 2. That no Christians, much less ministers, have power, that is, any lawful power, to marry such as are no Christians; their wives must be their sisters in Christ; that is, Christian women, at least by external and visible profession. 3. That husband and wife ought to be undivided companions one to another, Have we not power to lead about a wife? That is, to take her with us in our travels and journeyings from place to place, for our comfort and assistance. Husbands and wives are to be mutual companions sharers in each other's sorrows, and partakers of one another's comforts.

7 ¶ Who goeth a warfare any time at his own charges? who planteth a vineyard and eateth not of the fruit thereof? or who feedeth a flock, and eateth not of the milk of the flock?

As if the apostle had said, "As soldiers are paid by those that employ them, and as husbandmen and shepherds live upon the fruit of their labours, so may I, and all the ministers of the gospel with me." Where note, 1. That the ministerial function is represented here as a warfare: the ministers of Christ are spiritual soldiers, they have many enemies to encounter with, and contend against. They are are also planters, wine-dressers, husbandmen, shepherds : All which titles given to them, do intimate and signify what care and painfulness, what diligence and watchfulness, should be found with them. 2. That maintenance, a comfortable maintenance, from the people is a debt due to the ministers of the gospel, who labour in the word and doctrine amongst them. Who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? This is the first argument which our apostle here makes use of, to prove the minister's maintenance, a duty taken from the law of nature, equity and custom, which do appoint and allow to soldiers, wine-dressers and shepherds, yea, to all that labour for the sake of others in their respective callings, a due reward of wages. What soldier goes to war at his own charges?

8 Say I these things as a man? or saith not the law the same also? 9 For it is written in the law of Moses, Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God take care for oxen? 10 Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? for our sakes, no doubt, this is written, that he that ploweth should plow in hope; and that he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope.

A second argument produced by the apostle for the people's cheerful maintenance of the ministers of the gospel, is taken from the Levitical law: Say I these things as a man? Or saith not the law the same also? As if he had said, "I do not speak this only rationally, as a thing very agreeable to the light of nature, and the law of nations, but the Levitical law says the same: For when God, in Deut. xxv. 4. forbids to muzzle the mouth of the ox, who by hard labour treadeth out the corn with his feet, his design therein is more than the bare taking care of the ox; for thereby he shews in general what equity should be used in the just rewarding of all men that labour for us; and in particular, the spiritual labourers, such as plow, and sow, and thresh, in the spiritual husbandry, should labour in hope of a livelihood and subsistence, and eat their bread when they have earned it. If all men are encouraged to work, by a just expectation of the fruit of their own labours, why should not the ministers of the word meet with the like encouragement, which all mankind look upon as their just due?"

11 If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things?

A third argument for the ministers' maintenance is here taken from common justice: They sow spiritual things; that is, they dispense the word and sacraments, and endeavour to make men spiritual and holy here, and happy hereafter; and therefore they ought to reap some of their people's carnal things, things for the support of their lives, and subsistence for themselves and their families: So that the ministers of God are not indebted to their people, but their people are indebted both to God and them; they give their people things of a much greater value, and more excellent use, for things of much lesser value, and more inferior use; for their carnal things, they give them spiritual things.

12 If others be partakers of this power over you, are not we rather? nevertheless we have not used this power; but suffer all things, lest we should hinder the gospel of Christ.

Here we have a fourth argument for the Corinthians allowing St. Paul and other apostles a sufficient maintenance; namely, from their own example to other teachers at Corinth: As if he had said, "You maintain others, why not us? Do not you owe more to us, who first laid the foundation of a Christian church amongst you, and have begotten you through the gospel, than you do to others?" Nevertheless he tells them, that himself and Barnabas, although they had this unquestionable liberty, yet they never made use of it, but suffered hunger and thirst, weariness and want, lest it should obstruct the course, and hinder the progress of the gospel; whilst some might, though very unjustly, charge them with covetousness; and others, to save charges, might decline hearing of them.

13 Do ye not know, that they which minister about holy things, live of the things of the temple; and they which wait at the altar, are partakers with the altar?

14 Even so hath the Lord ordained that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel.

A fifth argument is here produced for the minister's maintenance, which is taken from the example of the Levites, who lived upon things that were offered in the temple, and at the altar, and had a considerable part of the sacrifices allowed them by God himself for their ministrations under the law. In like manner, says the apostle, "It is the Lord's pleasure and appointment now under the gospel, (Matt. x. 10. Luke x. 7.) that they who preach the word should be maintained for it, and not diverted from their work, by the cares and business of the world, but have a livelihood from their labour. Hence it clearly appears, that a maintenance for the ministry under the gospel is of divine right; if it was so under the law, it is likewise under the gospel: for so says the apostle, God has ordained. God's will in this matter is the same under the New Testament as it was under the Old: and as a maintenance in general is of divine right, so tithes may make thus far a claim to be of that nature, that it is believed the wisdom of man cannot find out any better expedient, than by them to support a ministerial maintenance for the preachers of the gospel to the end of the world.

15 But I have used none of these things. Neither have I written these things that it should be so done unto me: for it were better for me to die than that any man should make my glorying void. ;

The apostle having thus asserted his liberty, now shews his great moderation in the use of it: Although he had a liberty to marry, and to demand maintenance for his ministry as well as others, yet he denied himself in both: The apostle was charged by false teachers, that he preached the gospel for his own profit and advantage; whereas he gloried in the contrary, that he made the gospel without charge, looking looking upon it as his great honour, that he could, [and did] preach the gospel freely, for sincere ends, and not out of sinister respects; and professes he had rather die by starving than lose his advantage of glorying. Now the inference which St. Paul draws from all this discourse, of his declining the use of his lawful liberty, is this: "If I your minister, for your profit, and the advantage of the gospel, abate of my own full right and unquestionable liberty, why should not you abate of yours, in the case of eating things offered unto idols, to keep your weak brother from destroying his soul by sinning against God?"

16 For though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of; for necessity is laid upon me; yea, wo is unto me, if I preach not the gospel. 17 For if I do this willingly, I have a reward: but if against my will, a dispensation of the gospel is committed unto me.

That which the apostle glories in, is not his bare preaching of the gospel, but his preaching of it freely, and without maintenance; for, says he, "Though I preach the gospel, that has nothing singular in it, others do it as well as myself; and I am bound to do it as well as others; for necessity is laid upon me by special call and command from Christ so to do; yea, wo is unto me for my disobedience to Christ in the heavenly vision (Acts xxvi.) if I preach not the gospel. Now, if I do this thing willingly, that is, freely, without demanding any thing of you for my pains, which I might do, I have a reward: that is, a special reward from God, and may glory in it: But if I preach it unwillingly, (demanding a maintenance for my pains, and refusing to preach without it) all that can be said is this, that a dispensation of the gospel is committed to me; and so in preaching I only discharge a trust of which I cannot boast or glory." The strength of the apostle's argument lies here: "No man can reasonably boast of, glory in, or expect an extraordinary reward for the doing of that which he is under a command from his superior to do, and that under a penalty too." Now this was his case: Necessity was laid upon him to preach the gospel, but no necessity but what he laid upon himself to preach it freely: therefore for him to do it, without demanding any reward from them for the doing of it, this made it matter of glorifying to him which he had declared he had rather die than any should take from him. But was it the apostle's own glory that he was thus fond of, and concerned for, that he had rather lose his life than lose it? No, it was the glory of God, the honour of the gospel, that was so unexpressively dear unto him; this great apostle did, upon pure principles of faith and love, from his heart and soul, design the glory of God, pursuant to which he did cheerfully and willingly apply himself to the preaching of the gospel, waiting upon God for his acceptance and reward, without expecting any wages (as he might from them his Corinthian converts; and this was the matter of his boasting and glorying in the face of the false apostles, who insinuated that he preached the gospel for filthy lucre sake.

18 What is my reward then? Verily that when I preach the gospel, I may make the gospel of Christ without charge, that I abuse not my power in the gospel.

The sense is, "This gives me hopes of a reward extraordinary from God; namely, that I have preached the gospel to you, without being chargeable to any of you; for had I received maintenance from you, I found my reproaches would have brought an ill report upon me. To prevent which, I made use of my christian liberty, and took nothing of you; which he calls, his not abusing his power in the gospel. Learn hence, 1. That ministers, generally speaking lawfully may expect yea, require maintenance from their people to whom they preach the gospel. 2. That although they may expect and demand maintenance for their ministry, yet in case the people are so poor, that they cannot give it; or enemies so malicious, as to open their mouths against them for it; or if it will hinder the progress of the gospel, by keeping people from coming under the preaching of it, fearing it should be chargeable to them; under such circumstances if the minister can subsist without it, it is his certain duty to preach freely, and for such extraordinary services he may expect a more than ordinary reward. 3. That the liberty, which God hath intrusted us with, must never be abused by us, to the prejudice of his glory, or the detriment of his gospel, or to the disadvantage of others. All such use of our liberty in any thing, is indeed an abuse of it: therefore, says the apostle here, I abuse not my power in the gospel.

19 For though I be free from all men, yet have I made myself servant unto all, that I might gain the more. 20 And unto the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews: to them that are under the law, as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law; 21 To them that are without law, as without law, (being not without law to God, but under the law to Christ) that I might gain them that are without law. 22 To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak: I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some. 23 And this I do for the gospel's sake, that I might be partaker thereof with you.

In these verses our apostle proceeds to shew the Corinthians farther, how mightily he did abridge himself of his Christian liberty, which was the argument he was insisting upon: For, says he, though I be free from all men, as being a servant to none, yet have I made myself as a servant to all, that I might gain the more, to embrace the gospel. To the unconverted Jew, he became as a Jew, circumcising Timothy for their sakes, Acts xvi. 3. that he might gain the Jews. To them, who in their opinion were yet under the obligation of the ceremonial law, he carried himself as a person under that law, though he knew himself free from it, to the end that he might gain them that are under the law; and accordingly he purified himself in the temple, Acts xxi. To them that were without law, that is, the Gentiles, who were without the ceremonial law, he became as without law; abstaining from the use of all ceremonies as they did: But yet, not being without law to God, but under the law to Christ; that is, as to the moral law of God, which was not abolished, but reinforced by Christ, he did never account himself free from that, nor durst do any thing contrary to the eternal rule of righteousness; and all this, that he might gain them that are without law. To the weak converts, either among Jews or Gentiles, he became as weak, by abstaining from what might hurt their weak consciences, that so he might gain the weak. Finally, he became all things to all men, by compliance with them in all lawful and indifferent things, that he might gain as many as possibly he could. And all this he did for the gospel's sake, that the gospel might be the better esteemed, and farther propagated, and that he might himself partake of the promises and rewards of it, together with them to whom he preached it, and had effectually entertained it. Behold here the humility and charity of this great apostle; his ready condescension to the pitiable weaknesses of all men; his compliance with them in all lawful and indifferent things for the glory of God, and the advantage of the gospel. A rare and singular pattern for all ministers and private Christians to imitate and follow. Now from this example of St. Paul's becoming all things to all men, and making himself a servant unto all, we learn, 1. One great duty of a gospel minister, is not to be a slave to any, but a servant to all, not a servant to their lusts, but to their weaknesses and infirmities. Our apostle did not turn, as the flattering and false apostles did, with the tide and times nor conform to them in what was sinful: He did not symbolize with all colours, nor was he a man for all hours or humours; for, says he, If I please men (he means in any thing sinful) I am no more the servant of Christ, Gal. i. 10. But wisely considering the case and state of all men, he did accommodate his ministry for the gaining of as many as he possibly could. Some are all things to all men, that they may gain by all; a spirit not only unworthy of a minister, but of a man. But St. Paul complied with all men and made himself the servant of all, that Christ might thereby gain his gospel gain, yea, and they themselves gain; which hints to us a second observation, the great end which the apostle aimed at in this his compliance with, and condescension towards the weaknesses of his people: This I do for the gospel's sake: As if he had said, "Though I thus stoop and yield to all men, it is to serve my Master, not myself. Think not that I thus put myself into all toms towards men for my own preferment in the world; but that Christ may be preferred in the hearts and acceptations of all men: I please all men in all things, not seeking my own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved." 1 Cor. x. 33. Behold here the noble mark which the minister of Christ had in his eye, the saving of souls. That he might hit it, he wisely observed the temper and state of his people, striving to render himself agreeable and acceptable unto all, that he might by all means save some; yet had he also an eye to himself in all this; he had respect to the recompense of reward, as lawfully he might: This I do for the gospel's sake, that I may be partaker thereof with you: that is, that I may have a share myself in the promised rewards of the gospel which I have preached unto you. Blessed be God, it is lawful for all the ministers and members of Christ to do good out of hope of reward; and that his glory and our own happiness are so inseparately connected and knit together, that by promoting the former, we secure the latter.

24 ¶ Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run that ye may obtain.

Our apostle, according to the custom in sundry epistles, does in the end of this chapter fall upon the use of terms agonistical; borrowed from the Olympic, and other Grecian games, celebrated near Corinth, in which the contending parties did put forth all their strength to outdo one another. These games were running, cussing and wrestling; all which the apostle here alludes unto; and first to running: They which run in a race, run all, but one receiveth the prize; so run the Christian race, that ye may obtain the prize. Learn hence, That Christianity is a race which God hath set us and it is our duty faithfully and perseveringly to run it. In a race the foundation of it is a prize; in a race there is a considerable distance between one goal and another; in a race there is a race-plate for the racers to run in, there are certain laws to run by, and there is a certain judge to determine who wins the crown fairly. Now this race of Christianity vastly differs from all other races, thus: This is a spiritual race, it strains not legs and lungs, but faith and patience. Other races are performed by natural abilities, but this by a supernatural power and strength. Those races might be run without disturbance, but not this; their reward but a garland of bays, our's a crown of immortality. But what is it to run this race? Ans. It supposes a motion, it imports a vehement and intense motion, it implies progress and proficiency; every step brings the racer nearer the goal: and it implies perseverance; the racer must hold it to the last, or he loses his labour and reward: every one that runs shall obtain the prize; whereas in other races, but one receiveth the prize.

25 And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now, they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible.

It was a custom amongst those that used at Corinth the forementioned games of running and wrestling, to tie themselves to a strict prescribed diet, both for quality and quantity, by way of preparation. They did not indulge themselves in gluttony, or any sort of excess, but were temperate in all things, that the crown might be won by them; which alas! was nothing but a garland of leaves or flowers. In imitation of whom, he advises the Corinthians to be very moderate in the use of all worldly things, and to abstain from whatsoever may hinder their running the Christian race, and their receiving the incorruptible crown 26 I therefore so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air.

That is, "I run this race of Christianity myself, which I advise you unto: But my care is to run sure, not at uncertainties: to make sure of the crown at the end of the race; and I do not only run, but fight: I oppose whatever ever opposeth me." Here observe, the apostle changes the metaphor from that of running, to the other game of cussing; and says, he did not fight like one that beats the air, but never hurts the adversary: No, he fought in good earnest with all his spiritual enemies, the flesh, the world and the devil. It is not every running that will gain the prize, not every fighting that will obtain the victory; but it must be a running with all perseverance, and a fighting with our utmost power, that will bring us to heaven and eternal happiness.

27 But I keep under my body,—

The original word may be fitly rendered, I give myself blue eyes, alluding to the Olympic game of cussing, in which the combatants were wont with their blows to beat one another till they made each other livid, their eyes black and blue. The sense is, that by mortification he used great severity upon himself contending against and combating with that body of sin and death, which did obstruct and hinder him in running the Christian race which was set before him.

—And bring it into subjection:—

The word in the Greek is an allusion to the other exercise of wrestling, wherein the antagonists or contenders do strive to cast each other to the ground, and to keep them under. So he, the better to subdue his body of sin, was careful to keep down the body of flesh, which, if pampered, is apt to rebel. He concludes all with a reason why he exercised all his care and caution, namely, —Lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be cast-away.

That is, Lest when he had acquainted them with the laws and rules of Christianity, and proposed to them the way of striving and getting the crown, he himself should at last be a cast-away, or one unworthy to be approved or rewarded by God. From whence observe, 1. That it is possible for him, who has been all his life preaching to others, and furthering them in the way to heaven, to be thrown himself into hell at last. Many that have prophesied in Christ's name, shall yet perish in his wrath; and such as have cast devils out of others, shall be cast to the devil themselves. 2. That such ministers as indulge their unruly appetites, giving the flesh whatever it craves, and can deny it nothing it desires, pampering the body to the prejudice of the soul, go not in St. Paul's road to heaven, but the contrary; they gratify what he mortified, they indulge what he subdued: He administered to the wants, they to the wantonness of the flesh: He knew that Hagar would quickly perk up, and domineer over Sarah; that the body would quickly expect and command more attendance than the soul, except it were kept under; and, for this reason, says our apostle here, I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection; lest that by any means, &c.

CHAP. X.

The apostle in this chapter, continues his arguments to dissuade Christians from eating of things offered unto idols.

MOREOVER, brethren, I would not that ye should be ignorant how that all our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea.

Among other arguments which the apostle produces to dissuade the Corinthians from eating things offered to idols in the idol temples, and to prove it absolutely unlawful for Christians to have communion with the Gentiles in their idolatrous banquets, the first is drawn from the danger of such sinful communion; it would endanger their falling into such kind of sins as the Israelites, on that occasion, fell into, and consequently expose them to such punishments as they suffered. But first of all, in the beginning of this chapter, he acquaints the Corinthians with the great favours and privileges which Almighty God vouchsafed to, and conferred upon the Israelites, who come out of Egypt with Moses into the wilderness, who had a pillar of cloud to guide and protect them, the manna from heaven to sustain and uphold them, and water out of a rock to refresh and satisfy them. All our fathers were under the cloud; that is, under the conduct and protection of the cloud; and all passed through the Red-sea, as upon dry ground. This cloud which accompanied the Israelites in their journeyings, had a threefold use: (1.) In respect of God; it was a sign and symbol of the presence of God with them, and of his care and protection over them, for it encompassed their camp as a wall doth a city. Hence is that of the Psalmist, He spread out a cloud for a covering to them, and fire to give them light in the night season, Psal. cv. 39. (2.) In respect of the Israelites, the cloud did guide and direct them in their journeyings; Psal. lxxviii. 14. In the day he led them with a cloud, and all the night with a light of fire. And as the cloud did guide and direct Israel, so did it cool and refresh them in the wilderness, preserving them from the heat of the sun: It was a covering canopy over them, in a scorching desert. (3.) In respect of their enemies, it was darkness to the Egyptians, and consequently protected the Israelites from their enemies, that they could not assault or fall upon them. It had a bright side to the Israelites, and a dark side to the Egyptians. Lord! how easily canst thou make the same creature a comfort to thy children, and a terror to thine enemies. Every outward blessing is that, and no more, which thou art pleased to make it to us. A cloud shall guide, a cloud shall cover, a cloud shall comfort Israel: And the same cloud shall be darkness, yea, at thy command, shall be death to the Egyptians.

2 And were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud: and in the sea;

Note, 1. The Israelites are here said to be baptized in the cloud and in the sea; that is, the cloud which overshadowed them, did sometimes bedew and sprinkle them: And the Red-Sea, through which they passed, had its waters gathered into two heaps, one on the right hand, and the other on the left, betwixt which the Israelites passed, and in their passage seemed to be buried in the waters: As persons in that age were put under the water when they were baptized; and thus were Israel baptized in the cloud and in the sea. 2. They are said to be baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea: Unto Moses; that is, unto the doctrine taught by Moses

Moses, they believed him, and followed his conduct through the sea, and were confirmed in their belief of Moses (the typical Mediator) as a person employed by God; and were obliged under the ministry and guidance of Moses, to follow God whithersoever he led them. 3. That all this was a figure to which our baptism answers: both the cloud and the sea had resemblance to our being covered with water in baptism, by which we are confirmed in the faith of Christ, and obliged to profess and own him, to trust in and depend upon him, to serve and obey him, and this to the death. Behold how much of Christ and his gospel was shadowed and held forth to the Jews under the dispensation of the ceremonial law; they had Christ in their sacrifices, and we have all their sacrifices in Christ. The cloud, the sea, the manna, the rock, all typified Christ, and were resemblances and representations of him. Christ was as truly represented to the Jews as unto us, as truly, though not so clearly.

3 And did all eat the same spiritual meat; 4 And did all drink the same spiritual drink. (For they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them; and that Rock was Christ.)

They, that is, the fathers in the wilderness, did all eat of the manna which came down from heaven, which is here called spiritual meat; either because it came down from heaven, which is the habitation of spiritual beings; or because it was food given out by the ministry of angels, those spiritual agents; or else it is called spiritual, that is sacramental meat; because it typified Christ, who is the bread of life, the true bread which came down from heaven. That manna was a type of Christ, thus appears: "Was manna provided by God for the Israelites without their labour and industry? so is Christ given unto men without any merit or work of their own, but of the free gift and goodness of God. Did manna come down from heaven besides the ordinary course of nature? So was Christ's birth wonderful, and not as the birth of other men; being not begotten of mortal seed, but by the influence of the Holy Ghost. Was manna distributed to all alike, one not having more and another less, but all an equal share? In like manner, Christ communicates himself unto all alike, without exception of persons: a beggar may have as great a part in Christ as a prince. Again, as manna was food, plentiful food, sweet and pleasing food; so is Christ, the food of life, very sweet to such a soul as can truly relish him. Farther, must the manna, before fit for food, be beaten in a mortar, or broken in a mill, and baked in an oven? so Christ, our heavenly manna, was broken on the cross, scorched in the fire of his Father's wrath, that he might become the spiritual food wherewith our souls are nourished unto everlasting life.— Finally, as manna was given only in the wilderness, and ceased when the Israelites came into Canaan; so is Christ our spiritual meat, our sacramental food, whilst we are in the wilderness of this world; but when we shall come to the heavenly Canaan, we shall have no more any need of sacramental supports, but shall behold him face to face, and be satisfied with his likeness." And they did all drink of that spiritual Rock which followed them, and that Rock was Christ. Here the water out of the Rock is also called spiritual drink, it being typically and sacramentally so. That Rock was Christ; that is, it signified, represented, and typified Jesus Christ. For as the rock gave no water before it was smitten with the rod of Moses; so was Christ smitten upon the cross, and out of his side came forth water: and as it was the rod in Moses's hand that smote and broke the rock; so was Christ smitten with the curse of the law, in the day when his soul was made an offering for sin. In a word, as the rock yielded water, not only to them that were first present at the broaching of it, but followed them with its streams, in their stations through the wilderness, in like manner, the water which gushed out from our smitten Saviour, the sweet-fruit and benefits of his death, did not only belong to them who were present at the time and place of his sufferings, but it doth, and will accompany all believers to the end of this world. The virtue and efficacy of our Lord's blood is now as great, as efficacious and effectual, as it was the first hour it was shed; the divinity of his person adds an eternal efficacy to his passion.

5 But with many of them God was not well pleased: for they were overthrown in the wilderness.

Although the Israelites were made partakers of the fore-mentioned privileges and spiritual favours; though they were baptized unto Moses in the cloud, and in the sea, and did eat sacramental meat, and drink sacramental drink, yet it did not set them out of danger of God's displeasure, for they were overthrown, their carcases fell in the wilderness. Learn thence, That no external privileges or prerogatives whatsoever can exempt persons from God's judgments, if they return not suitably to him for his favours and benefits received from him. The bare outward receiving of a sacrament is not saving to the soul of a person: and the unworthy receiving of sacraments, and unsuitable walking after them, do inkindle God's anger, and provoke his heavy displeasure against persons, even to the cutting them off by untimely death here in this world.

6 ¶ Now these things were our examples, to the intent we should not lust after evil things, as they also lusted.

Observe here, 1. The sin charged upon the Israelites in the wilderness; They lusted; that is, after the flesh-pots of Egypt; and to return thither again. They had manna for forty years together, but being tied to it (though angels' food, that is, most excellent food) they grew weary of it. Lord! how exceedingly indebted are we to thy liberality and bounty, in that plenty and variety of creature refreshments which thou affordest us? The beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, and the fishes of the sea, are freely given us, not barely for necessity, but delight, and do all administer to our support and comfort. 2. How the apostle calls upon us to improve examples, that we may not be made examples. These things, that is, their sufferings, were our examples; they were for our caution; to receive warning by them, not to walk in those foul-defiling ways, in which they have walked, fallen, and perished. A wise Christian may receive much good by observing the dealings of God with them that are evil; for God is unchangeable, just, and holy, and will not favour that in one person, which which he punishes in another. These things were our examples. As if the apostle had said, "O ye Corinthians, look upon the dead bodies of the Israelites, which are cast upon the shore of the scriptures, for a warning to you; follow not the same course, lest you meet with the same curse; if you tread the same path, expect the same punishment, for God is as righteous now as he was then; he hates, and will punish sin in you, as much as he did in them. These things were our examples, to the intent we should not lust after evil things, as they lusted."

7 Neither be ye idolaters, as were some of them: as it is written; The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play. 8 Neither let us commit fornication, as some of them committed, and fell in one day three and twenty thousand.

Our apostle being still dissuading the Corinthians from eating of things offered unto idols, and thereby from holding communion with the Gentiles in their idolatrous banquets in their idol-temples, he sets before them the idolatry of the Jews, who sat down to eat and to drink of the sacrifices offered to the golden calf, and rose up to play; that is, to dance before the golden calf, after the manner of the Heathen, this being one of their rites by which they honoured their gods. He farther advises them to take heed how they mix with idolaters in their feasts, lest they be given up to fornication as the Israelites were in the wilderness with the daughters of Moab, Numb. xxv. of whom there fell in one day, three and twenty thousand by the immediate hand of God. Learn hence, That Almighty God has left many instances upon record, in his holy word, of the severity of his justice upon persons guilty of idolatry and fornication, and all other sins, on purpose to warn all of their sin and danger in the perpetration and commission of them. To sin against example, is an aggravation of sin.

9 Neither let us tempt Christ, as some of them also tempted, and were destroyed of serpents. 10 Neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer.

Observe here, A double sin which the Corinthians are warned against, tempting and murmuring: Neither tempt ye Christ, by trying how long his patience will last, as the Israelites did, when (as the angel of the covenant) he went before them in the wilderness, Numb. xxi. 5, 6. Here note, The object or person, whom the Israelites are said to tempt, Christ; which proves, (1.) His pre-existence before his incarnation; the Israelites could not have then tempted him, had he not been then existent. (2.) His divinity; he who is called here Christ, is by the Psalmist called God, Psal. cxi. 14. They tempted God in the desert. Christ had not an human nature then to be tempted in, they tempted him therefore as he was God: a good argument to prove the divinity of our Saviour, made use of by the ancients. The other sin warned against, is murmuring: Neither murmur ye; that is, do not repine, because you are forbidden to be at present at the idolatrous feasts of the Gentiles in the idol-temples; neither do ye murmur, by reason of the persecutions which you do or may endure, for the sake of Christianity, and the cause of Christ. Learn hence, That to murmur at, or to be impatient under, any of the providential dispensations of God, is both great sin and folly. It is as high presumption and wickedness to be dissatisfied with God's works of providence, as with his works of creation; to quarrel at what God doth, is as unchristian-like, yea, as uncreature-like, as to quarrel at what God has made. Therefore, murmur not, as the Israelites murmured. Note, 2. A double punishment inflicted on the Israelites, for this double sin committed; such as tempted, were destroyed of fiery serpents. Numb. xxi. 6, 7. The Lord sent fiery serpents among the people; the sting and venom of those serpents was inflaming, spreading, killing; much people of Israel died. And such as murmured, were destroyed of the destroyer; that is, by the destroying angel in that plague mentioned, Numb. xiv. 37. Such variety of judgments has Almighty God, with which to punish and plague an incorrigible and unreclaimable people.

11 ¶ Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples: and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come.

That is, the history of the Israelites sins and punishments was written and recorded by God in the holy Scriptures, for the use and benefit of all succeeding generations, and particularly for us, who live in the last ages of the world, to warn us to avoid the like sin, that we may escape the like punishments. Learn hence, That the fall of others, whether into sin, or under judgment for sin, should be caution and warning to us to take heed of sinning. Here the apostle sums up the most remarkable judgments which fell upon the Jews in their passage from Egypt to Canaan, and closes all with this application to Christians; These things happened to them for ensamples; in the original it is, as types; they beset them typically, that in them we may see how God will deal with us if we take their course; those calamities which destroy some, should instruct others: Many will never see sin in itself, some will see it in the type and ensample, that is in the judgment of God upon others; and those that will not see sin in the lashes of severity upon others, will certainly feel it upon their own backs; such as will not improve examples, shall undoubtedly be made examples.

12 Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall.

These words are an inference which our apostle draws from the foregoing discourse: Seeing that so many who enjoyed great privileges among the Jews, were yet punished greatly for their sins; seeing that sacraments are no privileges either for sin, or from plagues: therefore, let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed, &c. Where note, 1. A great mutability to which human nature is subject; he that thinketh he standeth, may fall: Man's condition is according to his place and station: This is threefold. The first place is heaven; this is fixed and confirmed, a kingdom that cannot be shaken; the saints there, are standing pillars, free from all possibility of falling. The second place place is hell, where sinners are bound hand and foot; and being fallen, are without any possibility of rising. The third place is this earth on which we live, where men both stand and fall; and the best are subject to falling, being sons of Adam, as well as sons of God; partly flesh, and partly spirit. 2. The vigilancy required in order to our standing: Take heed: How many thousands have fallen by a presumptuous confidence of their own strength in standing! they fell by thinking it impossible to fall. A Christian's motto is exvendo tutis; never safe, but when wary and watchful. Let a Christian always keep a jealous eye upon the weakness and inconsistency of his nature, and with a believing eye look up to the promise and power of God, and he shall be both preserved from falling, and also be presented faultless and unblameable in the day of Christ; if ever we stand in the day of trial, it is fear and faith must enable us to stand.

13 There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man: but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it.

Here the apostle answers a plea which the Corinthians might probably make for their compliance with their fellow citizens, in eating things offered unto idols in their temples with them; namely, that thereby they should avoid persecution. Fear not that, says the apostle, you have hitherto been preserved, that no temptation has taken you, but such as is common unto man: that is, you have not yet been exercised with any trial but what is human, what the ordinary strength and resolution of human nature is able to bear: But in case you should be tried with extremity of suffering, and that you must either comply with the heathen idolatry, or endure suffering to extremity, yet you have the promise of a faithful God for your support in that case; God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted, at any time, above what you are able, but will with the temptation also make a way so far to escape; that ye may be able to bear it. Learn hence, 1. That it is a great addition to an affliction not to see or discern a way to escape, and get out of affliction: God is exceeding gracious in our afflictions, in that he doth not hedge us in on every side, and hinder all possibility of escape out of our troubles. 2. That the consideration of God's strength to support us in and under our sufferings, is a mighty encouragement to us to grapple with them resolutely, and to bear them patiently and submissively: If our sufferings were intolerable, and human nature were not divinely assisted to stand under them, we should not be forced to consult our present ease and deliverance, and chuse sin rather than affliction; but the assistance of God makes suffering work easy.

14 Wherefore, my dearly beloved, flee from idolatry. 15 I speak as to wise men: judge ye what I say.

Here our apostle re-assumes his exhortation to the Corinthians, not to meddle with the mysteries of Paganism, nor to eat of things offered unto idols; assuring them, it was no less than idolatry, in the account of God, to eat of those things which were taken from their execrable altars, as a part and remnant of those sacrifices to idols, which were performed in the city of Corinth, with all the pomp of an abominable superstition. This participation of things offered to idols, in the idol temples, our apostle calls idolatry: Wherefore, my beloved brethren, flee from idolatry. Here note, That the nature of man is extremely prone to idolatry, and very ready to comply with men in their idolatrous practices. 2. That the idolatry of the Jews of old, and of Christians since, who knew and owned the true God, and glorified in him, was, and is, far worse than the idolatry of Pagans, who knew him not, nor ever gloried in him. Note farther, How our apostle appeals to themselves, and leaves it to them to judge, whether they did not do very ill to be at present at the feasts upon the heathen sacrifices, and eat of things offered unto idols: He leaves it to themselves to judge, Judge ye what I say. There is a judgment of discretion which persons ought to use in matters of religion, and not to deliver up themselves blindfolded to the conduct of their teachers. The church of Rome by denying the people this liberty, makes them slaves; they put out the people's eyes, to make them fit for a blind obedience. Our apostle was far from this practice: Let wise men, says he, judge what I say.

16 The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? the bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?

These words are a special argument, made use of by the apostle, to dissuade Christians from joining with the Heathens in their impure feasts in the old temples: the Gentiles have fellowship with the idols in those feasts, as Christians have communion with Christ at his holy table: So that the argument runs thus, "If believers, by communicating with Christ at his holy table, have real communion with him, then also, those that do communicate with them in their impure feasts: But believers do the first; namely, at the Lord's table they communicate with Christ." This he proves from the words before us, The cup of blessing, &c. Where note, 1. A description of the Lord's supper, in both the parts of it, namely, the external and visible part, bread and wine: the internal and spiritual part, the body and blood of Christ. 2. The ministerial actions performed in this solemn ordinance, and they are the blessing of the cup, and the breaking of the bread. 3. Here is the great end and design of God in the institution of this ordinance, namely, that believers might thereby enjoy a spiritual fellowship and communion with Christ their head: Is it not the communion of the body of Christ? Learn hence, That one great end and design of Christ, in the institution of his supper, was this, that believers might enjoy a sweet fellowship and communion with himself therein.

17 For we being many are one bread, and one body; for we are partakers of that one bread.

The apostle's argument lies thus: "As Christians, though though many, yet by virtue of their society in the same worship, are compacted together as it were into one loaf or lump; that is, into one mystical body, in that they partake of one and the same sacramental bread: so those that communicate with idolators, in eating things offered unto idols, are compacted together, as it were, into one body, so far as they communicate in one and the same sacrifice; as many grains of corn moulded together make one loaf, and the juice of many grapes make one cup; so Christians, though many, yet are one visible church, one mystical body, and declare themselves so to be, by their fellowship together at the Lord's table."

18 Behold Israel after the flesh. Are not they which eat of the sacrifices, partakers of the altar?

19 What say I then? that the idol is any thing, or that which is offered in sacrifice to idols is any thing?

20 But I say that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils.

Here another argument against eating things offered to idols is produced by the apostle, and it runs thus: "As in the Jewish church, all persons that did eat of the peace-offerings, which were laid upon God's altar, did, by that act, declare themselves members of the Jewish church, and that they owned the God of the Jews, to whom those sacrifices were offered; in like manner the converted Corinthians, by eating part of those beasts which were sacrificed to the idol's temple, did by that act declare their owning of that idol, and that idolatrous worship which had been there performed, and were really partakers of that idolatrous altar: Not that an idol is any thing, or that which is offered to the idol any thing, that can of its own nature pollute and defile: but the plain truth was, the Heathens were seduced by the devil to offer these sacrifices, and they were devils whom they worshipped; though not in their own intention, yet in God's estimation: And consequently, those that did eat of these feasts, are supposed to join in those sacrifices, and thereby to hold communion with devils.

21 ¶ Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of devils: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils.

That is, "Ye cannot have communion with Christ and with idolators too; your communicating with Christ in the Lord's supper is utterly inconsistent with communicating with devils in the idol's feasts, for this were to do homage to two contrary Lords, God, and Satan, and to profess service to both." Here Note, 1. A sacramental table described; it is the table of the Lord, so called, because he that is Lord of lords, did institute it, for the remembrance of his own death. 2. An impossibility declared, that none can be worthy partakers at the Lord's table, that hold communion with sin: True, idolatry is the sin here specified, of sacrificing unto devils; but it holds true of all sin in general, and of having fellowship with Satan in any of the unfruitful works of darkness. Learn hence, That no person can really enjoy any fellowship and communion with Christ at his holy table, who maintains correspondence with sin, and holds communion with Satan.

22 Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? are we stronger than he?

Note here, 1. That the worship of God is that which he is very tender and jealous of; never was husband so jealous of the chastity of his suspected wife, as God is jealous in point of worship; idolatry is a provoking God to jealousy. 2. That such as worship idols, or are guilty of idolatrous worship in any kind or degree, must expect God a jealous avenger, and will find themselves not strong enough to contend with him. "Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy, by joining devils in competition with him? Are we stronger than he? Who knows the power of his anger? The strength of God should make sinners tremble."

23 All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but all things edify not.

Our apostle having, in the former part of this chapter, resolved the case concerning public eating of things offered unto idols in the idol-emples, and by several arguments proved to be absolutely unlawful; he comes now to resolve another case, concerning private buying, and private eating of things offered to idols; for it seems to have been a custom, to set to sale in the market, flesh that was sacrificed, (the gain whereof went to the priests) as well as other flesh; but first he answers an objection: Some might be ready to say all things are lawful for me: that is, all meats may lawfully be eaten by me. If so, says the apostle, yet all lawful things are not expedient to be done, in respect of our weak brother; plainly intimating, That there are many things lawful in themselves, which considered under such and such circumstances, are very expedient; and so far as they are inexpedient, so far they are unlawful.

24 Let no man seek his own, but every man another's wealth.

These words may be understood two ways: (1.) Let no man seek his own, that is, only his own wealth. (2.) Let no man seek his own wealth, that is, to the prejudice of others, though never so much to his own advantage: teaching us that it is the duty of every Christian, not merely to look at his own profit and pleasure, but at the benefit and advantage of others, at that which edifies, or tends to promote holiness in others: And that in the use of our Christian liberty, we must regard rather the edification and salvation of others, than the gratification of ourselves.

25 Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat, asking no question for conscience sake. 26 For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof.

Here the apostle resolves the case, whether it were lawful to buy that meat in the market which had been offered to an idol in the temple. He determines, (1.) That it was; if it be sold in the shambles, it is to be looked upon as common food, and they may freely buy it without any scruple of conscience; but how came meat to be sold in the stables, which was offered and sacrificed in the temples of the Gentiles? Ans. It is probable, that the priests, who had a share in the beasts that were offered unto idols, or the people, who also had a share, returned them out of their own offerings, did bring such meat to be sold in the market: In this case, says the apostle, ask no questions about it. Note, 2. He assigns the reason for it, because the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof: That is, those things that are sold for food in the market, are to be looked upon as the creatures of God, made for, and sanctified to, the use of man; and therefore, you may eat of any creature which the Lord provideth for your food, without scruple of conscience when others are not scandalized at it, 1 Tim, iv. 4. Every creature of God is good, if received with thanksgiving.

27 If any of them that believe not, bid you to a feast, and ye be disposed to go; whatever is set before you, eat, asking no question for conscience sake. 28 But if any man say unto you, This is offered in sacrifice unto idols, eat not, for his sake that shewed it and for conscience sake. For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof.

Our apostle here puts another case, "Suppose an unbeliever, an Infidel or Heathen, did invite a believer, a Christian, to a feast of civil friendship in his private house, (not to a feast upon a sacrifice in the idol-temple, which was absolutely unlawful) what was to be done in this case?" He declares, they may warrantably go and eat whatever is set before them, without scruple, but would have them ask no questions about the lawfulness of it; nevertheless, if the master of the feast, or any present at the feast, shall suggest that some part of the meat has been offered to an idol, in that case, he would have them forbear; lest they should encourage any man to idolatry: adding his reason as before, For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; that is, there is plenty and variety of other meat to be had, which God the Creator of all things, the Lord of the whole earth, has allowed us the free use of; so that we may well let the Idol sacrifices alone. Here we see, that an action, lawful in itself, becomes sinful, and is condemned as such, when there is a breach of charity in the doing of it.

29 Conscience, I say, not thine own but of the other; for why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience? 30 For if I by grace be a partaker, why am I evil spoken of for that for which I give thanks.

Here the apostle tells them, that they ought to abstain from that which is lawful and indifferent in itself, for the sake of another man's conscience. This meat had not been unlawful to them, though offered to idols, had they not been told that it was so offered; but being made acquainted therewith, for the sake of him that shewed thee that it was offered to idols, forbear eating: for why should our liberty be so used by us as to be judged of, and condemned, by another man's conscience? It is not enough that we do what is just and right in our own sight, but we must provide things honest in the sight of all men. Whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; these we must practise, and none but these. And observable is the apostle's reason, why he should, for the sake of another, abstain from eating that meat, which was lawful in itself, ver. 30. namely, to prevent being evil spoken of: Why am I evil spoken of? That is, why should I cause another to speak evil of me, for eating that meat which I might without any prejudice forbear? for in so doing I shall certainly abuse my liberty, grieve God, offend the weak.

31 Whether therefore ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God.

Our apostle concludes his whole discourse with three excellent rules, to direct all Christians how they should govern themselves in the use of their lawful liberty, as to things that are of an indifferent nature: that is, neither commanded nor forbidden in the word of God. The first is this, To refer all our actions in general, both natural, civil, and religious, to the glory of God; to make that our supreme aim, our ultimate end, in all we do, in all we design, in all we desire. A Christian is to perform his natural actions to spiritual purposes; and whilst he is feeding and refreshing his body at his own table, must have an eye at his serving God, both with soul and body. Farther, not only in our natural actions, but in our civil employments, in our lawful recreations; but especially and above all, in our religious duties, must we propound the glory of God as our principal aim, our chief scope, our supreme end: This injunction, do all to the glory of God, is applicable to all the actions of human life.

32 Give none offence neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles: nor to the church of God.

Here we have the second rule given for ordering all the affairs of human life, Give no offence to any, neither to the unbelieving Jew, nor to the unconverted Gentile, nor to the weak members of the church of God; particularly, give no offence to these, by eating things offered to idols at any time, or in any place, where any may be scandalized; for the Jew will consider, that you are enemies to the law and the prophets: The Gentiles will believe that your abhorrence of idols is not real, when they see you eat things offered unto idols before their faces; and the weak Christian will be tempted by your example to revolt from the Christian faith. Therefore, do nothing that may tend to the hurt, or just offence, either of Jew, Gentile or Christian.

33 Even as I please all men in all things, not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved.

The last rule, which the apostle lays down, is his own practice and example, who in indifferent things accommodated himself to all men. I please all men; that is, I seek and endeavour to please all men, and in all things; that is, in all lawful things, and in all other things, wherein the law of God has left me at liberty; for neither in the omission of any thing which God commanded, nor in the commission of aught which he had forbidden, would St. Paul please any man in the world: And when he did please all men, it was for their profit and advantage, not his own; to promote their eternal salvation, not his own temporal interest: I please all men that they may be saved. Learn hence, 1. That no men must be pleased by sin, nor pleased in their sins. The smallest duty must be preferred before the pleasing of all men in the world. 2. We may and ought to seek the pleasing of all men, with subserviency, and in subordination to the pleasing of Almighty God. 3. That inordinate man pleasing is fruitless, needless, and endless; when you have endeavoured to please most, how many will be displeased; when you have done your best? God himself, Jesus Christ, his holy prophets, apostles, saints and servants, could never please the world; and can any of us expect to do it? St. Paul, though he became all things to all men, yet could save but some: The world hates godliness, and godly persons, and will never be pleased with that which they hate; let pleasing of God be our great business, and in subordination to him, endeavour to please all men for their profit, that they may be saved.

C H A P. XI.

BE ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ.

The apostle had in the foregoing chapters, by many cogent arguments exhorted the Corinthians to deny themselves the lawful use of their Christian liberty for the benefit of their brethren; to enforce which argument he propounds to them his own example in this verse, *Be ye followers of me, even as I follow Christ. Where note, 1. The duty recommended to their practice; namely, to follow their spiritual guide: Be ye followers of me. It is the standing duty of a people whom God honours with the enjoyment of faithful spiritual guides, to follow their faith, and to imitate their exemplary conversation; the graces of all Christians in general, but of the ministers of the gospel in particular, whether living or dead, are patterns set forth to the world for their careful imitation; and for omission herein, they must certainly become accountable to God. 1. With what modesty and caution, with what restriction and limitation St. Paul propounds his own example to the Corinthians view; Be ye followers of me, as I also am of Christ: As if he had said, "If at any time you find me your spiritual guide stepping aside, and walking unanswerably to that uniform pattern of holy and humble obedience which the Lord Jesus set both before you and me in his own exemplary life, be sure you decline my example, and follow not my footsteps." Learn hence, That the best of ministers, and the best of men, being but men, our imitation of them must not be an universal, but a limited imitation; we must follow pastors, teachers, nay apostles themselves, no farther than they follow Christ; their infallible Lord and master. *Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ.

Now I praise you, brethren, that you remember me in all things; and keep the ordinances as I delivered them to you.

This commendation must be retained to the founder part of the church at Corinth, who were mindful of his precepts and instructions, which he had delivered to them concerning matters appertaining to the public worship of God; which precepts and rules for the worship of God he calls traditions because they were immediately delivered to the church, either from the apostle's mouth, or by writing: This place, though produced, yet makes nothing for the unwritten traditions of the Romish church. Let them prove by authentic testimony, that their fardles of traditions were delivered from the mouth of the apostles, and we will receive them: Now I praise you, brethren. Here it deserves a remark, That the apostle, being about to reprove certain disorders in the church of Corinth, ushers in his reproof for what was amiss, with a commendation of what was praise-worthy among them; I praise you, brethren. Like the physician, who wraps his bitter pill in honey or sugar before he gives it into his patient's mouth. It is wisdom to intermix commendations with our reproofs, that the latter may take more place when accompanied with the former.

3 But I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God.

Here our apostle answers the query, and resolves the case which the Corinthians had put to him, and laid before him, about church-order, and concerning the decent behaviour of men and women in church-assemblies. And first he reminds them, that a subordination of persons in the church of God ought to be observed and kept: That as Christ, as Mediator, is inferior to God the Father, but is the Head and Lord of all men, as Creator and Redeemer; so the man is the head of the woman, and, as such, she must shew her subjection unto the man: As Christ, as Mediator, acts in subordination to the Father, so must the woman act in subordination to the man. The Socinians would wrest this text to confirm them in their blasphemous denial of the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ. "Here, say they, the apostle declares, that the Head of Christ is God: Now the most high God can have no Head above him; therefore Christ, who had a head above him, cannot be the most high God." The modern and general answer is, That God is here called the Head of Christ as Mediator, in which relation he received his kingdom from him, and exercises it for him, and therefore is elsewhere styled the Father's servant, Behold my servant, &c. because he doth all things according to his Father's will, and with a fixed eye to his Father's glory. But the ancients reply to this objection thus: "That God is said to be the Head of Christ, as he is the Father of the Son, and to the cause of him; and as the woman is of the same nature with the man, who is her head, so is Christ of the same nature with God the Father, who is here called his Head: The head of Christ is God."

4 Every man praying or prophesying, having his head covered, dishonoureth his head. 5 But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered, dishonoureth her head: for that is even all one as if she were shaven.

By the man's praying and prophesying, understand his performing any divine offices in the church, as prayer, and expounding the scriptures, singing of psalms, and the like. By doing this covered, understand not the natural covering of the hair, but an artificial covering by a veil, after the manner of women, which is a token of subjection. By dishonouring his head, understand either, (1.) Christ, who in the former verse was called the Head of every man: He that administers in the church in holy things, represents Christ, who is the Head of the church; therefore by covering the head, he declares a subjection in his administration and doth as it were make the church the head of Christ instead of Christ's being the head of the church: Or else, (2.) By dishonouring the head, may be understood the minister's own head; he betrayeth his superiority, and lesseneth the honour and dignity of his sex, by using such a gesture in divine offices, as is a token of inferiority and subjection; for in that country, at that time, it was a sign of subjection to have the head covered, but a sign of power and dominion to have the head uncovered. The contrary is found with us at this day; for those that have power over others now keep their heads covered, and those that are inferior to others keep their heads uncovered before them, ver. 5. By the woman's praying and prophesying, is understood either prophesying extraordinarily, which we read the women sometimes did both in the Old and New Testament, and were called prophetesses, Luke ii. 36. Acts xxi. 9. Or else, By the woman's prophesying is to be understood praising God in hymns and psalms, 1 Chron. xxv. 1, 2, 3. They prophesied with harps, psalteries, and cymbals, giving thanks, and praising the Lord; where prophesying and praising the Lord are the same thing. By the woman's prophesying with her head uncovered to the dishonour of her head or husband, is to be understood, her appearing unveiled in the church, open and barefaced in public; which was accounted, 1. An immodest, unbecoming, and unseemly guise. 2. Arrogant; her being unveiled and uncovered was a token of her usurping an undue authority over the man, and of her casting off that subjection which she was under by the law of her creation to him. 2. Superstitious; it being a fantastical imitation of the shepherds and prophetesses of the Gentiles, when they served their idols, and particularly when they sacrificed to Bacchus, who used to have their faces uncovered their hair dishevelled, hanging its full length round about their ears. Now the Corinthian women, in imitation of these Heathen women (for the female sex is very fond, and exceeding prone to follow the fashion) did cast off their veils, discovered their faces, dishonoured their heads, even their natural heads, (as well as their æconomical head, their husband) it being then and there accounted as immodest a thing for a woman to appear in public uncovered, as to appear with her head shaven. From the whole learn, That God requires at the hands of all persons, who either administer unto him, or stand before him, a decent behaviour, and comely accommodation in his house, especially in the acts and exercises of his worship and service. For if in their habit and dress, surely much less in their gesture and deportment, doth he love what is unseemly and unbecoming in any person. Learn

2. That it is especially the duty of persons employed in divine administrations, to demean themselves as those who represent our Lord Jesus, managing themselves with a due authority and decent gravity, becoming the ambassadors of God. So then it is a general observation of decency in our outward behaviour, when worshipping God before others, which our apostle here recommends as a special duty.

6 For if the woman be not covered, let her also be shorn: but if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be covered. 7 For a man indeed ought to cover his head, forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man.

Our apostle here proceeds, by many arguments, to evince and prove the woman's inferiority and subjection to the man, and that she ought to have a covering upon her head, as a sign and token of it. First, Because the image of God, that is, the image of his majesty, dominion, and power, shineth forth most brightly in the man, therefore he ought to have his head uncovered: Man is the image and glory of God. But is not the woman so likewise? Ans. Consider the woman so according to her specific nature, and so she was created after the image of God in righteousness and true holiness, as well as the man: but then, consider the woman according to her personal relation to her husband, and in that regard, the woman is not the image of God; because dominion, which is the image of God, is the man's privilege; and subjection, the woman's duty: but she is the glory of the man; that is, it is the glory and honour of man, that God has given him superiority over so excellent a creature as the woman; for if his dominion over the irrational creatures be his glory and honour, then what a glory and honour is it for a man to have so excellent a creature as the woman, a creature endued with reason like himself, subject to him! But as in this sense the man is the glory of the woman, so in another sense the woman is the glory of the man. She communicates with him in all his dignity, how great soever; whatever natural or civil excellency is in him, reflects on her; uxor fulget radiis mariti, the wife shines with the rays of her husband's honour. And the woman being thus in a state of inferiority, she ought to profess her subjection to her husband, by wearing a veil.

8 For the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man. 9 Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man.

Another argument which the apostle offers to prove the inferiority of the woman, is this, That originally the man was not made of the woman, or for the woman, but the woman was made of the man, (his rib) and for the man; that is, for his service and comfort, to be an help meet for him, and to be in subjection to him. Man had this prerogative, to be immediately from God; but the woman was from man, and to be administering and subservient to man, and consequently to cover her head, in token of her submission to him.

10 For this cause ought the woman to have power on her head, because of the angels.

Moreover, for this cause ought the woman to have power, that is, a veil upon the head, as a sign, and in token of her husband's power, and her own subjection; because of the angels, that is, say some, (1.) Because of the law of subjection given her by the ministry of angels. (2.) Because of the pastors, teachers, and ministers of the church, say others, who are often in Scripture styled angels. (3.) Because of the evil angels, as some interpret it; the woman being tempted by Satan, the prince of evil angels, to commit the first sin, which is a perpetual cause of shame to her and her posterity, and which increased her and their subjection to the man; for which reason, the woman ought to be veiled and covered (in the church assemblies particularly) as a token of shamefacedness and subjection. (4.) The more general interpretation is, because of the good angels, who are present in the assemblies of the saints, and eye-witnesses of their carriage there; therefore the woman ought to do nothing indecent in the presence of these holy spirits. And besides, she has the angels for her pattern and president, who cover their faces and veil their heads, in token of subjection to Almighty God. Note here, 1. That it has been a general opinion among Jews, Heathens, and Christians, that good angels are more particularly present with us, in the places, and at the times of God's public worship; yea, that they are not only present with us, but observant of us, and assisting to us in the performance of all religious exercises, especially prayer; and therefore the Jews speak of a particular angel, whom they call the angel of prayer. 2. That therefore all persons, both men and women, ought to demean themselves with all modesty, reverence, and decency in the worship of God, out of regard to the angels, who are there present, observing their carriage and behaviour. True, the angels cannot penetrate into the inward devotion of the mind, which God only observes; but they observe and take notice of the outward decency of our carriage, and the reverence of our deportment. But, Lord! how little is this considered, and by how few among us in our religious assemblies! With regard to God, who sees our hearts, we should more particularly compose our minds to the greatest seriousness and sincerity in our devotions; and with a particular regard to the holy angels, who are there present, we should be careful also of our outward behaviour: But, to our shame be it spoken, there are multitudes amongst us in our Christian assemblies, whom neither the presence of angels, nor the observing eye of him who is the Lord of angels can influence to any tolerable decency of behaviour in the house of prayer, where the eyes of God and angels, of ministers and men, are upon them. Such, without repentance, must never expect to dwell hereafter with God and his holy angels in heaven but take up their lodgings with the devil and his angels in an eternal hell, for whom is reserved blackness of darkness for ever.

11 Nevertheless, neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord. 12 For as the woman is of the man, even so is the man also by the woman; but all things of God,

Because the apostle might seem to have been too harsh towards the woman, and lest the man should thereupon take occasion to carry himself with pride and insolence towards her, he prudently intimates the mutual help and need which both man and woman stand in of one another; for, since the creation of the first man, all men are by the woman. And as men have no being but by the woman, so the woman without the man cannot exist or propagate. For as at the first creation the woman was taken out of the man, so now in generation the man is of the woman, and by the woman; she conceives him, brings him forth, suckles him, and brings him up, and all this by the wise disposal of God, who made the woman out of the man, and by his benediction increaseth man by the woman. From which considerations our apostle infers, that both man and woman should look upon their distinct prerogatives as given them by God, and carry it not with pride and insolence, but with respect and kindness to each other; and especially, that the woman be in subjection to the man, and testify that subjection by all the signs of it, particularly by her being veiled and covered, which is the argument our apostle is here insisting upon.

13 Judge in yourselves; is it comely that a woman pray unto God uncovered? 14 Doth not nature itself teach you, that if a man have long hair, it is a shame unto him? 15 But if a woman have long hair, it is a glory, to her: for her hair is given her for a covering. 16 But if any man seem to be contentious, we have no such custom, neither the churches of God.

Note here, 1. How our apostle closes his discourse, in which he had reprov'd the Corinthians, the men for covering, the women for uncovering their heads, and laying aside their veils in time of religious worship; by an appeal to themselves and their own judgment, concerning the matter he is speaking of, and reprov'ing them for; namely, men's praying with their heads covered, and women with their heads uncovered. Note, 2. How the apostle proceeds to blame both sexes for another disorder; namely, that men wore their hair like women, and that women appeared in the guise of men as to their hair. Here he lets them know, that both these kinds of disorders are repugnant to the institution of God, and the dictates of natural reason: Doth not nature itself teach you? That is, (1.) The general dictates of natural reason. (2.) The particular law of nature, concerning the distinction of sexes. (3.) Usage and common custom, which is a second nature. All these suggest, that for men to wear their hair at full length like the women, is uncomely and unnatural in the manly sex, but so to do is comely and natural in the female. Learn hence, That God disallows, and even nature itself condemns every thing that tends to the confounding of the sexes, which it is his will and pleasure should be visibly distinguished. It is a great offence to God, and contrary to one end for which apparel was given, when either the man or the woman wear apparel contrary to their sex; and what is said of apparel, their artificial covering, may be affirmed of the hair, which is their natural covering. "It is a shame for either sex to wear their hair in an uncomely and indecent manner, disagreeable to the natural modesty of either sex." Note, 3. How the apostle appeals to the custom and practice of the churches of God in the cases before us. The custom of all the churches is against women's being uncovered, as an unseemly thing. It is a known rule, Ubi nihil certo statuit scriptura, mos populi Dei, & instituta majorum pro lege tenenda sunt: We ought not to dissent and differ from the custom and practice of the church, in matters not positively determined; but the custom of the church must sway with us, with whose practice it is our duty to be as concordant as we can: If any man will be contentious, we have no such custom, neither the churches of God. Learn, thence, That in things only respecting decency, and in compliance with which there is no violation of the command of Christ, the custom of the church of Christ should determine us, and be as a standing rule unto us. Learn, 2. That it argues a contentious spirit, and favours very much of pride, in matters of little moment, to be singular in our practice, and to create disturbance to the church of God.

17 Now in this that I declare unto you, I praise you not, that ye come not together not for the better, but for the worse. 18 For first of all, when ye come together in the church, I hear that there be divisions among you; and I partly believe it. 19 For there must be also heresies among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest among you.

Our apostle here enters upon a new argument or subject-matter of discourse; namely, to reprove the abuses which were crept in among them, in their administration of the holy sacrament of the Lord's supper. And the first abuse which he blames them for, was the divisions and factions which were found among them; I hear there are schisms amongst you: Where we are to understand by schisms, not a separation from the unity of the catholic church, but of sects and divisions in the church; they did not separate from the church, but they ate the Lord's supper separately from the church, and the whole congregation did not join together in the celebration of that ordinance. Though we do not separate from the communion of the catholic church, yet if we occasion division and dissension groundlessly in the church, we justly fall under the imputation and charge of schism. Observe next, The apostle argues, a minori ad majus; he did easily believe there were divisions, because there must be also heresies among them. Heresies are worse than schisms, false doctrines more dangerous than divisions. Heresy is an error in the fundamentals of religion, maintained with obstinacy. When the green wound of an error is let alone, it soon rankles, and quickly grows into the old sore of an heresy. But how comes the apostle to say, there must be heresies? What necessity is there for them? Ans. (1) Negatively: There is not an absolute necessity for them on God's part, or a necessity of his making, but a conditional necessity or a necessity ex hypothetici, which must needs be, if such a thing be granted before: As supposing the sun be risen, it must be day. Thus here, upon supposition of the pride, vain-glory, envyings, strife, and contentions, which are among the members of the church; upon supposition of the craft and subtlety, malice and malignity of Satan, the church's grand enemy; upon supposition of God's permission that Satan and wicked men should act according to their corrupt affections and inclinations, heresies must and will be. Farther, The reason here assigned for the necessity of heresies is not casual, but eventual; not casual, as if the wisdom of God did design there should be heresies for this end, that they who are approved of him should be made manifest; but rather eventual, as if the apostle had said, "Hence it will come to pass, that they who are approved will be made manifest."

23 When ye come together therefore into one place, this is not to eat the Lord's supper,

As if he had said, "True, ye Corinthians, when ye come together at one place, ye pretend to eat the Lord's supper; but though you eat it, yet ye do not eat it as ye ought to do; you perform the material part of the action, but you do not partake of it solemnly and religiously, according to the divine institution; this therefore is not to eat the Lord's supper." Learn thence, That a duty not done as it ought to be done, is not stone at all in the account of Christ. Sermons may be heard, and yet accounted no sermons; prayers made, yet not made; sacraments received, yet not received; alms given, yet not given; because not done in manner and form as God required. A gracious heart will look not barely at the matter of the duty, but also at the manner of performance, and take care not only that he hears, but how he hears.

21 ¶ For in eating, every one taketh before other his own supper: and one is hungry, and another is drunken.

Here our apostle begins to reprove the Corinthians for the abuses found in their love-feasts. These love-feasts were founded on no express command in holy writ, but only on the custom of the church, who immediately before received the sacrament used to have a great feast, to which all the poor were invited at the charges of the rich, as an expression of their perfect love and charity one towards another. Now in these feasts of charity, they did not observe due order and decency; for every one, that is, every party and faction, being come to the place of the assembly, did presently sit down to eat what they had brought, in the company of their own party, not minding or regarding others; whereupon this holy feast of charity was neither celebrated at the same time by all, nor with that unanimity and concord which it was designed to represent; whilst the poor were excluded, and sent home hungry, the rich were feasted, and drank to some degree of excess, which is here called drunkenness; one is hungry and another is drunken. Behold what great irregularities and disorders are here found in the church of Corinth! Who can expect a church without spot in this imperfect state? God has left these miscarriages upon record, not for our imitation but for our caution.

22 What, have ye not houses to eat or to drink in? or despise ye the law of God, and shame them that have not? What shall I say unto you? shall I praise you in this? I praise you not.

A twofold sense and interpretation is given of these words. Some paraphrase them thus! What! must you make the house of God the place of your feasting? If you be disposed for mirth and jollity, have you not houses wherein you may do it with more privacy, and less offence? Or despise you the church of God? Do you undervalue, and thus profane and unhallow the place set a-part for God's worship and service, by converting it into a common banqueting-house? Thus many expound it of the material church; and their opinion is favoured by the antithesis and opposition between church and houses: Have ye not houses to eat and drink in? or despise you the church of God? Learn That holy duties, pious and public, are to be performed in the church or house of God. Duties pious, but not public, better suit the closet than the church. Duties public, but not pious, more befit a guildhall or town-house, than the house of God. Others by the church of God understand the spiritual church, the poor members of Jesus Christ, and render the words thus: "What, have ye not houses to eat and to drink in, if need be, before you come? Or despise you those poor Christians, who are members of the church of Christ as well as you, and put to shame them that have not what you eat and drink, by excluding them out of your company for their poverty sake? for since God adopts them into his family, and admits them unto his table, you ought not to exclude them from this feast of charity, which was originally designed for the poor's relief." Learn, He that despiseth the poor, despiseth the church of God; yea, despiseth Christ himself; as he that pincheth the little toe, paineth the whole body, so the disgracing the poor members of Christ, is a despising of the whole church. In these love feasts the poor were the most proper, and should have been the most principal guests; but, alas! the rich gorged themselves plentifully, whilst the poor stood and looked on hungry. Yet note, lastly, With what lenity and mildness the apostle reproves these great disorders in the church of Corinth: Shall I praise you in this? I praise you not. It was the first time he had told them of their faults, therefore he doth it gently, in hopes of amendment. Learn thence, That though ministers must not commend, but reprove people, when they do ill, yet they must use mildness, especially at their first reproving of a sin. Some observe, That God so blessed the mild severity of St. Paul, that the Corinthians, upon the writing this first epistle, reformed all their abuses: which they gather from hence, because no fault is taxed in this second epistle, which was reformed in the first.

23 ¶ For I have received of the Lord, that which also I delivered unto you, That the Lord Jesus, the same night in which he was betrayed, took bread?

14 And when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, Take eat: this is my body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me. 25 After the same manner also he took the cup, when he had supped, saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood: this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me. 26 For as oft as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do shew the Lords death till he come.

Observe here, 1. How, the apostle, for reforming those abuses, which were crept into the church amongst them relating to the holy sacrament, reduces them to the first institution of that sacred ordinance, I have delivered unto you what I have received of the Lord. Mark, The apostle did receive and deliver, but not institute and appoint, this venerable ordinance. Had he not received, he had wanted authority; and had he not delivered what he received, he had wanted integrity. 2. The author of this institution, the Lord Jesus. To institute sacraments is and act of Christ's regal power and royal authority. The church has no power to appoint, but only to execute and administer what Christ appoints. 3. The time of the institution, the same night in which he was betrayed. It is a night much to be remembered, in which he settles an ordinance in the church, for the confirmation and consolation of his people to the end of the world. Lord! What an evidence was here of thy tender cares and affectionate concern for thy church and people, in spending so much of that little, very little, time thou hadst left, upon their account! 4. The sacrament elements, or the commorative, significative, and instructive signs; and they are bread and wine, shadowing forth the body and blood of the crucified Jesus. Where note, St. Paul calls it bread five times over, which Christ calls his own body, because it was a sign and representation of his body: not his real body, for then Christ ate his own body whilst he was alive, his disciples devour in that body over night, which hung upon the cross next morning, with a thousand such absurdities which the doctrine of transubstantiation carries along with it. Observe, 5. The ministerial actions, the breaking of the bread, and blessing of the cup. The bread must be broken, to represent the breaking of Christ's body upon the cross, which comprehended all the sufferings of his human nature, all which were consummated in his crucifixion; and this broken bread must be taken and eaten by us, to intimate, that all his breakings, bruising, and woundings, both in soul and body, were for our sins, and for our benefits, and that the sole intention of all his sufferings was for us. Wine also is poured forth, because as no liquor like wine doth cheer a sad and drooping spirit, in like manner nothing doth so glad and cheer the soul, as faith in a crucified Saviour. That spiritual life which a soul is raised to, by the death of Christ, is a life of the greatest delight and joy which we can conceive. 6 The great design and end of this institution, Do it in remembrance of me, or for a memorial of me; Christ knew how apt our base hearts would be to forget him, amidst such a throng of sensible objects as we here converse with; and how much our forgetfulness of him and his sufferings would tend to our prejudice and disadvantage; and therefore doth he appoint this ordinance to bring him to remembrance. 7. The strict mandate or charge given for the frequent celebration of this ordinance,

Do this as oft as ye drink it? Do it often. We can no more live and thrive without our spiritual, than we can without our corporal food; as the body must be often fed, so the soul must have its frequent repast. 8. The reason assigned for the frequent celebration of this ordinance: For as oft as ye do this, ye do shew the Lord's death till he come; that is, by frequenting this ordinance, we commemorate the death of Christ during his absence from us. As the end of the ordinance was to be a standing memorial, so the obligation that lies upon all Christians to observe it, is perpetual; Christians are by this ordinance to represent the sacrificing of Christ for their sins, till he came again in glory. Learn from the whole, 1. That the sacrament of the Lord's supper was instituted by Christ as a standing memorial of his death and sufferings for us. Here we ought to remember the painfulness of his death, the meritoriousness of his death, the voluntariness of his death, the acceptableness of his death to God, and the advantagefulness of his death to ourselves. And the manner how we should remember Christ and his death in the sacrament, is various; with judgment and understanding, with reverence and humility, with sorrow and grief of heart for our sins, yet with joy and thankfulness for the sufferings of a Saviour, with faith and affiance, with love and affection, with resolutions for a new and better obedience. 2. That the command of Christ lays it as a law upon, and makes it the standing duty of all Christians, to commemorate his death at his holy table, Do this in remembrance of me. Here it deserves our notice what kind of command this is; it is a sovereign and supreme command; it is a positive and express command; it is a permanent and lasting command; it is the command of a Saviour, yea, of a dying Saviour; it is a command of love; it is such a command, as, if we duly observe, will be a blessed means to enable us to observe all the commands of God better. Lastly, It is such a command, as whoever lies in the wilful neglect of it, cannot be called a christian, but will be treated by Christ at the great day as an enemy and despiser of his dying love. Learn, 3. That it is a Christian's duty, not barely to do this, but to do it often; frequent communicating is a great duty. The primitive Christians received every Lord's day, yea, it is believed, oftener than every Lord's day. This is agreeable to the nature of the ordinance, which is a spiritual repast, banquet and feast, and therefore to be received frequently. It is also agreeable to the author of the ordinance; it is a feast of God's own providing; therefore, to neglect it, is to fly in the face of God; it is agreeable to the end of the ordinance, which is to renew our covenant, and that cannot be done too often.

27 Wherefore, whosoever shall eat this bread and drink this cup of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord.

The apostle having in the foregoing verses, declared the original institution of the Lord's Supper, he comes now to instruct the Corinthians in the right use of it; and to excite them to a due regard in their approaches to it, he acquaints them with the great danger of an unworthy receiving of it: ver. 27. Whosoever shall eat, &c. Quest. (1.) What is it not to eat and drink unworthily? Ans.

(1.) To receive the sacrament with many doubts and fears with a weak faith, with a trembling hand, and fearful heart, all this may be, and yet the person not receive unworthily. (2.) The want of perfect holiness, and a complete freedom from sin, doth not denominate a person an unworthy receiver; for this ordinance was not instituted for angels, but for men; to make sinful men good, and good men better. (3.) Backwardness to the duty, deadness and dulness in the duty, when involuntary and lamented, makes not a person an unworthy receiver. Quest. (2.) What is it to eat and drink unworthily? Ans. (1.) It is to receive out of custom, not out of conscience; for company's sake, not for the command's sake; because the law of man enjoins it, not because the law of Christ requires it. (2.) It is to receive, without such a disposition of mind, such a preparation of heart, such reverence and devotion, as ought therein to be exercised; to receive without knowledge, without repentance, without faith, without resolutions for a sincere obedience: without sincere reconciliation to our neighbour. Quest. (3.) What is it to be guilty of the body and blood of our Lord? Ans. (1.) It is an implicit approbation of the Jews act in crucifying Christ. (2.) It is implicitly a jesting with the body and blood of Christ, a playing with the most tremendous things in the world. (3.) It is a crucifying the Son of God afresh; it is to stab the master of the feast at his own table whilst he is treating us, with the richest dainties.

28 But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread and drink of that cup.

Note here, The duty required to prevent the danger of unworthy receiving, and that is the great and necessary duty of examination. A metaphor taken from goldsmiths, who try the truth of their gold by the touchstone, the purity of their gold by the fire, the weight of it by the scale. 2. The examinant, or person performing this duty of examination. Let a man, that is, let every man. This stands in a double opposition, (1.) To our examining of others. (2.) To our resting in another's examination of us. 3. The frequency of this act; as often as we partake of the ordinance, so oft we should, if we have time, less or more, examine ourselves. Let him examine, and so let him eat: Let him pass through one duty to another. Learn hence, That it is the special duty, and ought to be the singular care and endeavor, of all those that desire safely and comfortably to approach the table of the Lord, to examine themselves before they come; to examine their right unto it, and to examine their fitness for it.

29 For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body.

What it is to eat and drink unworthily, we find explained before, at ver. 27. Note here, farther, That many persons of honest hearts, but weak heads, have sadly misunderstood the words of St. Paul, about unworthy receiving, thinking that such an excess of reverence and preparation is required, that either they dare not come at all, or they come with so much dread and fear upon their minds, that they are more terrified than comforted. Father, The unworthy person eats

eats and drinks judgment; that is, temporal judgment will follow him in this life; and without repentance, eternal damnation in the next. Yet note, It is judgment to himself that receives; not to another that receives with him. If a wicked man's presence at the sacrament pollutes the ordinance to a worthy receiver, then Christ and his eleven apostles were defiled by the company of Judas at the passover; for at that he certainly was, and, as many think, at the Lord's supper also. Learn then, That unworthy receivers of the Lord's supper do contract great guilt, and incur great danger to themselves. The design of the apostle in these two last verses, is this, that we should not sinfully omit the duty, because of the command; nor carelessly undertake it, because of the threatened judgment.

30 For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep.

For this cause: That is, for profaning the sacrament, and not discerning the Lord's body at the Lord's table; for not approaching it as a feast of love designed equally for the benefit of all his members, and to knit them in the closest bonds of unity and friendship each to other: Therefore it was, that many were visited with sickness and weakness, and some with death; which being called sleep; some have charitably concluded from thence, that they were pious persons in the main; for the death of the wicked is hardly called sleep any where in scripture: and if so, then we learn, that the holiness of an ordinance, or the habitual holiness of any person who approaches an ordinance, will not exempt us from God's displeasure, and the infliction of temporal judgments here in this life, if they do not by actual preparation sanctify the name of God in the duties and ordinance of his worship. Besides an habitual, there is required an actual preparation in all those that will safely and comfortably approach to God in holy duties; without it, we shall meet with a blow instead of a blessing.

31 For if we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged.

That is, "If we would examine, try, censure, and sentence ourselves, and so come to the Lord's table, as penitent believers, with a purity of aim, and a sincere intention, we should thereby escape the castigatory punishments, and condemnatory sentence of God. Learn hence, That as it is our duty often to examine and judge ourselves, so self-judging in particular, before we approach the Lord's table, will preserve us from the judgment and condemnation of God we must first summon, then examine, then convict and try, then sentence and condemn ourselves; and all this in hopes of being absolved and acquitted by God, acting our faith upon his free mercy, and the Redeemer's satisfaction.

32 But when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world.

Note here, 1. The nature of those judgments, or afflictive evils, which do befall the children of God in this life; they are chastenings; we are chastened of the Lord. Chastenings belong properly to children who are wanton and ungovernable. To be chastened, has a double aspect; first upon our privilege, it denotes our relation as children unto God our Father. Chastenings are a part of his children's portion; yet, in that we are chastened, it taxes us with weakness; we are foolish, wanton, and unruly children, and therefore so long as we are here, must always go with a rod at our backs. Christ, who was also a son, was chastened. The chastisement of our peace was upon him; but his were judiciary chastisements; God did not chastise him as a child, but as an enemy, as a malefactor, in our stead; as we must have been chastened, who were enemies and malefactors. Our chastenings are fatherly, Christ's judiciary. 2. The merciful design of God in the chastenings of his children; it is to prevent their condemnation: We are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world. When therefore at any time we are under chastisement, in all we say or do, let us justify God, and condemn ourselves, seeing his chastisements are designed to prevent our condemnation.

33 Wherefore, my brethren, when you come together to eat tarry one for another. 34 And if any man hunger, let him eat at home: that ye come not together unto condemnation. And the rest will I set in order when I come.

Our apostle here concludes his discourse with an exhortation to the Corinthians, to take heed for time to come, that all these forementioned miscarriages may be rectified; that when they come together to eat the Lord's supper, and the love feasts, they should tarry one for another, that they may all feed and feast together. And if any man pretend to be hungry, let him eat at home before he comes, lest by these irreverent actions he brings down the judgments of God upon himself. Lastly, He tells them, that as to other points of church order he would determine them when he came among them: The rest will I set in order when I come: Such unchristian disorders may arise in the church, as will require the presence and coming of an apostle to correct and reform them.

CHAP. XII.

NOW concerning spiritual gifts, brethren, I would not have you ignorant.

Our apostle begins this chapter with the resolution of another case concerning the nature and right use of spiritual gifts. Some that excelled in them, were proud of them, using them to vain ostentation; he therefore tells them, he would not have them ignorant as touching spiritual gifts; not ignorant either of their author from whence they came, the Holy Spirit of God; nor of their end and use, which is the benefit and edification of others. Gifts are for the good of others, but a man shall have the advantage and comfort of his own grace: Gifts are the gold which adorns the temple, but grace is the altar which sanctifies the gold. Lord! how many have gone laden with gifts to hell? how many have prophesied in thy name, and yet perished in thy wrath? how many cast out devils out of others who yet were cast to the devils themselves? how many wrought miracles, and did many wonderful works, who yet perished for evil workers? Lord! let me never build upon this bottom (gifts) for eternity; these may make me glorious in the eyes of men, but grace renders me precious in the sight of God.

2 Ye know that ye were Gentiles, carried away unto these dumb idols, even as ye were led.

Note here, 1. How the apostle reminds the Corinthians of what they were in their Heathenish state; namely, idolatrous Gentiles serving dumb idols; for though the devil sometimes spoke in and by the idols, yet the idols themselves had mouths and spake not; and they were carried away unto these dumb idols, even as they were led; that is, as they were led by their idolatrous priests, who had nothing of this divine Spirit amongst them, which they, since their conversion from Gentilism to Christianity, had been made partakers of. Now from this description of idolaters, that they serve and worship dumb idols, we learn, What an absurd and unreasonable sin idolatry is; the worshipper is better than the God he worships; reasonable men worship unreasonable creatures; sensible men adore senseless stocks and stones; and they who can speak, invoke and call upon dumb idols, that can neither speak nor hear. And yet how prone is the nature of man to idolatry and false worship; partly because it is a worship of our own invention, and we are fond of what is of our own finding out and setting up; and partly because it is external and pompous, it courts the outward senses with glittering appearances; and men do naturally love and chuse that for the object of their worship which may be seen, rather than that which is to be believed. As they walk by sight, and not by faith, so do they worship too; an invisible and unseen being is neither the object of their adoration, nor election and choice.

3 Wherefore I give you to understand that no man speaking by the Spirit of God, calleth Jesus accursed; and that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost.

The great difference that was then in the world, was about Jesus: Those that were led away by dumb idols, were taught by Satan to blaspheme, and say, upon the mention of our Saviour's name, Jesus Anathema, Jesus Anathema; that is, let Jesus be Anathema, accursed, detested, and destroyed, as the common odium of their gods. Now, when the apostle says, such speak not by the Spirit of God, his meaning is, that they did it by the impulse and instinct of the devil, by the actings and instigation of the evil spirit, which ruled in those children of disobedience on the other side, every one that believeth, calleth Jesus Lord, and professeth faith in him. Now, none, says the apostle, can do this but by the Holy Ghost, that is, by his help and assistance. But it may said, we read in scripture of many who were actuated by the unclean spirit, that yet called Jesus Lord, Mark i. 23. Acts xvi. 17. Ans. (1.) These acknowledgments of Christ to be Lord, were either wrested from the devil, and were a considerable part of his torment or were over-ruled by God to advance the glory of Christ. But, (2.) The apostle here speaks of such a calling Jesus Lord, as is accompanied with faith in him, and subjection to him. There is a double saying that Jesus is Lord; the one verbal, ore tenus, with lip and tongue only, without the consent of the heart, or obedience of the life; the other actual, when we do with our whole souls own and acknowledge him, love and embrace him, obey and serve him as Lord, and vote for his government and dominion over us. No man thus called Jesus Lord, but by the Holy Ghost renewing and sanctifying him, assisting and enabling him so to do.

4 Now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. 5 And there are differences of administrations, but the same Lord. 6 And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all.

That is there is a great variety and diversity of spiritual gifts, but it is the same Spirit from whence they all proceed and flow; and there are different administrations and offices in the church, but it is the same Lord who hath appointed all these offices; And there are diversities of operations performed by these officers in the church, but it is the same God who worketh them in all. Here gifts are ascribed to the Holy Ghost, administrations to the Lord Christ, and operations to God the Father; but in all these there are great diversities both of kinds and degrees: they differ in the nature, extent and use. Thus it is with reference to spiritual gifts; in the case of sanctifying graces, it is far otherwise; these are all bestowed jointly, or not at all: God cannot give humility to one, purity to another, charity alone to a third, because there is such an inseparable union and alliance among the graces of the Spirit, (a concatenation of graces, as some call it) that where one really is, there all the rest must be. Hence probably it is, why the whole of religion is sometimes expressed by one particular duty of it, sometimes by faith, sometimes by hope, sometimes by repentance, sometimes by charity; because the combination of these saving graces is such, that the mentioning of one implies and includes all the rest.

7 But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal. 8 For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; 9 To another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit; 10 To another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues 11 But all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will.

Note here, How the apostle enumerates and reckons up the several sorts and kinds of spiritual gifts, which were at that time plentifully poured forth upon the ministers and members of the church of Christ, which begat astonishment and admiration; and of these extraordinary gifts, our apostle reckons up nine sorts or kinds, which were found in the primitive church in his days, as they here follow:

(1.) One

(1.) One had the word of wisdom; that is, the revelation of the gospel which is here called the manifold wisdom of God; This was the gift of the apostles; to whom the extraordinary measures of divine wisdom were first given, to reveal the mysteries of the gospel to the Pagan world. (2.) Another had the word of knowledge; that is, a special ability to interpret the mystical senses and veiled meanings of the scripture, and also to foretell future things. Thus St. Paul told the centurion before the shipwreck, that not a man in the ship should be lost, Acts xxvii. and Agabus foretold the famine, and St. Paul's imprisonment, Acts xi. (3.) To another faith, by this some understand supernatural courage and confidence, with which God did endow them, when he called to extraordinary sufferings or services; accordingly we read in the Acts of the apostles, with what invincible courage and resolution poor men appeared before the Jewish and Heathen tribunals, and with what astonishing presence both of body and mind, they bore the name of Jesus before the kings and people of the earth. Others by faith here, understand a miraculous faith, that is, a supernatural confidence and firm assurance, wrought by the Holy Spirit in the minds of some, in the apostle's time; by which they were certain that they could do such and such a miracle, before they undertook to do it; and the greatest apostle durst never undertake to do a miracle, but when he was assured by the Spirit that he could do it; and indeed it was requisite for Almighty God, by some secret preceeding impression of mind, to let the teachers of the gospel know when he would assist them in working miracles, lest they should attempt to work when they could not, and so discredit Christ's doctrine, their own authority, and dishonour the name of God; and therefore, it is observable, That the gift of faith here, is set immediately before the gift of healing, and working miracles, because it consisted in an antecedent impulse to both. (4.) The next miraculous gift, is the gift of healing, that is, a power of curing all diseases, both of body and mind, without the help of physic, through the alone name of Jesus Christ. (5.) The gift of miracles, under which is comprehended the power of silencing and casting out devils, inflicting diseases and death on the bodies of incorrigible sinners, as on Elymus and Annanias; also the more wonderful power in raising the dead. (6.) The gift of prophecy, that is, 1. The prediction or foreknowledge of things to come. Thus Agabus foretold by the Spirit, a famine, Acts xii. and this gift was sometimes exercised by foretelling who would be fit persons to do God service in the church; thus, 1 Tim. i. 18. and ch. iv. 14. According to the foregoing prophecies concerning thee, neglect not the gift that was given thee by prophecy. 2. Others, by prophecy, understand preaching and expounding scriptures by divine inspiration, praising God by inspired hymns and psalms, and also praying unto him in public assemblies by inspired prayers; for in the apostles' time, there was a miraculous gift of preaching, praying, and singing, in which the Spirit did in an extraordinary manner, assist some persons, which, with other extraordinary gifts, is long since ceased. (7.) The gift of discerning of spirits, that is, either first, a power of quick and sure discerning, whether men, pretending to the Spirit, spake from God, or not; or supernatural sagacity to discern between the impulses of sa-tanical spirits, and divinely inspired persons. Or, secondly, A spirit of discerning, whether such and such persons be best qualified for such an office in the church, and accordingly choosing them out for that work. Thus, Acts xiii. 2, 3. the holy Spirit in the prophet said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul, for the work to which I have called the n. Or, lastly, By this power of discerning spirits, the apostles could tell very much of the inward purposes of men's hearts and thoughts; so Peter discerned the heart of Annanias, and the thoughts of Simon Magus. (8.) The gift of tongues, that is an ability to speak divers languages, unlearned and untaught. To which was added, (9.) The gift of interpreting those languages; For these two gifts did not always go together; Some could speak divers languages, that could not interpret them; others could interpret them, that could not speak them: For say some, the gift of strange tongues was usually accompanied with such strange raptures, that the person affected, could not use his understanding in an ordinary way, so as to interpret and explain his own inspirations in the audience to which he spoke; which was the reason why the Spirit did usually reveal to others, who stood by and understood not the inspired languages, the matter which was spoken. Thus are the extraordinary and miraculous gifts of the holy Spirit, enumerated by the apostle, which were bestowed upon the primitive church, whose infant state required all this extraordinary assistance; but as the church grew up, Almighty God, like a wise nurse, weaned her by degrees from these miraculous gifts, till at last arriving at her full stature, he left her, as parents leave their children when grown to be men, to subsist without these extraordinary helps and supplies.

12 ¶ For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body: so also is Christ. 13 For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit.

Here our apostle acquaints us, that the intent and design of God, in giving these various gifts, was the profit and edification of his church, which he compares to a body that has many members; for though that one Spirit which distributes the gifts, could have given them all to the same person, yet to maintain a mutual dependance and a charitable serviceableness of the members, one among another, he gave to one, one gift; to another, another; by which means one member of the church would be obliged to take care of the rest. Behold here, how the wisdom of God has ordered the state of the church, like that of the natural body, to which the apostle elegantly compares the body of Christ, which is his church: As the body hath members, so also has Christ; that is, the church of Christ. Now, having assured them, that they were indeed members of one body, he tells them what it was that made them so, ver. 13. For by one Spirit, says he, we are baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, and have been made to drink into one Spirit: that is, by being baptized, we are all made members of the body of Christ, and united one to another, another, under him the Head; and this, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, bond or free, we are all one in Christ, who by baptism were admitted into his church: And this union of our's one with another, is testified and declared by our communion at the Lord's table, which is here called, a drinking into one Spirit. And whereas by baptism we are said by one Spirit to be baptized into one body, and at the Lord's supper, are said to drink into one Spirit; we learn, That the grace of the holy Spirit was given in baptism and in the Lord's supper, to all the faithful who do not receive unprofitable signs, but the quickening grace and Spirit of God, to make them living members of that one body.

15 If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? 16 And if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body: it is therefore not of the body? 17 If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? if the whole were hearing, where were the smelling?

Our apostle here elegantly compares the state of the mystical body, the church, with that of the natural body: As the natural body is one, so is the mystical body; as the natural body is informed and animated with one spirit or soul, so the mystical body, the church, is animated by one and the same Spirit, received from our spiritual Head, Christ Jesus, and communicated to all the members of his body, to give them life and motion: As the members of the natural body are not alike, but some superior, and others inferior, in excellency, yet all of indispensable use; (for the wise God hath created no member of man's body in vain, but designed all for the mutual help and benefit of one another) in like manner is it in the church, the mystical body; there are different gifts, different offices; some are superior, and more excelling in gifts, others are of meaner abilities, yet all conduce to the good of the whole: One of inferior gifts must not account himself useless; (for every one that cannot be excellent, may yet be useful) for if so, what would become of the church? Therefore, there must be different gifts and offices, for different uses: But every one must employ his gift, and perform his office according to the nature of it, for the service of the whole. Learn hence, 1. That several men have their several gifts, as it pleaseth the gift-giving Spirit to give unto them. 2. That such as have the meanest talent, either of gifts or graces, ought not to esteem themselves, or be esteemed by others, as useless or unserviceable; but to employ their talent, though ever so small, for the service and benefit of the whole church.

18 But now hath God set the members every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased him. 19 And if they were all one member, where were the body? 20 But now are they many members, yet but one body. 21 And the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee: nor again, the head to the foot, I have no need of you, 22 Nay, much more, those members of the body which seem to be more feeble are necessary.

As if the apostle had said, "Whereas our wise Creator who made the body of man, has appointed all the members of that body for divers uses and offices, and also appointed the order in which every member shall stand; that the head shall be uppermost, to guide the body, the foot lowermost, to bear the body: In like manner our gracious Redeemer has appointed to the several members of his church, distinct offices in his church. And as the principal members of the body, the eye and hand, do need the less principal; so the rulers, pastors, and wisest members of the church, do need even those weak and inferior Christians, whom the world makes small account of. The eye, the man of great understanding cannot say to the hand, the person employed in lesser services, I have no need of you; nor again the head, that is, the person placed in the highest dignity in the church, cannot say to the feet, the person employed in the lowest offices of the church, I have no need of you. Therefore the superior members of the church must not pride it over the inferior, nor the most knowing Christians despise the less knowing, as unuseful and unprofitable, but, as fellow-members, jointly endeavour the mutual benefit and advantage of one another.

23 And those members of the body which we think to be less honourable, upon these we bestow more abundant honour; and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness. 25 For our comely parts have no need: but God hath tempered the body together, having given more abundant honour to that part which lacked: 24 That there should be no schism in the body; but that the members should have the same care one for another. 26 whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it: or one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it.

Still our apostle proceeds in that elegant comparison betwixt the members of the body natural and the body mystical; shewing, that as there are some members in the natural body that are less honourable, and some that are more honourable; and whereas we put more abundant honour upon the less honourable members by a decent covering, and modest adorning them; but upon our comely parts, such as the face, we put no covering, being comely enough of itself, and lacking no artificial beauty; in like manner all the members of the mystical body ought to be instructed, that the meanest offices in the church, and the meanest members of the church, who have least gifts, are as well of that spiritual body, the church, as those that have more excellent offices and gifts; and as the meaner must not envy the more excellent, so neither must the more excellent despise the meaner, but put a due value and respect upon one another. For practising of which duty, a double reason is here assigned; (1.) That there may be no schism in the body, but the members have the same care for, and regard to one another; if the members of the natural body should strive among themselves, the whole body would come to ruin by schism, so great mischief would arise to the church, the mystical body, by divisions and dissensions amongst the particular members of it. (2.) Because there ought to be a sympathy between the members of the mystical body, as there is betwixt the members of the natural body. There is a fellow-feeling with each other, both of joy and grief, in and among the natural members; they all rejoice and mourn with one another; if one member be pinched, the whole body is pained. Thus all the mystical members of Christ's body, the church, ought to have the same common interest, the same common concern, the same common care, and the same mutual sympathy with each other, both in weal and wo.

Our apostle having thus finished his elegant and excellent comparison between the members of the natural, and those of the mystical body; he comes now to make a particular and close application of it to the believing Corinthians, whom he acknowledges to be a part of the mystical body of Christ; and that it is their duty to carry themselves towards their fellow-members, as the members of the body natural do towards each other, who are evermore solicitous for the good of another. Now, says he, Ye are the members of Christ; as if he had said, Thus must it be with you who are the several members of Christ's church, which is his body. From the whole of this comparison, with the apostle's application of it, we learn, 1. That as there can be no natural body without divers members, so no mystical body without diversity of gifts and offices. 2. That as the most inferior members of the natural body are as truly members as the most noble, and as necessary and serviceable to the body as the other, so are inferior Christians as much the members of Christ's body, and in their place as useful and necessary as other members of the church, which are more excelling in spiritual gifts. 3. That all the members of the natural body are placed and disposed according to the wisdom of Almighty God; in like manner, the members of Christ's mystical body, are, by the unerring wisdom of God, placed in that station and condition in the church, in which he has set them, and accordingly, they ought to be satisfied with it, and endeavour to be useful in it. 4. That as there is no division in the members of the natural body, but all the members take care of, and are employed for the good of the whole; so ought matters to be managed in the body mystical, that there be no divisions, nor separate interests in it, but they should mutually regard the common interest of one another, sympathizing, sorrowing, and rejoicing together. O happy! when the interest of all parties, and private concerns, shall give place to public interests.

28 And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healing, helps, governments, diversities of tongues.

Our apostle having, in the beginning of the chapter, reckoned up the divers gifts, which God had variously bestowed upon the church, here in the close of the chapter, he reckons up the particular officers that he thought fit to place in his church. (1.) Apostles; persons sent forth immediately by Christ to lay the foundation of Christian churches, and upon whom the care of all the churches lay. (2.) Prophets; or persons immediately inspired with the knowledge of future things. (3.) Teachers; such as labour in the word and doctrine, either as itinerary preachers, going from place to place, or as settled fixed ministers in the church, expounding the scriptures to the people. (4.) Miracles; that is, some persons endued with an extraordinary power to work miracles for convincing infidels, and confirming believers. (5.) Gifts of healing; such persons as had a power conferred upon them to heal diseases, without the help of physic, in an extraordinary way. (6.) Helps; deacons, which took care of the poor, and assisted the church in the distribution of her charity: and also assisted in holy things, particularly, in baptizing and administering the Lord's supper. (7.) Governments; the rulers of the church and spiritual guides. (8.) Diversities of tongues; that is persons enabled to speak divers languages, in order to the farther spreading of the gospel, without the help of study. Behold here the wisdom of God in this various distribution of gifts and offices in his church; all which, as they are designed by him, so they ought to be managed by her, for the general good of the whole, without either pride or haughtiness on the one hand, or envy and emulation on the other.

29 Are all apostles? are all prophets? are all teachers? are all workers of miracles? 30 Have all the gifts of healings? do all speak with tongues? do all interpret?

The force of the apostle's argument lies thus: As the natural body, to which he had before alluded, cannot be all eye, nor all ear, nor all hand, nor foot; in the like manner, in the mystical body, the church, all cannot govern, prophesy, teach, work miracles, heal diseases; but one has this gift, and another that; one has this office in the church, and another that; all which are to be employed and improved for the common good of the church, and mutual benefit of each other.

31 But covet earnestly the best gifts. And yet shew I unto you a more excellent way.

He concludes the chapter with this advice, that they covet and desire the best: that is, the most useful and excellent gifts, the most beneficial and edifying gifts, such as are most advantageous to the church; yet without intimating to them, that though there be an excellency in gifts, yet there is a greater excellency in grace, particularly in the grace of love. Charity or love to God and our neighbour, is more excelling than a load of gifts, though very extraordinary, though supernatural and miraculous. Let shew I unto you a more excellent way: that is a more excellent way of ministering to the welfare of the church, and of edifying your own souls, even by true Christian love one towards another. Learn hence, That as the sanctifying graces of the holy Spirit are more excelling than the miraculous and extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, so it is the Christian's duty to be much more covetous and desirous of them; for when gifts vanish away, the habits of grace shall never fail, but abide for ever, particularly the grace of love, which shall not only accompany us to heaven, but in heaven; where, from a small and little spark, it shall be improved to a seraphic and never-failing flame.

CHAP. XIII.

Our apostle proceeds in this chapter to set forth the transcendent excellency of the graces of the holy Spirit, above the most exalted and admired gifts; and in particular, the excellency of the grace of charity, that is, the unfeigned love of God and our neighbour; which virtue he likewise persuasively enforces in the following chapter.

THOUGH I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brags, or a tinkling cymbal.

Here our apostle begins a comparison between gifts and graces, and shews how much more excelling and desirable the saving graces of the spirit are, than all those pompous and miraculous gifts, in which there is no real excellency; and nothing for which we should desire them, but only upon the score of usefulness and serviceableness to the church: And this he instances first in the gifts of tongues, Though I speak with the tongues of men and angels, &c. that is, though I had the gift of tongues, or speaking divers languages in the highest measure, and most exalted degree; could I preach and pray like an angel, discourse and talk beyond the rate of any mortal man, and have not the grace of love and charity, alas! what is all this to God, who is not taken with a noisy sound, as the children are with a musical instrument? Behold here, that the tongues of men or angels could have said nothing more plain or emphatical, to shew how much more excellent the saving graces of the spirit are than miraculous gifts, which commend us not to God, render us not like God, nor any ways qualify us for the enjoyment of him, giving us no intrinsic worth, or inherent excellency. They only proclaim God's goodness towards us, but are no ways evidential of any goodness in us towards him. Gifts are like the gold which adorns the temple, but grace is like the altar which sanctifies the gold.

2 And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing.

Farther, Suppose I had the spirit of prophecy, and could speak, by inspiration, of things present, and things to come, and could understand deep and difficult points in God's word and works, what is this more than Balaam had? And suppose I have all faith, that is, the highest degree of miraculous faith, so that I could remove mountains, yet this severed from charity, or the predominant love of God and our neighbour, is all nothing. And I am nothing, that is, nothing worth in the sight of God. Note, here, That miraculous faith may be severed from charity, but justifying faith cannot, which always worketh by love; and where- ever that grace is found, it gives value and acceptance to all other graces. Faith without charity, is but a dead assent; hope without charity, is but like a tympany, the bigger it grows, the more dangerous it proves; and the most diffusive alms-giving, without love, is but a sacrifice to vanity.

3 And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing.

Note here, 1. That alms may be given without true love to God, or our neighbour, for God's sake; they may be given out of mere natural pity to the poor, out of a desire to be well thought of, and well spoken of by men, out of an opinion of merit, and obliging God, or from some other cause, which includes not love either to God or man: and wherever they are thus given, they profit nothing to salvation. The Greek word for feeding the poor here, signifies to divide victuals in several pieces, and so distribute it among the poor. Lord! what a consideration is this, that a man may do all the external works of mercy, even the highest and most transcendent works, and yet want true love to God and his neighbour. 2. That as alms may be given, so martyrdom may be undergone without charity. If I give my body to be burned; that is, if I have so much fortitude and courage as to lay down my life for Christ and his truth, which is such an high expression of my obedience to him, as angels are not capable of performing, yet without charity, burning is but a vain-glorious blaze; and instead of sealing the truth with our blood, we seal but our own shame and folly. 3. The apostle says not, If I be burnt, persecuted, and put to death by others; but, if I give myself to be burned, if I voluntarily and freely offer up myself, not to imprisonment only, but to death itself, yea to the most terrible kind of death, burning; yet if all this be not from a right principle, and sincere end, if all this be without true love to God and his glory, church, and truth, it will avail nothing to salvation. Learn hence, That no kind of external sufferings, though ever so grievous, either for the truth of Christ indeed, or for that which a man's conscience judges to be the truth of Christ, is a sure and infallible sign of a gracious state; a man may suffer for truth, but not for truth's sake, only for interest's sake; he may suffer from a natural strength and stoutness of spirit, and not from a spiritual fortitude wrought in him by the Spirit of God. Ah, Lord! how miserable is it to be burnt with fire here for Christ, and to hear him say afterward, Depart ye cursed, into everlasting fire! It is indeed a great matter to suffer for Christ, but it is much greater to suffer with such a disposition of heart as Christ requires.

4 Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up,

Here the apostle entereth upon the description and commendation of the grace and duty of charity, and declares several excellent effects and properties of it: namely, It suffereth long, and is kind; that is, the charitable man is kind to all, patient towards all; he can bear injuries and reproaches very long, without either desiring or endeavouring to revenge them. It envieth not; that is, he envieth neither the power, nor profit, nor preferment, nor applause, nor precedency of any man; but is well pleased with the happiness of every man, and laments their misfortunes. Charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up; that is, it suppresses all self-applauding and admiring thoughts, all arrogance in assuming to ourselves, and undervaluing of others.

5 Doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil;

That is, charity, or true love to our neighbour, will restrain us from all uncomely deportment towards him; it will not suffer us to do an ill or indecent thing to any one; it breaks not forth into violent and ungovernable passions upon any provocations, how just soever, how great soever. Seeketh not her own; that is, her own praise, profit, or pleasure; it seeketh it not inordinately, it seeketh it not injuriously, either in the neglect of others, or to the hurt of others. Charity is not selfish, but generous. It is not easily provoked; that is, charity is not provoked readily to think, speak, or act unduly, by small injuries or occasions, but beareth, forbeareth, and forgiveth. Thinketh no evil; that is, of any person groundlessly, but construes and interprets every thing in the best sense; for lightly to take up an evil report of our neighbor, to think or suspect, much more to believe and report any evil of him, without sufficient evidence against him, is a violation of the law of charity.

6 Rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth;

Charity rejoices not in any evil done, either, (1.) By ourselves in the commission, or after contemplation of it; or, (2.) By others. Lord! how sad is it when it becomes matter of mirth and sport, to see another stab at once the Christian name, and his own soul! Or, (3.) It rejoices not in any evil done to others; charity suffers no man to be pleased or delighted with any deceit or falsehood spoken of, or done to others, or with any ill stories, or malicious insinuations concerning them, or in any calamity befalling them. But rejoiceth in the truth; that is, (1.) Charity is so far from rejoicing, either in the falls or misfortunes of others, that it rejoices when the truth and innocency, the righteousness and equity, of any person or cause is made manifest: A good man rejoices when he sees any suspected for, or charged with iniquity, upon due examination, cleared and acquitted. Or, (2.) Rejoiceth in the truth; that is, in men's loving truth, doing justly, and living righteously, according to the rule of truth, the gospel. O! what a complacency and inward pleasure doth it beget in a good man's mind, when he beholds truth and righteousness, piety and goodness, prevailing in the world?

7 Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.

Charity or love has strong shoulders to bear wrongs and injuries with patience, though very hard and grievous to be born; without returning evil for evil, it will enable us to forbear one another in love, and not cease to be kind, notwithstanding provocations. Believeth all things; that is, charity inclines a man to believe the best of his neighbour, till the contrary appears; it interprets every thing in the best sense, and makes the fairest construction of every man's case and condition: Not that a charitable man is a credulous man, and can believe whatever he pleases; but he believeth all things, so far as either reality or probability, so far as truth, or appearance of truth, will encourage him to do it. A charitable man is very willing to believe that things are meant as they are spoken, and intended as they are done. O! how uncharitable then, and unjust are they, who believe all is ill, when they know nothing ill; and think and speak ill of them, in whom they never saw any thing but what was good? It is not sufficient that we do not judge our neighbour maliciously, but we must not judge him ignorantly; it is an injurious and unworthy jealousy, when a person's actions are fair, to suspect his intentions. Hopeth all things; that is, it is the genius of charity, and the character of love, to hope the best of persons and things, so far as there is any ground of hope, yea, though they carry in them some cause and colour of suspicion: It inclines us still to hope the best concerning men's intentions and actions: and if our brother be bad at present, not to despair of his amendment; but endeavour his reformation, by all proper means. Endureth all things; that is, it puts up wrongs and injuries, without desiring, much less endeavouring to revenge them; it causes us to endure provocation with much patience, and extinguishes all inclinations to revenge. Some will conceal their anger, but seek revenge; their malice is like slow poison, that does not discover violent symptoms, but destroys life insensibly: Others have such fierce passions, that they strike fire out of the least provocations; they inflame their resentments, by considering every circumstance that will exasperate their spirits: but charity beareth all things, endureth all things.

8 Charity never faileth: but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away. 9 For we know in part, and we prophesy in part.

Charity never faileth. Holy love is an everlasting quality and employment; it shall not fail at death, as other graces do, but be perfected at death: Repentance shall accompany us to the gates of heaven, but repentance ceases forever in heaven, for no need of repentance where there is entire innocence: Faith is swallowed up in vision, and hope in fruition; but love is then and there in its exaltation. Thus Charity never faileth, but all other gifts will fail; prophesying, languages, sciences, and all artificial knowledge will cease forever; knowledge itself in heaven shall vanish away: But how vanish? The meaning is, that such knowledge as we have now, shall vanish then; that imperfect knowledge we have now, will cease, and be useless then; our present knowledge, is attained with much labour and study, but it shall be no more difficult to know in heaven, than it is for the eye to open and see: The beautiful face of truth shall in a moment be unveiled to us in heaven, and the curtain drawn away by the hand of God, which interpreted

interposed between us and the light. Again, knowledge of so imperfect a degree, as now it is of, shall vanish away: Here we know what we know by divine revelation, but in part; and we prophesy by inspiration but in part.

10 But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away.

As the imperfect twilight is done away by the opening of the perfect day; so at death, when that which is perfect takes place, then that which was imperfect shall be done away. Blessed be God for the hopes of that blessed place and state where all imperfections shall cease, especially the imperfection of our knowledge. Alas! here all that we know, either of the word or works of God, is but a part, a little part; and blessed be God, this perfect state doth not succeed the imperfect one, after a long interval, (at the resurrection and re-union of the body), but the imperfect state of the soul immediately is done away by the coming of the perfect one; the glass is laid by as useless, when we come to see face to face, and eye to eye. O happy and vast difference between the Christian's present and future state! True, he now begins to know, he knows in part here; but verily, what he here knows, is little of that he should know, little of that he might know, little of what others know, little of that he desires to know, and little of what he shall know, when he comes to heaven: then all imperfections shall be done away, when that which is perfect is come.

11 When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childish things.

Here the apostle compares the Christian's imperfect state of knowledge and holiness in this life, to a state of childhood, his perfect state of holiness and happiness in heaven, to a state of manhood. As a child conceives, thinks, and speaks of things suitable to his childish state; but when he comes to manly perfection, and to the full use and exercise of his reason, he then puts away childish conceptions and things: Thus it is with the best of us in this life, like children we conceive and think, we discourse and speak of spiritual things in a confused and imperfect manner; but when we arrive at our state of manly perfection in heaven, we shall then have knowledge and all other graces perfected. Learn hence, That Christians must stay for perfect knowledge, till they come to maturity and ripeness of age; children must not expect to know what men know: Solomon's knowledge on earth, so famously celebrated, will be but ignorance, compared with the knowledge and enlargements which the saints have in heaven; there, in natural things they shall be exact philosophers, in spiritual things complete divines: all dark scriptures shall be clear to them, all the knotty intrigues of providence wisely resolved: In a word, there they shall know God himself perfectly, though they can never know him to perfection.

12 For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known.

As if the apostle had said, Now in our minority we see divine revelations, as the prophets did of old in a dark enigmatical manner, and by symbolical representations of things upon the fancy, as in a glass; but then in the adult state of the church we shall see them after the Mosaical manner, in a way more accommodated to human nature, and as it were face to face; we shall see clearly, immediately; not by reflection, but by intuition. These adverbs, now and then, distinguish the two-fold state of gracious souls; and shew what they are whilst confined to the body, and what they shall be when emancipated and freed from the body, that clog of mortality which now hangs upon them. Note here,

1. That our imperfect knowledge of God is set forth by seeing in a glass, because it is a weak and imperfect vision; a glass gives but a weak and languid representation of the face that is seen in it; and because it is a vanishing and transient vision, a man having looked in a glass, presently forgets what he saw there; and because it is no immediate sight, but mediante speculo, by the glass of his word and ordinances we see and understand something of God's nature and will; though after all our searchings here to find out what God is, we rather know what he is not, than are able to declare what he is.

2. That such as have been God here, as in a glass, in the glass of his ordinances and providences, in the glass of his word and works, shall see him face to face, and fix their eye upon him in heaven to all eternity: When once the pious soul is unsheathed from the body, it glisters gloriously; as soon as the cage is open, this bird soars aloft, and sings melodiously. It is death's office to beat down the partition-wall, a gross earthly body; and then the glorified soul shall have a clear and perfect vision, an immediate and positive vision, a satisfying and soul-transforming vision, a permanent and eternal vision of the holy and blessed God, which the apostle here calls seeing face to face.

3. How St. Paul, in the latter words of the verse, gives us a plainer expression of that which before he had spoken more darkly and obscurely: Now I know in part, but then I shall know even as I am known. Where note, How the apostle changes the person; before it was, we see through a glass darkly; here it is, I know in part. He had included himself before, in the word we; but he doth it more apparently in saying I, Now I know in part. When so great an apostle acknowledges the imperfection of his knowledge; who can, who dare, boast of the largeness of his understanding? Note farther, the apostle's saying, Now I know, intimates, that he had begun his acquaintance with God here, which he expected should be improved and perfected in heaven; he that knows not God in part here, shall never know him face to face in glory: Heaven is a place of perfection indeed; but nothing is perfected there, that was not begun here; no knowledge, no holiness, will be consummated there, which did not commence and begin here.

4. When the apostle says, We shall know even as we are known; he means, that we shall know God as really and truly, though not so fully and comprehensibly as he knows us; we shall know him in his nature and attributes; then and there will his wonderful clemency be sweetly displayed, his exact justice visibly demonstrated, his perfect wisdom clearly unfolded, all the knotty intrigues of providence wisely resolved, all the mysterious depths of divine counsels fully discovered, to the delightful satisfaction of the admiring and adoring soul, who shall then see as it is seen, and know as it is known.

13 And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three : but the greatest of these is charity.

The design of the apostle in these words is, (1.) To inform the Corinthians, that the sanctifying graces of faith, hope, and charity, are far to be preferred before all the fore-mentioned extraordinary gifts of prophesy, miracles, tongues healing the sick, and raising the dead, not expected. The least degree of sanctifying grace from the Holy Spirit, is to be preferred, with respect to ourselves, before the largest measure of extraordinary gifts, which are wholly for the good and benefit of others. (2.) As our apostle had compared gifts and graces together before, so he compares graces amongst themselves now. Faith, hope, and charity, are set in competition, and the preference given to the last partly with respect to its future duration ; faith and hope will vanish with this life: Faith will end in sight, and hope in enjoyment ; but charity will never be out-dated, but last and flourish when we come to heaven, and be a special ingredient in, and a considerable part of our happiness there, which consists in the rapturous contemplation of divine love, in loving, praising, admiring, and adoring God, our great Creator, and in loving all whom he loves, and that eternally. Learn, 1. That faith, hope, and love, are abiding graces ; they do and must keep house, not only in the church-militant in general, but in the soul of every member of every church-militant in particular. 2. That of all these graces, charity is the greatest and most excellent. (1.) In regard of its extent, reaching to God, angels, and men. (2.) In regard of its use, extending to the good of others ; whereas faith and hope are particular and private graces. (3.) In regard of perfection, as rendering us more like to God. (4.) In regard of duration ; farewell faith and hope, when we come to heaven ; but welcome love : Therefore, the greatest of these is charity.

CHAP. XIV.

FOLLOW after charity, and desire spiritual gifts but rather that ye may prophesy.

Note here, 1. The apostle propounds to the Corinthians a threefold object, charity, spiritual gifts, and prophesy ; charity has the precedency and pre-eminency ; the apostle not only prefers it before all other gifts, but before the most useful and excellent graces, even faith and hope ; for service and benefit to the church of God it exceeds them all. Next he mentions spiritual gifts, such were the gift of tongues, the gift of miracles, the gift of healing, and, lastly, prophesy ; by which we are to understand an ordinary set course of preaching, interpreting, and opening the holy scriptures, which contain a revelation of God's mind and will. 2. A threefold act recommended, answerable to a threefold object propounded. An act of profecution : Διουσις, persecute and follow after charity as close as your persecutors pursue and follow after you : It imports a most earnest, vigorous, and vehement pursuit. An act of emulation : Ζηλῶσις, Desire earnestly spiritual gifts. An act of election and choice : Χρησθε rather that ye may prophesy, or clearly understand the mind of God yourselves, and have an ability to expound and explain it to others ; this will bring most glory to God, most profit to his church, and most comfort to yourselves.

2. ¶ For he that speaketh in an unknown tongue, speaketh not unto men, but unto God : for no man understandeth him ; howbeit in the Spirit he speaketh mysteries. 3 But he that prophesieth speaketh unto men to edification and exhortation and comfort.

Here note, 1. That the gift of tongues or speaking divers languages, was greatly valued and much desired by some in the church at that time ; probably for this reason, because the apostle's were very eminently endowed with this gift, the Holy Ghost descended upon them in the shape of cloven tongues : But yet the gift of prophesy, that is of understanding and interpreting God's will, was clearly the more valuable and desirable accomplishment : for though speaking with tongues created more admiration, and conciliated greater veneration to the speaker, yet prophesying was by far the most excellent gift, and tended most to the edification of the church : It is far better to do good than to appear great ; that it is most valuable and excelling, which is most upon a comparison between a gift of speaking in an unknown tongue, and prophesying or speaking plainly to the church's benefit and comfort : He that speaketh in an unknown tongue, that is, in a language not understood, not explained or interpreted, he speaketh not unto men ; that is, not to the understanding of men, for none understand him ; but to God only, he alone understands him : And though in the Spirit he speaks mysteries, or the deep things of God, yet all this is not to edification, because not understood by the church. Whereas, he that prophesieth, that is, he that intelligibly openeth and applieth the word of God to his auditors in the congregation, what he speaks conduces exceedingly to their edification and consolation. Here note, That the apostle not only dislikes, but plainly forbids preaching, praying and all other offices, being performed in the church in a language not understood : So that the practice of the church of Rome in their Latin prayers, is a flat contradiction to this whole chapter, and to the practice of the primitive church, Acts iv. 24. who lifted up their voice with one accord, and offered up a reasonable service to God : The prayers of the Jewish church were made in the Hebrew tongue ; and God gave the gift of tongues to the Christian church, that the apostle might establish the worship of God in every nation, in their own language.

3 He that speaketh in an unknown tongue, edifieth himself ; but he that prophesieth, edifieth the church. 5 I would that ye all spake with tongues, but rather that ye prophesied : for greater is he that prophesieth than he that speaketh with tongues, except he interpret, that the church may receive edifying. 6 Now, brethren, if I come unto you speaking with tongues, what shall I profit you, except I shall speak to you either by revelation, or by knowledge, or by prophesying, or by doctrine ?

Note here, 1. Another argument used by the apostle, to prove the gift of prophesying, that is of interpreting the holy scripture, to be far more excellent than the gift of tongues, separated from the gift of interpretation: He that speaketh in an unknown tongue, edifies none but himself, because none but himself understands it; but he that teacheth, instructeth, and exhorteth others, edifieth the church, or the whole assembly that he speaks in. 2. The apostle wishes they all had the gift of tongues, because they were so very covetous and desirous of them; though, alas! rather for their own ostentation than the church's edification: yet he rather desires with Moses, That all the Lord's people were prophets; that is, directed and assisted by the Spirit of God, to deliver plainly and persuasively the will of God to men; for he is the greatest in the church, who is most edifying; and he that prophesieth, edifieth more than he that speaketh all languages uninterpreted. 3. He amplifies this, by instancing in his own person: If I come to you speaking with tongues. As if he had said, I wonder whether what you so admire in others would please you in me: Suppose that I, whom God has eminently endowed with the gift of tongues, should come and speak to you in the Arabian language, what good would it do you? What would you be the wiser or better for me, should I make known to you some revelation which I immediately received from God, or open to you some truth which you knew not before, or urge you to some needful duty, or doctrinally expound to you the matters of faith and obedience recorded in the gospel, if either myself or some interpreter did not make what I say intelligible to you, what will it profit you? To deliver the mind and will of God plainly and persuasively to the church's benefit and edification, is much more acceptable to God, profitable to man, and comfortable to ourselves, than to speak with the tongue of men and angels in a language not understood, or not heard.

7 And even things without life giving sound, whether pipe or harp, except they have a distinction in the sounds, how shall it be known what is piped or harped? 8 For if the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself for the battle? 9 So likewise ye, except ye utter by the tongue words easy to be understood, how shall it be known what is spoken? For ye shall speak into the air.

Our apostle here proceeds to illustrate his former arguments, by a similitude taken from musical instruments; the one used in peace, to wit, the harp; the other in war, to wit, the trumpet; as they are useless, if by distinction their signification is not perceived; for if a man hears not, or understands not the sound of the harp or trumpet, he cannot prepare himself either for the harp or trumpet, he so if persons in the church do not speak intelligibly, they will nothing edify; it is like beating the air, all in vain, and to no purpose.

20 There are, it may be, so many kinds of voices in the world, and none of them is without signification. 11 Therefore if I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian; and he that speaketh shall be a barbarian unto me. 12 Even so ye forasmuch as ye are zealous of spiritual gifts, seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church.

Here the apostle tells them that there may probably be as many voices or languages in the world, as there are nations: and every nation understands its own language, and commonly no other: Now, says the apostle; if he that has the gift of tongues, speak to you in a language which ye understand not, will he not be a barbarian unto you? And if you talk to him in a language he understands not, will you not be barbarians unto him? Verily, it will be just as if two men of two different countries should talk to one another, and neither understand a word of each other. He farther adds, that seeing they were so very desirous of the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, they should seek those gifts especially, by which the church may receive edification and advantage: Seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church. Here note, 1. The noble end which St. Paul directs them to propound in what they desire and design, namely, The edification of the church. The church's edification should be the scope of all her members, especially of all her ministers withes and prayers, enterprizes, and endeavours: Our first care should be, to lay a right foundation, namely; the doctrine of redemption and salvation, by the meritorious undertaking of Christ Jesus our Lord, the eternal Son of the Father: Our next care, that our superstructure be answerable to our foundation; this being solid and substantial, that must be so too; acquainting persons with the whole will of God, and the whole duty of man. 2. The operation to be performed, and the means to be used, in order to this noble end: Seek that ye may excel: that is, passionately desire and endeavour that you may, by the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit be eminently qualified for edifying and building the church of God: Seek that ye may excel to the edification of the church. Learn hence, 1. That the edifying of the church, and the improvement of its members in knowledge, faith and holiness, is, and ought to be, the great end which the ministers of God propound to themselves in the use of their gifts, and discharge of that office. 2. That the edifying of the church being the proper office of the ministers of Christ, they should study to excel in all gifts and graces conducing thereunto, by such means and methods as are proper for that end; namely, by fervent prayer to God for divine illumination and knowledge, by reading the scriptures with great attention and application of mind, by studying other authors in order to that end, by deep meditation, by judicious, zealous, and laborious preaching, but especially by holy living. There ought to be a consecration of our lives as well as of our persons, to the service of God and his church; in this manner, especially the meanest of her ministers may seek that they may excel, to the edification of the church.

13 Wherefore let him that speaketh in an unknown tongue, pray that he may interpret. 14 For if I pray in

in an unknown tongue, my spirit prayeth but my understanding is unfruitful. 15 What is it then? I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also: I will sing with the Spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also.

*Note here, How strongly the apostle pleads the necessity for all public worship, particularly preaching or prophesying praying and singing, to be performed in a language known and understood by all the congregation: Let him that speaketh, preacheth, or teacheth, in an unknown tongue in which he cannot edify others, pray for the edifying gift of interpretation, that others may be edified as well as himself; otherwise, when we pray in an unknown tongue, our spirit prayeth, that is, our own gifts are exercised; but our understanding is unfruitful, that is, unto others: If we satisfy ourselves we cannot edify them. He resolves therefore to pray with the Spirit, and to sing with the Spirit, that is, with a strange tongue ministered to him by the Spirit; yet to pray with understanding also, that is, to pray so as others may understand him, and join with him, and be edified by him. Learn from hence, Both the impiety and absurdity of the church of Rome, in appointing their public offices to be performed in Latin; a language which the common people in France, Spain, Germany, yea, in Italy itself, do not understand; for the Latin tongue is not now the mother-tongue of any nation under heaven: And the council of Trent thunders out an anathema against those that say, the mass ought to be celebrated only in the vulgar tongue. Lord! what is, if this be not, to offer the sacrifice of fools? How can this be a reasonable service, which is no better than a sinful taking God's name in vain? How can their hearts and tongues go along together, who understand nothing which their tongues utter? They neither know the God they pray to, nor yet the mercies which they pray for. Lord, pity the miserable souls in their communion, who erect an altar, and offer up unknown prayers, to an unknown God.*

26 Else when thou shalt bless with the spirit, how shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned; say Amen at thy giving of thanks, seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest? 27 For thou verily givest thanks well, but the other is not edified. 18. I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than ye all. 19 Yet in the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue.

Our apostle still goes on, arguing, that public prayers ought to be made in a language understood by them that pray. His argument is this, The heart ought to consent to and agree with the supplications and prayers presented unto God, and to testify its consent by saying, Amen; but, says the apostle, no man can say Amen, to that which he doth not understand, nor be edified by that which cannot be understood. For at close, he tells them, That Almighty God had given him the gift of speaking more languages than all of them put together, that so as an apostle, he might plant and propagate the Christian faith in and throughout all nations; yet he declares he had rather speak a few words to the instruction and edification of his hearers, than a multitude in a language not understood: The faithful ministers of Christ have such a regard to the end of their ministry, which is the communicating of divine knowledge to the understandings of their people, that they had much rather they should be edified and profited, than their own parts and gifts applauded and admired.

As if the apostle had said, My brethren, be not like children in understanding who prefer gay and gaudy things which make a fine shew, as the gift of tongues does, before things more useful. Thus, do not you chuse what best pleaseth you, but what most profits others. I would have you indeed, in some respects, to be as children, namely, in innocency and harmlessness, in freedom from malice, and all kind of wickedness: but in understanding be and act as men, as persons of mature judgment, who know what is fittest to be spoken and best to be done. To be like children in the innocency of our actions is a virtue, but to be like them in the impotency and weakness of our understandings is a reproach: In understanding be men.

21 In the law it is written; With men of other tongues and other lips will I speak unto this people and yet for all that they will not hear me, saith the Lord. 22 Wherefore tongues are for a sign not to them that believe, but to them that believe not: but prophesying serveth not for them that believe not, but for them which believe.

Note here, How our apostle, to take the Corinthians off from their fond admiration of the gift of tongues, tells them That in the law, that is, in the writings of the Old Testament, particularly in Isa. xxviii. 11. it is declared, That because the people of Judah would not be instructed by the plain preaching of the Lord's prophets, therefore he would cause them to be spoken to in an unknown language; namely, by outlandish enemies and armies, whose language they should not understand: From whence he infers that strange tongues were not given for a sign of any good to believers, but they were given as a token rather of God's displeasure to unbelievers; inasmuch, that by the just judgment of God, their ignorance by this means would be the more increased; but the gift of prophecy serveth not only for the conversion of unbelievers, but for the edification of believers also; therefore prophecy or preaching intelligibly is to be preferred in the church before speaking with tongues

29 If therefore the whole church be come together into one place, and all speak with tongues, and there come in those that are unlearned, or unbelievers, will they not say ye are mad? 23 But if all prophesy, and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged:

judged of all. 25 And thus are the secrets of his heart made manifest; and so falling down on his face, he will worship God, and report that God is in you of a truth.

To convince the Corinthians that prophesy was more excellent than the gift of tongues, the apostle here argues from the absurdity of speaking in the congregation with a strange tongue uninterpreted; Will they not say ye are mad? And from the utility and advantage of speaking in a language understood, it convinceth and converteth sinners; He is convinced of all, he is judged of all: As if the apostle had said, When the church meets together, if all that speak should speak in a strange tongue, what will an ignorant or unbelieving person coming into the congregation think or say? Will he not apprehend you to be mad-men? Whereas, if all that speak do prophecy and interpret scripture to the edification of the church, in such a case, if an unbeliever comes in, he is convinced, discovered, judged by all them that prophesy, and the secrets of his heart are made manifest to himself; and so falling down, he will adore God, the searcher of the heart, and report from his own experience that God is in or among you of a truth. Where note, Whence prophesying or preaching of the word has its convincing power, and converting efficacy, namely, from that God who is present in and with his own word; God is in, or with, you of a truth. When Almighty God quickens the word with his own Spirit, and clothes it with his own power, when he bids it go in his might, and prevail in his strength, the strongell holds of ignorance and unbelief of obstinacy and rebellion, fall to the ground like the first ripe figs shaken with the wind; when the unlearned or idiot comes into the assembly of the saints, He is convinced of all he is judged of all, he falls down and worships. What is it that works this sudden change? Not the preaching of men, but the power of God: He will report that God is in you of a truth: The arm of grace in the ministry of the word is victorious and invincible: The efficacy and success of the word depends not on the parts of a man, but the power of God.

26 How is it then, brethren? when ye come together, every one of you hath a psalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation. Let all things be done to edifying.

From this verse to the end of the chapter, the apostle lays down particular precepts for the preservation of decency and good order in the house of God; and first, he advises, when they came together into the public assemblies, that if any of them had a psalm or hymn suggested to them by the Spirit of God, to his glory, and the church's edification, or had a doctrine, either for instruction or consolation, or had a strange tongue, or the gift of interpreting tongues, let it be how it will, he exhorts that all be done so as may most and best tend to the benefit and edification of the church, which is the true end of church assemblies. The great end, design and aim, which those who administer in holy things ought to propound to themselves in all their public administrations, is the church's edification, the people's growth, and improvement in knowledge, faith, and holiness: Let all things be done to edification; that is, let all your public offices be so performed, and in such a manner, as may best conduce to the end for which they were designed.

17 If any man speak in an unknown tongue, let it be by two or at most by three, and that by course; and let one interpret. 18 But if there be no interpreter, let him keep silence in the church; and let him speak to himself and to God. 19 Let the prophets speak two or three, and let the other judge; 20 If any thing be revealed to another that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace. 21 For ye may all prophesy one by one, and that all may learn, and all may be comforted. 22 And the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets. 23 For God is not the author of confusion, but of peace, as in all churches of the saints.

Our apostle's next advice for the church's edification, is this, That such as had the gift of tongues should not speak all together, but two or three successively one after another; and that one interpret what was so spoken, to the benefit and edifying of the church. But if there were no interpreter present, let him, says the apostle, that only speaks with tongues keep silence in the church; and let him only speak mentally to himself, and to God in prayer and thanksgiving. The same advice he gives to them that prophesied; to wit, that only two or three of them should prophesy successively, in order to the church's edification, and that the rest of the prophets should sit still and judge, examining their doctrine by the rule of the word: For says he, the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets; that is, the doctrines which the prophets deliver, are apt to be judged and examined by other prophets, whether they be agreeable to the word of God or not; or the instinct by which the prophets pretend to be moved at that time to prophesy, is subject to the judgment and censure of other prophets, who are endowed with the same gift. And thus he declares, that all the prophets, and prophetically inspired, may prophesy, provided it be done orderly and successively, without occasioning disorder and confusion in the church, and so managed, as to answer the great end of the institution; namely, the instruction, edification and consolation of the church. For God is not the author of confusion, but of peace: Confusion is so far from being of divine inspiration, that it is hateful to God, who requires that peace and order should be kept and maintained, not only in the church of Corinth, but in all the churches of the saints. That which breaks order, breaks peace; for there can be no true peace without order; and God is not the author of disorder and confusion in the churches, but of peace. Here, by the way, let us observe and note, that speaking and preaching in the public assemblies is limited all along by the apostle to the prophets: Let the prophets speak; not the common people, they were to sit by, it was no part of their business to speak, but to examine what was spoken, by the rule of the word. The authoritative preaching of the gifted brethren, at the call of a private congregation, was no more permitted by St. Paul, than his suffering of women to speak in the church: None but prophets, or persons in office office appointed for the work of preaching, were ever suffered to undertake it in the primitive times, and downwards, till very lately. Let such as first gave, and still give, encouragement to the contrary, consider how they will answer it at the bar of God, who is not the author of such confusion and disorder, but of peace.

34 Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. 35 And if they will learn any thing, let them ask their husbands at home: for it is a shame for women to speak in the church.

A farther rule is here given by the apostle for maintaining decency and order in the public assemblies; namely, that the women should never presume to speak or utter any thing as public teachers in the congregation; no, nor so much as ask any question publicly: Almighty God having, by his law, made subjection (not public instruction) their duty, of which silence is a token. Here note, That it is not the women's speaking in the public assemblies, when they join with the congregation in singing of psalms and prayer, but their speaking by way of teaching and prophesying, that is here forbidden. Note farther, That the means of instruction were not denied the women; at home they might put forth questions to their husbands for their own information and satisfaction; but to do any thing like this publicly, was a shame, or indecent thing, both to the church, the husband and herself. Still observe, How the God of order calls for order, and delights in decency, especially in places where his religious worship is celebrated. He has unworthy thoughts of God, that thinks him either a patron of, or pleased with, any disorder, either in civil affairs, or religious services.

36 What? came the word of God out from you? or came it unto you only? 37 If any man think himself to be a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord. 38 But if any man be ignorant, let him be ignorant.

These words are looked upon by interpreters as a smart reflection upon some of the ministers and members of the church of Corinth; who, from a high opinion which they had of themselves and their own management, would not submit to the foregoing precepts, canons and rules, for order and decency in the church of God. What, says the apostle, do you think that you have all the word and will of God? Doth all knowledge of scripture, and resolution of doubts rest in your breasts, and flow out of your lips? Consider, you are not the first church that was planted (Jerusalem is before you) the gospel was sent to you, it did not come out first from you. Whence learn, That all kind of scorn is not always uncomely: men are apt to over-rate themselves and to overvalue their own abilities, as if they had engrossed all knowledge, that all must borrow from their store, and light their candle at the torch. Now in that case, we may, without breach of charity, or blemish of holiness, check pride with derision; and speak them below men, who set up themselves above men. Observe next, The apostle assures, That these rules for order and decency which he had given them, were from the Lord; and he expected and required, that those who esteemed themselves prophets, should observe and obey them as such: But if men will be ignorant, and obstinate in their ignorance, be it at their peril, and let them look to it, do not you regard them: If any be ignorant, let him be ignorant.

39 Wherefore, brethren, covet to prophesy, and forbid not to speak with tongues. 40 Let all things be done decently in order.

For the close of the whole, he exhorts them earnestly to endeavour after the gift of prophesying, and not to forbid the use of the gift of tongues, provided the forementioned rules and directions before given be observed; that so in their public assemblies all things relating to religious worship be performed with that becoming gravity and decency which may most and best conduce to the glory of God, and the church's edification. Learn hence, 1. That the whole church in general, and every individual member of it in particular, ought to perform all the duties of God's worship in a decent and orderly manner. 2. That it is the duty of church governors to take care that order and decency be enjoined and observed in the church of God, to the edification of all the members of it. 3. That they only have authority to make church-orders, whom the Lord has made church-governors. 4. That such orders as relate to real decency in the worship of God, made and confirmed by the governors of the church, ought to be obeyed and conformed to by the members of the church, for conscience sake, that all things may be done decently in order.

CHAP. XV.

The design of the apostle in this chapter, is to establish the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, which some in the church of Corinth at that time denied.

MOREOVER, brethren, I declare unto you the gospel which I preached unto you, which also ye have received, and wherein ye stand; 2 By which also ye are saved, if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you, unless ye have believed in vain.

Note here, 1. The subject-matter of St. Paul's preaching to the Corinthians, it was the gospel; I declare unto you the gospel which I preached; and particularly the doctrine of the body's resurrection, which was a great point of that gospel which he had preached and delivered to them. 2. The obedience which many, if not most of the Corinthians had given to the doctrine of the gospel; they heard it, believed it, and embraced it as the truth of God: which gospel ye received, and wherein ye stand; that is, the best and greatest part of you are firm to your former profession, though some are fallen away. 3. The blessed effect which the gospel had upon those who did believe and receive it: By which they were saved; that is, put into a salvable state, Brought brought into the right and only way that leads to salvation. The gospel reveals the object, salvation; it directs lost man which way to arrive at it, allures him it is attainable, and inclines and encourages him seriously to endeavour after the attainment of it. 4. The condition annexed and required on our part, in order to the obtaining that salvation which the gospel discovers unto us, and that is perseverance; for that is implied in our keeping in memory what we have received: Ye are saved if ye keep in memory. If we do not stedfastly cleave to the gospel, and to this grand doctrine of it, the resurrection, our hearing is vain, our believing is vain, our hopes of salvation are vain: By the gospel we are saved, if we keep it in memory, and practise it; otherwise we have believed in vain.

3 ¶ For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures; 4 And that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day according to the scriptures: 5 And that he was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve. 6 After that he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once: of whom the greater part remain unto this present, but some are fallen asleep. 7 After that he was seen of James: then of all the apostles.

Observe here, The apostle's fidelity, 1. In delivering nothing to the church but what he had received: I delivered to you first of all that which I also received: either mediately by Ananias, or by immediate revelation from Christ himself. 2. The principal and fundamental doctrines or articles of faith, which the apostle in his preaching had insisted upon amongst them, namely, the death, the burial, and the resurrection of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. That he died for our sins: That is, a voluntary sacrifice for our sins, to make an atonement for sin, as the prophets Isaiah and Daniel had long foretold. And that he was buried: The dead body of our blessed Redeemer was decently buried by a small number of his own disciples, and continued in the state of the dead, and under the power of death, for a time. That he was buried is a demonstration of the certainty that he died. And that he rose again the third day, according to the scriptures: Christ, though laid, was not left in the grave, but, by the omnipotent power of his Godhead, revived, and rose again from the dead the third day, to the consternation of his enemies, and the consolation of all believers. 3. How the apostle proves the truth and verity of Christ's resurrection, by ocular demonstration: He is risen, because he was seen alive after his passion; first of Peter, next of the whole college of apostles, which formerly consisted of twelve; then of five hundred brethren at once in Galilee, whereof some were then alive to testify it; after which he was seen of James, and then of all the apostles. These were all holy persons, who durst not deceive, and who confirmed their testimony with their blood. So that no article of faith, no point of religion is of more confessed truth, and infallible certainty, than this of our Lord's resurrection; and blessed be God it is so, seeing the whole weight of faith, hope, and salvation, depends upon Christ as risen from the dead. Behold how great a weight the scripture hangs upon this nail; thanks be to God, it is a nail fastened in a sure place. Our Lord's resurrection is his church's consolation.

8 And last of all he was seen of me also, as of one born out of due time.

As Christ was seen of St. Paul last of all the apostles, so it is probable he was seen last by him of all persons: We read not of any that saw Christ after St. Stephen, and St. Paul, who here reckons himself among those who were eye-witnesses of the risen Jesus: Last of all he was seen of me also. Note, farther, The great humility of St. Paul, in styling himself an untimely birth, or a person born out of due time. But in what sense doth he mean that he was born out of due time? Ans. (1.) Negatively; not that he was as to spiritual birth born too soon, but rather too late. Alas! he had been too long a proud Pharisee, a formal professor, a fiery persecutor. In this sense, he was no abortive, or born out of due time, but rather born too late than too soon. But positively he calls himself an abortive, or untimely birth, (1.) Because he was the last of the apostles that was called; the rest were called by Christ whilst here on earth. Paul was called by Christ from heaven after his departure from earth to heaven. (2.) Because of the suddenness and violence of his conversion. An abortion is occasioned by some sudden surprize, some strain, or violent motion. St. Paul's conversion was a wonderful, violent conversion, out of the ordinary way and course; he was smitten from his horse to the ground, and lay as one dead in his passage to his new life. (3.) Because abortive children are lesser, weaker, and more imperfect children than those of full growth. As an abortive child is the least of children, so he reckons himself the least of the apostles, and styles himself so in the next verse, when he thus speaks:

9 For I am the least of the apostles, that am not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God. 10 But by the grace of God I am what I am; and his grace which was bestowed upon me was not in vain: but I laboured more abundantly than they all: yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me. 11 Therefore whether it were I or they, so we preach, and so ye believed.

Note here, 1. The profound humility of this great apostle, and how he was in his own thoughts, he calls himself the least of the apostles; nay, not meet or worthy to be called an apostle, because he had persecuted the church of Christ with so much fury and fierceness. Elsewhere he styles himself, less than the least of all saints: Not that any thing can be less than the least; but the original being a double diminutive, his meaning is, that he was as little as could be. O admirable humility! the more we know of God and ourselves, the more humble apprehensions we shall have of ourselves; a good man's thoughts are always lowest of himself; the more holiness any man has, the more humility he has. Humility is a great evidence of our holiness, it being indeed a great part of our holiness. 2. How the apostle ascribes all that he was, wherein he differed from others, to the grace of God: By the grace of God I am

what I am. As we receive our natural being from the power of God, so we derive our spiritual being from the grace of God; if I forbear what is evil, it is from restraining grace; if I follow what is spiritually good, it is from sanctifying grace: Therefore, not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy grace be the praise. Note, 3. The blessed fruit which the grace of God produced in St. Paul; it caused him to labour, (grace is an active principle) to labour abundantly, to labour more abundantly than all the apostles; not more than all of them put together, but more than any one of them that were his fellow apostles, separately considered. Such as receive most grace and favour from God, are holily ambitious to do the utmost services for God. 4. Lest he should seem to be too assuming, and to arrogate any thing to himself, he adds, Yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me. Behold how the apostle ascribes the fruit of all his endeavours to the grace of God, to the influences and assistances of the holy Spirit of grace, exciting him, assisting him, working in him, and with him, and succeeding of him in all his enterprizes and undertakings, for the glory of God, and the good of souls: I laboured, yet not I, but divine grace that went along with me. 5. The inference which the apostle draws from the whole: Therefore, whether it were I, or they, so we preach, and so ye believed; that is, whether it were I, or any other of the apostles, who laboured most in the preaching of the gospel, the doctrine is the same, namely, That Christ died for our sins, arose again, and will raise us. This is the doctrine which the apostles preached, and which you Corinthians believed and received; therefore why should any of you now swagger in the faith, and disbelieve the resurrection of the body, which is a blow made at the root of Christianity? Alas! what have we to carry of our spirits through all the rugged passages and cro's dispensations of this life, but only our hopes in reversion, only our hopes of a glorious resurrection, and blessed immortality?

12 ¶ Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead? 14 But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen. 14 And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain and your faith is also vain. 15 Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God; because we have testified of God that he raised up Christ; whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not. 16 For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised. 17 And if Christ be not raised your faith is vain: ye are yet in your sins. 18 Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished. 19 If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable.

Our apostle having asserted and proved the resurrection of Christ by ocular demonstration, by a plentiful testimony of those who saw him after he was risen; and withal informed them, that this was the doctrine of the gospel which both he and the rest of the apostles had with one consent preached to them, he from hence infers the certainty and necessity of our resurrection. And because some in the church of Corinth were tainted with the wicked opinion of the Sadducees, who said there was no resurrection; therefore to strangle this monstrous opinion amongst the Corinthians in the birth, he shews the absurdity of it in these verses before us. His first argument runs thus: If there be no resurrection of the dead, then Christ the Head is not risen; for if the Head be risen, he will certainly raise up his members. Christ's resurrection is the cause, the pattern and archetype of our's: He did not only raise his body from the grave, but his church with him: For indeed Christ is not perfectly risen, till all his members are risen with him, and raised like him. True it is, that Christ's personal resurrection was perfect when he arose; and it is as true, that all believers arise representatively when Christ arose: But till all believers arose personally, the resurrection of Christ has not received its utmost perfection. His next work is, to prove the certainty of Christ's resurrection, from the manifold absurdities, which would follow upon the denial of it; as, namely, (1.) If Christ be not risen, then the apostle's preaching was vain, and their belief of it was vain also. Our preaching is vain; that is, we who in our preaching have so strongly asserted Christ's resurrection, as an infallible argument of the divinity of his person and doctrine, have taught you a vain and idle dream. And your faith in Christ, as risen from the dead, is no better than a fancy: vain also; seeing the object of it faileth, Christ as risen from the dead. (2.) If Christ be not risen, then we are found false witnesses of God; that is, then St. Paul himself, and the other apostles, had given a false testimony of God to the world, in affirming that God the Father had raised up Christ the Son from the dead; which he did not do, if there be no resurrection of the dead. To be false witnesses for men, is a sin of no common guilt; but to bely God, and to be false witnesses for God, is a sin of an aggravated guilt, which the holy apostles could not be supposed to be guilty of. Again, (3.) If Christ be not raised from the dead, then we are yet in our sins; that is, under the guilt of our sins, and liable to condemnation for our sins: we are not justified and absolved from them, unless Christ has expiated the guilt of them; and this he has not done, if he be not risen, but remains himself under the power of death; for he was raised again for our justification. Farther, (4.) If Christ be not risen, then they which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished; that is, the dead saints in general, and the holy martyrs and sufferers for Christ in particular, who are fallen asleep, are perished utterly, and lost finally, if there be no resurrection; martyrs will then be great losers, and martyrdom great folly. Lastly Then Christians, are of all men most miserable. As if the apostle had said, As those martyrs were errant fools, and perished as such, who laid down their lives for Christ, if they have no hopes of a resurrection, when they shall take them up again; so we Christians that survive, are the wretchedst creatures upon earth who undergo all the sufferings and hardships of this life, and deny ourselves many comforts and advantages which we might enjoy. If after this mortal life we have no hope, who would care to do well, or who would fear to do ill? Were this believed none would live so fleshly and sensual a life as those that do not believe the resurrection of the flesh; and none would be so miserable in this life, as the holy self-denying Christian, had not he an hope after death of a glorious resurrection. Learn hence, That true Christians would be more unhappy than any other men, if their happiness were confined to this life only: We are of all men most miserable. We Christians are more miserable than other mortals; and we apostles and ministers more miserable than other Christians, who, like beacons upon the top of mountains, stand open continually to all storms and tempests raised against us by men and devils.

20 But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept.

Note here, (1.) The resurrection of Christ declared; Now is Christ risen from the dead. (2.) Our resurrection from his, inferred and insured; he arose as the first-fruits of them that slept. The terms of first-fruits is metaphorical, alluding to the ablation of the first-fruits in the Levitical law, Lev. xxiii. 9. These were offered, both as an acknowledgement that the whole crop was God's and as a pledge and assurance of their enjoying the whole crop from God, and as a mean by which the whole crop was consecrated and sanctified to their use. As sure as the whole harvest follows the first-fruits, so shall the saints resurrection follow the resurrection of Christ, as an effect follows its proper cause: For Christ's resurrection is the meritorious cause, the efficient cause, and the exemplary cause of our resurrection; and as it is the cause, so is it the pledge, the earnest, and the full assurance of ours. 3. Christ is called the first-fruits of them that slept; that is, the first-fruits from the dead of them that slept; not as if Christ were absolutely the first that was raised from the dead, for we read of one raised by Elijah, and another by Elisha, and of Lazarus raised by Christ: But these were so raised as to die again; they were not raised to a life of immortality: But now Christ was the first that arose never to die more: the first that arose by his own power, the first that arose to give others a pledge and assurance of their rising after him, and of their rising like unto him: Christ's resurrection is the cause, the pattern, the pledge, the assurance of the believer's resurrection.

21 ¶ For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. 22 For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.

Here note, That our apostle, to prove Christ's resurrection to be the cause of our resurrection, makes a comparison betwixt Adam and Christ, whom he represents as two originals and fountains, the one of death, the other of life: As by Adam's sin all that are partakers of his human nature die a natural death; so all that are partakers of Christ's divine nature, all that are his spiritual seed and offspring, shall be raised and made alive by him; for the expressions, in Adam, and in Christ, to denote a causality in both, the one of death, the other of life; as the death of all mankind came by Adam, so the resurrection of all mankind comes by Christ; the wicked shall be raised by him officio judicis, by the power of Christ as their Lord and Judge; the righteous shall be raised beneficio mediatoris, by virtue of their union with him as their Head.

23 But every man in his own order: Christ the first-fruits, afterward they that are Christ's at his coming. 24 Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. 25 For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet.

Here our apostle answers an objection. Some might say, If Christ's resurrection be the cause of the believer's resurrection, then why did not all believers rise when he arose? The head being risen, why did not all the members rise with him? He answers, No; God had appointed an order which must be observed; and this order was, that Christ should be the first-fruits of the harvest; that he should rise first from the dead, and then that they are Christ's at his coming to judgment will rise after him. And then cometh the end; that is, the end of the world, when Christ will deliver up his kingdom to God the Father. What kingdom? his mediatorial kingdom, which, as mediator he received from his Father; not his natural and essential kingdom, which, as God, he had with his Father from eternity; this shall never be delivered up, for of this his kingdom there shall be no end; but an end of the world, Christ having subdued all his and his church's enemies, and put down all rule, authority, and power, both in the world and in the church, he shall deliver up his mediatorial kingdom to his Father, and reign no longer as Mediator, and as deputed by his Father; but he shall still reign, eternally reign, as God equal with the Father: For his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and his dominion endureth to eternal ages. Here note, That when our apostle is setting forth the order in which the saints shall arise, he says nothing of a first and second resurrection, nothing of a first and second coming of Christ to judgment; one to reign on earth a thousand years, and a second to judge all the world. Mention is here made of a general resurrection, when all the saints shall be raised together, but not a word of some being raised before the rest to reign with Christ a thousand years.

26 The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death.

Note here, 1. What sin has subjected the human nature to, and that is death; sin brought mortality into our natures, and the wages of sin is death. 2. That death is an enemy to humanity, an enemy to the whole race of mankind, both to body and soul, to the righteous and wicked; to the body, by turning that which is the glory of the creation, in a moment, into a rottenness and putrefaction; to the soul, by occasioning its separation from the body, to wards which it has so strong and affectionate an inclination and desire, as its old companion. Death is also an enemy to the righteous, as it blunts the edge of his desires after heaven, and abates that joy which he should have in the believing thoughts and apprehensions of heaven; and it is an enemy to the wicked, as it is a passage to everlasting misery, by their falling immediately into the hands of the living God, from whose mouth they receive a final sentence to depart accursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. 3. That this enemy is the last enemy: It is so to the children of God; when they have overcome overcome death, they have overcome all their enemies at once; and especially their worst enemy, sin, which they could never overcome before fully. Blessed be God, though death came into the world by sin, yet sin shall go out of the world by death. Note, 4. This last enemy shall be destroyed, by losing its sting that it cannot annoy, by losing its terror that it cannot amaze, by losing its power that it cannot destroy; and by losing its very being, it shall be finally abolished and destroyed by a resurrection from the dead. Note, 5. The destroyer of death, this last enemy, is Christ, Hosea xiii. 14. I will ransom them from the power of the grave, I will redeem them from death. Christ has conquered death meritoriously by his sanctification, victoriously by his resurrection. 6. The scope and drift of the apostle's argument in this assertion, and that is, to prove the necessity of his resurrection; the argument lies thus, Christ must reign till all his enemies are destroyed, but death is one of these enemies, the last of them which keeps the believer's body from union with his soul, and from communion with Christ, therefore death must be destroyed; and there is no other way to destroy death but by a resurrection from the dead, which is the truth our apostle strongly proves through this chapter.

27 For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted which did put all things under him. 28 And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him; that God may be all in all.

Our apostle here proceeds in the argument which he begun at the 24th and 25th verses, that Christ must continue as Mediator to reign till all things are subject to him, and all enemies subdued by him: This the apostle here proves, because God the Father has put all things, and all persons, under his Son's feet, as Mediator, himself only excepted; God the Father having reserved to himself his own sovereign empire, and supreme authority; he being excepted from this subjection himself, who gave it to his Son. And when all things shall be thus subdued to Christ, then his mediatorial kingdom shall be delivered up to his Father from whom he did receive it; yea, the Son himself, as Mediator and head of the church, shall be subject to the Deity, that God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, may be all in all, by a full communication to, and intimate union with the saints. Learn hence, 1. That the mediatorial kingdom of Christ was given to him by God the Father, as a reward for his sufferings, Phil. ii. 8, 9. He became obedient to the death, wherefore God hath highly exalted him. 2. That this mediatorial kingdom was given to Christ only according to his human nature; seeing the human nature only suffered, and the divine nature is capable of no such exaltation or new dominion, he was thus exalted, Because he was the Son of man, John v. 27. Learn, 3. That during the continuance of the mediatorial kingdom of Christ the Father judges no man, but commits all judgment unto his Son, giving him full power and authority to punish and reward according to his own wisdom, will, and pleasure; and, as Lord of all, he gives laws to all. 4. That this mediatorial kingdom, Christ shall certainly lay down; when all things are subdued unto him, the exercise of his kingly power shall cease then; and as Christ is now all in all with relation to his church, the Godhead then will be all in all; and Christ himself, as man, will be subject to his Father, as well as saints and angels are subject to him. From those words, God shall be all in all, we learn, That all the saints shall be abundantly satisfied in heaven, with the fruition of the Deity alone; there is enough to God alone eternally to fill and satisfy all the blessed souls in heaven, without the addition of any creature comfort. God is complete satisfaction to his children in the absence (I must not say want) of all other enjoyments: we shall want none of them at our journey's end, for there God will be all in all; as in heaven we shall see God, so we shall there eye nothing but God.

29 Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if they die rise not at all? Why are they then baptized for the dead?

Expositors do vary exceedingly in the sense and interpretation of this difficult text; some understand it of a sacramental, some of a funeral, and some of a metaphorical baptism or washing. Those who understand it of a sacramental baptizing, say, That the baptized for the dead, are those who are baptized upon the article of the resurrection of the dead, and consequently in hope of the resurrection: As if the apostle had said, As for those among you in the church of Corinth, who are baptized persons, and yet deny the resurrection of the dead, I would demand of them why they have in their baptism made a profession of believing the article of the resurrection? Why were they baptized in this faith if they now renounce it? To be a baptized Christian, and yet deny the resurrection, is a flat and plain contradiction. Others understand it of a funeral washing of the dead corpse, in order to burial; and they say this was done in the belief and expectation of the dead body's rising again. As if he had said, If the dead corpse shall never rise more, to what purpose do you wash them? Do men give respect where there is no hope? Others will have a metaphorical and allegorical baptism here intended, namely, afflictions, persecutions, and martyrdom: As if he had said, If there be no resurrection of the dead, what benefit will accrue to those that suffer persecution and death, itself, for professing and defending the resurrection of some that are dead, namely, Christ Jesus, whose resurrection is past; and of the saints, whose resurrection is to come? Some, last of all, render the words thus: Moreover, what shall they do that are baptized, for the sake of the dead? If the dead are not raised at all, why are they therefore baptized for the sake of the dead? As if the apostle had said, What shall they do which are baptized for the sake of the holy saints and martyrs deceased? Is it not by reason of them that they take up the profession of Christianity? Yes surely, the sight of the holiness of their lives, and of their courage and constancy at their deaths, has stirred up many to espouse the same holy religion, and to admit themselves into it, by the sacrament of baptism. The death of an eminent saint made a great number of disciples in those days, and the blood of an holy martyr baptized whole cities: Now, to what purpose is all this, If the dead rise not at all.

30 And why stand we in jeopardy every hour?
31 I protest by your rejoicing which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord, I die daily.

Our apostle is still arguing for the belief of the resurrection of the dead, and seems to speak here after this manner: What folly would it be in Christians, to chuse a religion that exposes us continually to death and danger? Why should we run the hazard of the loss of estate, liberty, and life itself, if there be no resurrection in order to a retribution when our courage and constancy for Christ and his holy religion shall be acknowledged and rewarded? Why stand we in jeopardy every hour? Intimating, that it would be the greatest folly and madness, to suffer the worst of evils, for the sake of Christianity, if all our hopes perish in the grave. He adds farther, That as to himself, he died daily; that is, was continually exposed to death, in danger of it, in expectation of it, and in a preparation for it; which he would never have been, if he had not an expectation of a glorious resurrection, when all his sufferings and services should be rewarded. And to confirm the truth of what he said, he binds it with a solemn protestation, I protest by your rejoicing, which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord, I die daily; that is, either I protest by all that joy which I have in your conversion to Christianity, and by all that rejoicing which is found with me for the success of my ministry among you; or else I protest by all that rejoicing which I have in common with you and all Christians under the heavieſt sufferings for the sake of Christ Jesus our Lord, that I live continually a dying life, perpetually in expectation of death, and preparation for it.

32 If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not? Let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die.

The apostle had mentioned his sufferings in general in the former verses, to testify his belief and hope of a future resurrection. Here he relates one particular kind and manner of suffering; namely, his fighting with beasts at Ephesus: To what purpose he had that mighty struggle there, and ran such a hazard of his life as that was, if he had no hope of a better life after this, no expectation of a blessed resurrection? If I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, &c. A twofold interpretation is given of these words: Some understand them literally and properly, that he did really combat with wild beasts; it being usual in those times of persecution, under Heathenish powers, to cast Christians to wild beasts: the common cry then was, Christians ad leones; Away with the Christians to the lions. But some object against this interpretation, That the apostle being a freeman of Rome, had no such indignity offered to him; that in the acts of the apostles, St. Luke gives no relation of it; and that the apostle himself, in the catalogue he gives of his sufferings, 2 Cor. xi. makes no mention of it, unless it be comprehended under those general words, In deſertis eſten. Others therefore understand the words in a metaphorical sense, I have fought with beasts; that is, with savage men, with men like beasts in their manners and conditions. And thus some refer this conflict to Acts xix. where we read of his contell with Demetrius, and the silver-smiths, about Diana's temple at Ephesus. Others refer it to Acts xiv. when he was stoned at Lystra, and left for dead. But whether we understand it literally or figuratively, the force of the argument lies thus: If I have undergone such deaths and dangers at Ephesus as I have done; and exposed my life to the utmost hazard, in hopes of an happy resurrection, what profit is all this to me, if there be no resurrection? what got I by such hazards and hardships, if there be no life to come? Nay, if matters be so, it is more reasonable to say, Let us eat and drink for to-morrow we die. Verily then, sensual fools are the wisest men; and they have the best of it, that gratify their appetites and brutish desires expecting they shall shortly die, and there will be an end of them. Learn hence, 1. That faith in the resurrection to a future life, encourages us against all the troubles and afflictions of this present life; the hope of future good, is a powerful support under the pressure and burden of present evil. 2. That upon supposition that there is no happiness beyond the grave, a life of sensual pleasure is not absurd: The epicure's song (Ecce, bibere, ludere, post mortem nulla voluptas; Eat, drink, and play, while it is day, for after death no man shall breathe) seems not unreasonable.

33 Be not deceived, Evil communications corrupt good manners. 34 Awake to righteousness, and sin not. For some have not the knowledge of God: I speak this to your shame.

Here the apostle advises them to take heed of being corrupted in their manners by such wicked principles epicures would be ready to insinuate into them. All words draw persons on to ill deeds; therefore, says he, look to your communication and discourse, take heed of debauching your morals by evil communications; and he backs this exhortation with a forcible motive, because that such sensual principles and lewd opinions shew that men's consciences and reason are in a deep sleep, and that a foolish stupidity has benumbed them: So much is implied in the next words, Awake to righteousness, and sin not. Here note, 1. That sin is frequently in scripture compared to sleep, and very fitly, because sinners apprehend things no better than men asleep; all their apprehensions of God and Christ, or heaven and hell, of eternity and a life to come, are slight and hovering notions, wild and uncertain guesses; and the most substantial realities are with them but mere fancies. Again, he that is asleep, is void of all care and fear, full of forgetfulness, unapprehensive of dangers; such is the sinner, whilst he continues asleep in sin, secure, but not safe. 2. That repentance is the soul's awaking out of the sleep of sin: The soul rouses up, apprehends, and considers its danger, whilst there is a possibility to escape it, and accordingly, by repentance flies from the wrath to come. 3. That it is not enough that we awake from sin, but we must awake to righteousness; we must not only eschew evil, but do good; for a negative holiness saves none; the positive fruits of holiness towards God, and righteousness towards our neighbour, must be brought forth by us, and the duties of both tables be observed of us, this will be an argument of our sincerity, and an ornament to our profession: The want of this, the apostle tells the Corinthians here, argued them not to have the true knowledge of God, which was really matter of shame to them, considering the means and advantages enjoyed by them: Some have not the knowledge of God, I speak this to your shame.

35 ¶ But some man will say, How are the dead raised up; and with what body do they come? 36 Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die. 37 And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance, of wheat, or some other grain. 38 But God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body.

Our apostle having fully proved the doctrine of the resurrection to the body, in the foregoing part of the chapter comes next to answer the objections that might be made against the body's resurrection. And, first, That it seems impossible that the dead should rise: To this he answers, That it is, as possible for the dead to rise, as it is for corn sown in the earth to be quickened after it dies in the earth; corn sown rots and dies, yet doth not perish by dying, but rises up green and fresh. Thus, the body sown in the grave is not lost; though the parts of the body by death are dissolved, yet they are not annihilated; they are scattered but they are not perished: They lose not their entity, when they part with their relation to humanity; whatsoever we lose at death, is not lost to God; his knowledge is infinite, and his power unlimited; it is as easy for God to raise our bodies out of the dust, as to make them at first out of nothing: Therefore, Christ told the Pharisees, who denied the resurrection, that they erred, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God, Matt. xxii. 29. The next objection against the body's resurrection, is this: Will, say the objectors, can describe with what bodies the dead shall arise? Our apostle's answer is to this effect, That our bodies shall arise the same in substance, though not in qualities; as corn sown is raised in substance, and kind the same, but divers in qualities, coming up with blade and ear, and corn in it, it does not rise in the same figure in which it was sown, but it arises in the same nature in which it was sown: That which was sown wheat, arises wheat. Thus our bodies sown in the grave, shall arise substantially the same, but in different qualities. Here note, That those who did not believe the resurrection of the body, judged it not only an impossible thing, but an unworthy thing, for God to raise the dead; they looked upon the body as the sepulchre and prison of the soul, and accounted it the soul's chiefest happiness to be delivered from the body, esteeming it a real punishment to the soul to be again reunited to so great a clog as the body is. Therefore to this objection the apostle returns a satisfactory answer, by shewing the happy change which shall pass upon the raised body; declaring, That though it shall arise the same body in substance, yet vastly different in qualities; of a mortal body sown, it shall rise a spiritual body; of a vile body, be made a glorious body.

one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds. 40 There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial; but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another. 41 There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory. 42 So also is the resurrection of the dead.—

St. Paul here proceeds farther to answer the question which the philosophers at Corinth put, namely, With what bodies do persons come forth out of the grave? He tells them, they shall be vastly different in qualities from what they are at present; and this he illustrates by a similitude. As, says he, there is a difference in bodies here below, some more excellent, as the flesh of men, others less excellent, as the flesh of beasts and birds, and as there is a difference between celestial and terrestrial bodies, yea, a difference between celestial bodies among themselves, one excelling another in glory, as the sun excels the moon, and one star excels another; so will it be in the resurrection, the bodies that rise will vastly differ from those that died. Here note, That all this is to be understood of the resurrection of the righteous, since it is their bodies alone that shall undergo this happy change, which in the next words the apostle describes.

—It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption: 43 It is sown in dishonour, it is raised in glory: It is sown in weakness, it is raised in power: 44 It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body.—

Here the apostle gives a fourfold instance of the body's differing qualities in the resurrection, It is sown in corruption, that is, it is here a frail, mortal body, subject to putrefaction, but when raised, shall be incorruptible, that is, never more subject to death or dissolution. It is here a vile body, subject to deformity and dishonour, and when sown or laid in the grave, is loathsome and unlovely; but shall be raised in glory, a bright and beautiful body, shining like the sun in the firmament of the heavens. It is thought we shall rise in full and perfect age, in full strength, activity and vigour; and whereas our bodies now move heavily, they shall then ascend and descend like angels. Again, It is sown in weakness; that is, it is subject to weakness by labour, to decays by age, to impotency and waitings by diseases; and when it dies, it appears an impotent piece of clay. But it shall be raised in power; by God's power, it shall be raised a powerful body; no more impotent, weak, or feeble; but strong and active, vigorous and nimble; never subject more either to weariness or weakness. Lastly, It is sown a natural body, an animal body, a body suited to this lower sensible state, in which we live at present; and when it dies, it is sown in the grave, like the body of a beast. But it shall be raised a spiritual body. Mark, He doth not say it shall be changed into a spirit, but into a spiritual body; a body it shall remain still, but spiritualized. It is probable that our bodies will then be aerial and thin and light,

33 All flesh is not the same flesh: but there is light, more suited to the nature of the soul, as active as fire, as fine and thin as the air. More particularly, note here, That the raised body will be a spiritual body in a threefold respect. (1.) As it shall always be subject and serviceable to the spirit. Here the soul is subject to the body: the soul must go the body's pace; but at the resurrection the body shall be everlastingly subject to the soul or spirit, and for that reason is called a spiritual body. (2.) It may be called a spiritual body in regard of the great strength and activity with which the body shall be then endowed; spirits are strong, and so is every thing that is spiritual. The devil is called a spiritual enemy, because he is a powerful enemy. Thus our spiritual bodies will be strong bodies; and strong had they need to be, that they may be able to bear that exceeding weight of glory, as the apostle calls it, 2 Cor. iv. 17. which would crush our bodies under it, were they not made strong to bear it. (3.) It is called spiritual, because it will then need no natural help to support it, as meat, drink, sleep and clothing. We shall want these no more than the angels want them, being immediately supported by the power of God, as they are. Thus it is sown a natural body, but raised a spiritual body; not attenuated into a spirit, but still a body; a real, but spiritual body. The body after the resurrection shall be true flesh, but spiritualized, rarified, and refined; it shall not lose any perfections which it had, but gain many perfections which it had not. Hail, happy day, when soul and body shall be re-united, and the happiness of both completed! How will the soul then bless God for that body which was here its instrument and assistant in the service of God! And how will the body then bless God for such a soul, which was so careful to secure an interest in that happiness which it was created for, and made capable of! Then will full glory be poured into the soul; and when it is a second time married to the body, it shall have a greater degree of glory than ever it had.

—There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body. 45 And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul, the last Adam was made a quickening spirit. 46 Howbeit that was not first which was spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual. 47 The first man is of the earth earthly: the second man is the Lord from heaven. 48 As is the earthly: such are they that are earthly: and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly. 49 And as we have born the image of the earthly, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly.

Note here, 1. Our apostle draws a parallel between the two Adams, the first man and Christ; they were two roots and distinct fountains, from whence all life did spring and flow; all natural life from the first Adam, all spiritual life from Christ the second Adam: The first Adam was made a living soul, the last Adam was made a quickening spirit. 2. The apostle compares the animal life we live by the union of our souls and bodies, with the spiritual life we live by the union of our souls with Christ. In point of dignity and real excellency, the spiritual life is far before the natural; but in point of priority the natural life is before the spiritual: First that which is natural, and afterwards that which is spiritual. 3. What the pedigree and original of man was and is: He is of the earth earthly. Earth is the original of man, the matter out of which his form was produced. Hence the earth is called his earth, Ps. cxlvi. 4. His breath goes forth; and he returneth to his earth. 4. As believers have born in their bodies here on earth the image of the first Adam, so in the resurrection their bodies shall bear the image of the heavenly Adam, that is, he changed into the likeness of Christ's glorious body. This is the highest degree of dignity and honour than an human body is capable of. Those bodies which in their first formation were of dust and clay, and which in their dissolution are no better than a lump of corruption, when the grave delivers them back again, shall be shining and excellent fabrics, bearing the image of Christ the heavenly Adam. Then will the saints bodies be absolutely and everlastingly freed from all natural infirmities, from all accidental deformities, from all wants and necessities; and shall never more be subject to death, that formidable adversary of human nature. O blessed hour! when both soul and body shall live immediately upon God, and act freely and delightfully for God, and be for ever satisfied in the full fruition and final enjoyment of God.

50 Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.

By flesh and blood, here, we are to understand our bodies in their present, natural, corruptible and mortal state. Such flesh and blood as ours is at present, uncharged and unclothed with its heavenly body, cannot inherit the kingdom of God: that is, it cannot possibly enter into heaven, and bear the weight of that glory which will there be put upon it. Corruption, or nature subject to corruption, cannot inherit incorruption; that is our corruptible bodies cannot enter into an incorruptible heaven. Note here, Another argument produced by the apostle, to prove the necessity of the resurrection, or of raising and new moulding the body in a spiritual condition; because our natural body, till it be made spiritual, cannot bear the presence of God in heaven; it must be fitted for that glorious place and state, before it be brought into it; by a change of qualities it must be spiritualized, purified and immortalized, or it can never bear that weight of glory which is prepared for the saints in that glorious kingdom.

51 Behold, I shew you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, 52 In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump. For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed.

Here our apostle answers a third objection: Some might say, What shall become of those who shall be found alive at Christ's coming? He answers they shall not die or sleep, but yet shall undergo a change as well as those that rise from the dead; these shall have flesh and blood changed into into spiritual bodies, as well as they, and of mortal be made immortal, and of corruptible be made incorruptible, and all this in a moment of time. Christ's powerful voice will be like a trumpet, calling men together, and the dead shall be raised and living saints changed into an incorruptible state.

53 For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality.

Observe here, The identical expressions used by the apostle: He doth not say, corruptible must put on incorruption, and mortal must put on immortality, but this corruptible, and this mortal, to shew the identity and sameness of it. I believe the resurrection of this body, said the primitive Christians. Every man at the resurrection shall receive the same body that now he hath, and be the same person that now he is. Though he be not in every consideration what he was, yet shall he be who he was. If the same body that falls be not raised, it is not a resurrection, but a new creation. Indeed it is both unreasonable and unjust, that a person should sin in one body and suffer in another; or serve God in one body and be glorified in another. Job was clear in the belief of this Chap. xix. 26, 27. In my flesh shall I see God, and mine eyes shall behold him. I shall see God, this points out the reality of the resurrection; and with these eyes behold him, this denotes the identity of the resurrection, that the same body shall rise again. The resurrection is not a creation of new bodies, but only a restitution of the old ones.

54 So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory.

55 O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory.

Here observe, 1. The happy condition of believers in the glorious morning of the resurrection, when their corruptible bodies shall be made by the power of Christ incorruptible and immortal: Then shall death be swallowed up in victory; that is, he overcome for ever, never to destroy or hurt any more, or to have the least power over the body for ever. The conqueror of flesh is now fully conquered, and the spoiler of mankind finally spoiled. O death! thou wert once a victorious conqueror, an universal conqueror, slaying not thy thousands and ten thousands only, but beyond number; from the infant to the aged, from the dunghill to the throne, sparing neither age nor sex, neither great nor small, neither sacred nor profane: But the Captain of our salvation having entered into the grave, the territories of death, the king of terrors, has there encountered, disarmed and destroyed this victorious conqueror; death is swallowed up in victory. Some read it, Death is swallowed down, death is drank up at a draught: Christ called his sufferings, by which he obtained victory over death, a cup; and as death is drank up, so mortality is swallowed up, 2 Cor. v. 4. Blessed be God, beyond the grave there is neither death, nor any thing like death, neither death nor mortality. The one is abolished, the other swallowed up of life. Observe, 2. How the apostle, in the name of all believers, triumphs, and holily insults over death, the last conquered enemy. He laughs at it to the very face with a pious scorn and holy derision: O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? As if a man having disarmed his enemy, should say, Now, Sir, where's your sword? where's your pistol? Thus the believer: O death, thou thoughtest to pierce, to pain, to poison us with thy sting; but where is now thy sting? Thou thoughtest thyself a conqueror, but behold thou art conquered. Where is now thy victory? Blessed be God for these songs of victory and triumph, which the Captain of our salvation has put into the mouths of all those that fight under his exalted banner.

56 The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law.

Note here, 1. Death has its sting. A sting has a three-fold property; to pierce, to pain, and to poison: All which were applicable unto death. Death's sting is sin, or death has its sting upon the account of sin. Sin, like a sting, pierces; it pierces us in its guilt, it pierced Christ in its punishment. The soul, which no weapon can reach, sin can wound. As a sting, it paineth as well as pierceth: Judas was so pained with it, that in the height of horror, he hanged himself, in hopes of ease. And as a sting it poisoneth; sin is a deadly poison, pleasant in the mouth, bitter in the belly, baneful in the end. So strong a poison is sin, that nothing could expel it but the blood of Christ. 3. Death comes to a believer without a sting. Behold! Christ became obedient unto death, that he might unstring death. Death shot its sting unto our Saviour's side, there left it, and there lost it: It is not now unto any of his members an hurting, but an healing serpent; there is now no venom, no malignity in it. 4. That as sin is the sting of death, so the strength of sin is the law. Not as if the law did encourage a man to sin, or strengthen him in sinning; for it prohibits sin under the severest penalties, and condemns the sinner to the pit of hell: But the law gives life, or adds strength to sin. (1.) By the curse and irritation of the law: Sin takes occasion by the law, and by the commandment becomes exceeding sinful; when lust finds itself restrained, then like a river that is stopt, it rises and foams, and rebels against the law of the mind, and fetches in all its force to rescue itself from that sword which heweth it in pieces. (2.) By the conviction and manifestation of the law, laying sin open to the conscience of the sinner, and shewing him, that God is all eye, to see, and all fire, to consume, every unclean thing. Thus the law gives sin its strength, and death its warrant to arrest and execute us. Ah, wretched and miserable sinner! upon whom, together with death, the weight of sin and the curse of the law fall together; which woundeth deep, and presseth low, even to the lowest hell, unless thou canst say truly, what the apostle doth triumphantly, in the next verse:

57 But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory.—

Over sin, death and the law.

—Through

— Through our Lord Jesus Christ.

That is, through the death and resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ. Observe here, 1. An enemy encountered, death; death, armed by sin, and strengthened by the law. This is often a surprizing enemy, an amazing enemy, a spoiling and destroying enemy, an inevitable and unavoidable enemy. 2. Victory over this enemy declared; the destruction of death, as to its terror and power: Death is overcome. But how? Non ut ne sit, but ut non esset; not that it should not be, but that it should not hurt. Death has lost its sting, that it cannot envenom; it has lost its terror, that it cannot amaze; it has lost its power, that it cannot destroy. 3. The victors or conquerors over this enemy, who are first Christ, and then all that are Christ's, all that harvest of which Christ is the first fruits. 4. The triumph proclaimed, Thanks be to God that giveth us the victory. From the whole learn, That all believers are victorious over death, through our Lord Jesus Christ. They may triumph over death through Christ, because he has disarmed it by his death and satisfaction, he has destroyed it by his resurrection; and Christ's victors became the believers', by participation and communion with him. As they communicate with him in the value of his satisfaction, so they communicate with him in the virtue of his resurrection. Let us therefore triumph with the apostle, and say, Thanks be to God; with the prophet, awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust. Thus victory was won by Christ, it was won by us; it was dear to Christ, it was cheap to us: We overcome, but it is by the blood of the Lamb. Let us therefore, living and dying, say, Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.

53 Therefore my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not vain in the Lord.

Here our apostle concludes this chapter, and closes his discourse on this great subject, the doctrine of the body's resurrection, with an exhortation to duty. Be ye steadfast: that is, in the faith of the gospel in general, and in the belief of this particular article of our Christian faith, the resurrection of the dead. Unmoveable; that is, be not moved by any temptations or tribulations, either from the faith and hope of the gospel, or from the obedience to the gospel. Let not fear of the cross of Christ make you weary of the yoke of Christ: Always abounding in the work of the Lord. Here note, That the more steady and steadfast any man is in the belief of a blessed resurrection, the more forward and zealous, the more active and industrious will he be in the service of the work of God: Forasmuch as your labour shall not be in vain in the Lord: that is, your painfulness in the service of God shall be plentifully recompensed by him at the resurrection of the just. Where note, 1. The nature and quality of the service or work of God declared; it is a labour; the vast circumference of a Christian's duty makes it so; the curious and exact manner in and after which every duty must be performed makes it so: But the greater their labour is on earth, the sweeter will their rest be in heaven. 2. The reward that sweetens this labour;

It shall not be in vain, there is the transcendency of the reward: Forasmuch as ye know, there is the eternity of it. The Christian's services for Christ shall be certainly and transcendently rewarded by Christ in another world. His labour is finite, his reward is infinite. There is no more proportion between a Christian's labour and reward, than betwixt time and eternity. O infinite glory, the reward of our poor labour!

CHAP. XVI.

Our apostle in this concluding chapter of his excellent epistle, gives the Corinthians several useful directions for their performance of some needful duties; and then shuts up the whole with particular salutations to them.

NOW concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even so do ye. 2 Upon the first day of the week, let every one of you lay by him a store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come. 3 And when I come, whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters, them will I send to bring your liberality unto Jerusalem. 4 And if it be meet that I go also, they shall go with me.

The first duty which the apostle here directs the Corinthians to, is the making a collection for the poor; and particularly for them at Jerusalem, who were now in great straits, by reason of a famine which was then and there amongst them, as some expoliters affirm. He advises, that on the Lord's day, every one should lay something by; as God had prospered him, that there might be no need of farther collections when he came: And that the charity might be distributed according to their pious intentions, he tells them, they shall send it by messengers of their own; and that if they judged it meet and needful, he would accompany the bearers of their charity, and assist in the distribution of it. Here note, 1. The great duty which the apostle directs unto, care of, and provision for, the poor saints at Jerusalem. To relieve the poor members of Christ, especially such as suffer for his name's sake, is a necessary, yea, important duty. We evidence our love and affection to the head, by our pity and compassion to the members. The charitable contributions of such churches as are in and under better circumstances, toward those that are in worse, especially if in want, is an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable and well pleasing unto God, Phil. iv. 18. Note, 2. The time when he advises them to make this charitable collection for the poor, Upon the first day of the week, which was the day of their public assemblies, the day upon which our Lord rose again from the dead. Divines, both ancient and modern, do from hence argue for the change of the sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week: It is evident that this was the day on which the Christian churches constantly assembled, to perform their religious worship, and read the scriptures, to preach the word, and celebrate the Lord's supper; and it was called by them the Lord's day. Upon this day the apostle orders the collections to be made for the poor; and all christians, in compliance with this precept, did offer their alms upon that day. Learn hence, That works of charity and mercy, though needful and acceptable every day, yet are the proper duties of the Lord's day, that being a day separated and set apart for sacred works, of which charity is a special part. Add to this, that the day itself doth contain a special motive in it to excite and enlarge our charity, it being the day in which we were begotten to a lively hope, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, of an inheritance incorruptible, and the day upon which we partake of our Lord's precious body and blood. We having therefore received spiritual things so plentifully from Christ, ought to be the more ready to impart of our temporal things to distressed christians. 3. The apostle bidding every one to lay by something of his store for the relief of others, intimates to us, that God has given unto every one of us a special, proper, and personal right to what we do enjoy. To have all things common, would run all things into confusion. The apostle directing the Corinthians here to constant use of their charity every Lord's day; in making collections for the poor, doth suppose that they had something of their own to give. Almighty God doth keep up the eighth commandment in full force and strength, as a fence and hedge about the worldly estates of men; and he that goes about to break this hedge, a serpent shall bite him. If there be no such thing as property, how shall we exercise charity? 4. The rule which St. Paul directs the Corinthians to observe and follow in the distribution of their charity, namely, to lay by in proportion for others, as God had blessed and prospered them. The good which we do, must be proportionable to what we receive. God will not accept of a little, when he has given us an ability to do much; we must always relieve the wants of others as we are able, and sometimes above what we are able. Such as have ability ought to abound in all kinds of charity; they are to add charity to charity, one way of charity to another, and one work of charity to another; otherwise, though they may do a good work, yet they are not in rich in good works; Let every one lay by in store, as God hath prospered him. 5. How desirous the apostle was that the Corinthians should receive all possible satisfaction in the prudent distribution of their collected charity. He proposes to them to chuse messengers of their own to carry their contributions; he offers to give them letters of recommendation to the saints at Jerusalem; nay, if need require, and they desire it, he is ready to go himself upon this charitable errand. So ready are the ministers of God, upon all occasions, to contribute their utmost endeavours to promote the charitable relief of the poor members of Jesus Christ.

5 Now I will come unto you, when I shall pass through Macedonia. For I do pass through Macedonia. 6 And it may be that I will abide, yea, and winter with you, that ye may bring me on my journey whithersoever I go. 7 For I will not see you now by the way; but I trust to tarry a while with you, if the Lord permit. 8 But I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost. 9 For a great door and effectual is opened unto me, and there are many adversaries.

Observe here, St. Paul, acquaints them how he had laid his business, ordered his stay and station where he was, and designed afterwards to come and winter with them, and not to see them in his passage only. From whence we learn, That a wise continuance of our own business, of our course of labour, and of what we design to do, is very lawful, provided it be done with submission to the will of God. The apostle declares what he had in his intentions contrived, whither to go, were to stay, how long to continue; but adds, If the Lord permit. All was with submission to the wisdom and will of God. Farther, he informs them of his present intention to stay at Ephesus till Pentecost, because God had opened there unto him a great door for the propagation of the gospel, and had abundantly blessed his labours to the good of many. But there were many adversaries of the truth there, which made his stay longer at Ephesus both necessary and unavoidable. Learn thence, That the great success of the gospel is usually attended with many adversaries, and great opposition. The devil stirs up all the rage and fury he can against the professors, but especially the preachers of the gospel: But where the devil is most angry, we may hope we have done most good; and that ought to encourage us to stay in our place, though our difficulties are many, and our discouragements great. But I will tarry at Ephesus, &c.

10 ¶ Now if Timotheus come, see that he may be with you without fear: for he worketh the work of the Lord, as I also do. 11 Let no man therefore despise him: but conduct him forth in peace, that he may come unto me: for I look for him with the brethren.

Note here, Though Timothy was a young minister, and St. Paul an aged apostle, yet doth he bespeak the church to pay respect unto him as to himself, he being a minister of the gospel as well as himself, though far inferior to him in years and abilities. None of the faithful ministers of Christ are ambitious to engross all respect upon the people to themselves, but content, yea, desirous, that all their fellow-brethren should share with them therein; for all men pretend to a share in reputation, and do not love to see it monopolized by a single person; and every wise and good man rejoices when that respect is given to others, which is justly due and payable to their own worth and merit. 2. How affectionately this aged apostle recommends Timothy to the church's tender care, as well as to the deserved respect: See that he may be without fear: that is, without fear of disturbance from the factions that were amongst them at Corinth; see that he be not exposed to any trouble or danger from any party whatsoever. Let no man despise him; either because of his youth, or his bodily weaknesses and infirmities, or for any other cause whatsoever. But conduct him forth in peace, bring him on his way towards me, and provide for the necessities of his journey. O! how happy is it when the ministers of Christ are thus careful of, and solicitous for the welfare of each other, as St. Paul here was here for Timothy!

12 As touching our brother Apollos, I greatly desired him to come unto you with the brethren : but his will was not at all to come at this time ; but he will come when he shall have convenient time.

Here again observe, 1. How respectfully this great apostle speaks of Apollos, an inferior minister in the church of Corinth, Our brother Apollos. Nothing better becomes the governors and pastors of the church, than humility and condescension, sincere love and affection, a due deference and regard towards those who are under-labourers in our Lord's vineyard, to own and treat them as brethren, co-workers and fellow-helpers with them. God has not made his ministers lions to tear one another, nor bulls to gore each other ; but shepherds to watch over, and nurses to cherish one another : Our brother Apollos : 2. How St. Paul, though a dignified person, a great apostle, left Apollos, an inferior minister, of the gospel, to judge for himself, whether he had best go to Corinth, or forbear : I desired him to come to you, but his will was not to come : He did not suspend him, or silence him for not obeying the voice of an apostle, but lets him take his choice. There may be, and sometimes are, particular cases and circumstances relating to ourselves and our people, (as about going from them, or continuing with them) which none can adjust and determine so well as ourselves. Perhaps Apollos here had greater and stronger reasons for his refusing, than St. Paul had for his requesting him to go to Corinth : However, the great apostle only desired him to go ; not censuring him for his denial, but leaving him to the determination of himself, whose will was not at all to come to them at that time. 3. What might probably be the reason why Apollos had no inclination to go to Corinth at this time, no, not at the solicitation of St. Paul himself : Perhaps it was because he would not encourage or give the least countenance to a faction which was not there begun under the authority of his name, 1 Cor. i. 12. Some said, I am of Apollos. A pious and prudent minister of Jesus Christ seeks not his own applause, or his people's admiration ; but what he does is with a special respect to their edification in holiness, for preserving unity and promoting love among each other. Afterwards, when St. Paul had by his epistle allayed those heats, and healed those divisions which prevailed amongst them, we find Apollos did return to Corinth, and was no doubt very acceptable to them, and serviceable amongst them.

13 ¶ Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong.

Three duties are here exhorted to, namely, watchfulness, steadfastness in the faith, and holy fortitude and courage. (1.) Watchfulness, a necessary and daily duty ; we cannot be safe one moment without it ; something we must watch over, something we must watch against, and something we must watch for. We must watch over our thoughts, our words, our actions ; we must watch against all sin, all appearance of sin, all temptations to sin, all occasions of sinning ; we must watch for all opportunities of glorifying God, all opportunities of doing good to others, all opportunities of receiving good from others. (2.) Steadfastness in the faith : Perseverance in the faith of Christ, and steadfastness in his holy religion, is the great and indispensable duty of every Christian that has a due regard to his soul's salvation : Watch ye, stand fast in the faith. (3.) Christian fortitude, and holy courage ; Quit yourselves like men, be strong : Where we have the Christian's spiritual enemies supposed and implied, sin, Satan, and the world ; and his duty declared, and himself encouraged to play the man, in opposing, or contending with, and striving against them. Verily a Christian, above all men, needs courage and resolution ; he can do nothing as a Christian, but it is an act of valour ; it requires much more courage to be a Christian, than to be a captain. Alas ! how many of the valiant sword-men of the world have shewed themselves mere cowards, who have come out of the field with victory, and banners displayed, but after all lived and died slaves at home, slaves to their base lusts ! It requires more prowess, more bravery and greatness of spirit to conquer ourselves, than to command an army of men : Therefore, quit ye like men, be strong.

14 Let all your things be done with charity.

Our apostle having in the beginning of this epistle reproved the Corinthians for their uncharitable schisms and unchristian divisions, he concludes his epistle with this excellent rule of advice, To do all things in love, one for, and one towards another. Where a true principle of Christian charity prevails amongst the members of a church, it will cast out selfishness, pride, envy, and division, and keep them from rash censuring, despising, and abusing one another, and also from separating from the communion of each other. The sum of all the commandments, both towards God, and towards our neighbour, is love ; it is not praying, hearing, or receiving at the Lord's table, which is the fulfilling of the commandment, but when these duties are done in love ; and we may do many things commanded towards men, yet if we do them not in love to men, we do nothing as the Lord commanded ; therefore, let all things be done with charity.

15 I beseech you, brethren : ye know the house of Stephanas, that it is the first-fruits of Achaia, and that they have addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints : 16 ¶ That ye submit yourselves unto such, and to every one that helpeth with us and laboureth.

Note here, 1. The honourable mention which St. Paul makes of Stephanas and his house ; they were the the first-fruits of Achaia ; that is, the first there converted to Christianity. It is a great honour to be in Christ before others : Happy they that come in at the call of Christ, even at the last hour ; but thrice happy those that come in at the first, who are the first ripe fruits unto God. 2 What good proof and evidence Stephanas gave of the sincerity of his early conversion : He addicted himself to the ministry of the saints ; that is, he was very forward to assist the poor saints with his estate and labour. There is no better evidence of our interest in Christ, than an entire affection, and operative compassion compassion towards all our fellow-members in Christ for grace's sake. 3. The great deference and regard, the special respect and honour which was due, and is here commanded to be paid, to Stephanas, for his ministering to the poor saints that were in want: Submit yourselves unto such: that is, give reverence and honour to them, and to all such as are like unto them, who laboured with the apostle in the furthering of the gospel.

17 I am glad of the coming of Stephanas and Fortunatus and Achaicus: for that which was lacking on your part they have supplied. 18 For they have refreshed my spirit and yours: therefore acknowledge ye them that are such.

It is very probable that the faithful in the church of Corinth did send these three persons, namely, Stephanus, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, to St. Paul, at this time at Ephesus, to acquaint him with the state of the church, the rents and schisms that were amongst them; and to desire the interposition of his authority, and the exercise of his apostolical power, in order to the healing of those unhappy breaches. Now, says the apostle, I was glad of the coming of these men, whom you sent with letters of inquiry to me; for that account of your affairs which was lacking on your part in your letter, they have supplied: I am glad, I say, for they have refreshed my spirit with their presence and discourse, and will at their return refresh yours also; therefore acknowledge ye them that are such, own their services, and honour them for the same. There is a tribute of double honour, respect and reverence, due and payable to such as labour in the church's service, even unto weariness, and are willing to spend and be spent in such services as they are capable of, for the benefit of the church in general, or any member thereof in particular.

19 The churches of Asia salute you. Aquila and Priscilla salute you much in the Lord, with the church that is in their house. 20 All the brethren greet you. Greet ye one another with an holy kiss. 21 The salutation of me Paul with mine own hand.

Here our apostle closes his epistle with several salutations to the Corinthians, from the churches of Asia, from Aquila and Priscilla, and from the church in their house; that is, from their Christian family, or from the Christian assembly which used to meet in their house for the worshipping of God. Happy that family-governor, who has a church in his house, with Aquila and Priscilla; who worships God with all his house, as did Cornelius; who with his household serves the Lord, as did Joshua; who commands his children and his household after him, as did faithful Abraham. 20. The nature and manner of this salutation; They salute you in the Lord; that is, with a spiritual affection, for the grace of God that is in you, and wishing you an overflowing stream of spiritual blessings from Christ the fountain. Next, he wills them to salute one another with an holy kiss, a kiss of peace and charity, with which Christians in those times, and according to the custom of those countries, used to salute one another; this was not then a wanton, but an holy kiss, in which they had chaste and holy thoughts; yet afterwards, the piety and purity of the church degenerating and declining, it was thought fit and convenient to lay this kiss of charity aside, which was used in the public assemblies at the celebration of the holy communion. That which is innocent in itself, and pious in its first intendment, may in time fall under such abuse, as to cause it to be wholly laid aside. Lastly, Heads his own salutation with his own hand. It is generally believed, that the apostle employed some person to write his epistles over, which he sent abroad unto the churches; yet that he might prevent fraud and forgery, and that they might know which were his own, he used to subscribe his salutation and apostolical benediction with his own hand, which was well known unto them.

22 If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema, Maran-atha.

That is, If any man do either oppose Christ and his gospel, or apostatize and backslide from his holy profession, and thereby discover he had no sincere love for Christ, let him be accursed till the Lord comes to judgment; and when he comes to judgment, let him without repentance lie under a dreadful, yea, an eternal curse. *Note here, How that those who do not sincerely love our Lord Jesus, are under the heaviest and bitterest of divine curses. Observe, 1. The ground or cause of this curse; the not loving of Jesus Christ: He doth not say, If any man hate Christ, or reproach and blaspheme him, or persecute and injure him; but, if he doth not love him. The bare want of this affection to Christ, is enough eternally to separate us from Christ. 2. The nature of this curse: Let him be anathema Maran-atha. The apostle pronounces the curse in two languages, Greek and Syriac, to denote both the vehemency of his own spirit in speaking, and the certainty of the thing spoken; or perhaps to shew, that men of all nations and languages, who love not Christ, are under a curse, and that they are deservedly cursed among all nations. The Greek word, anathema, signifies execrable; the Syriac word Maran-atha, is a compound of Maran, Lord, and Athan, he cometh. These words were used anciently in the most dreadful sentence of excommunication; as if they had cited the person to the tribunal of Christ, at his coming to judge the world, or left him bound under the curse of that sentence until the coming of Christ. 3. The extent of this curse: If any man; as if he had said, Let him, be who he will, that loves not Christ, Jew or Gentile, bond or free, male or female, rich or poor, young or old, prince or peasant, king or beggar, who have opportunities to know Christ, and yet do not love him, let him be accursed by him to eternal ages; let him be fully separated from the society of Christians here in this world, and from all fellowship and communion with Christ finally in the world to come. The sum is, That those who love not our Lord Jesus Christ, much more those who willfully hate and oppose him and his holy laws, are accursed persons in this life, and devoted to destruction here; but when our Lord shall come to judge the world at the last and great day, they shall be accursed more openly and solemnly; when they shall stand before that impartial Judge of the world, they shall receive from his mouth a final malediction, an irreversible execration,* which shall be immediately succeeded with the anguish and torments of eternity.

23 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. 24 My love be with you all in Christ Jesus. Amen.

Note here, Our apostle's valediction; it is a benediction: He takes his farewell of them with prayer for them; The grace, or gracious favour, of Christ be with you; and multiply all blessings, both spiritual and temporal, upon you: I am sure I love you all in Christ Jesus, and for his sake. Happy it is when ministers can take their farewell of their flocks in this manner, with fervent supplications for them, and with solemn, yet serious protestations of the fervour of their love, and the ardency of their affection towards them. Amen.

C O R I N T H I A N S.

The occasion of St. Paul's writing this second epistle to the Corinthians, was to vindicate his person from divers imputations which were charged upon him by the false apostles, and to defend his ministry and apostleship against some that sought to bring both himself and that into disgrace and contempt: Such ministers as study, and seek that they may excel to the edifying of the church, must expect to encounter with the violent opposition, and virulent imputations of men of perverse minds, who either cannot, or will not, do so well themselves.

Our great apostle here was charged by the false apostles with inconstancy, in promising to come to Corinth, and not coming; with pride and imperiousness, with vanity and vain glory, in reference to the incestuous person; they representing him as contemptible in his person, as despicable in his ministry. He therefore confutes, yea, confounds his adversaries by a new and unusual way of arguing; namely, by boasting of his sufferings, glorying in them, and giving a large catalogue and long inventory of them; he displays his calamities, blazons his crosses, vindicates his person and authority from contempt, clears himself from the charge and imputation of levity and vain glory by rehearsing the good services he had done, and the sufferings he had undergone, for the sake of CHRIST, and his holy religion. Whence we learn, That it is neither unchristian or unseemly to enlarge upon our own actions and sufferings, when there is a great and necessary occasion so to do, namely, when the glory of GOD, the credit of our holy religion, and a just vindication of our own integrity and innocency, doth require it, and call for it.

C H A P. I.

PAUL an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timothy our brother, unto the church of God which is at Corinth, with all the saints which are in all Achaia; 2 Grace be to you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

Observe here, 1. The writer of this epistle described by his name, Paul; by his office, an apostle of Jesus Christ; with the manner how he obtained this office of an apostle, namely, by the will of God; it was not man, but God that called him to the apostleship. It is of great concern and consequence both to ministers and people to be fully informed, and thoroughly satisfied, of that divine call, which their spiritual guides have to come amongst them; that the ministers may be able to say, "We come to you in the name of the Lord;" and the people may be able to reply, "We receive you as ambassadors from the Lord unto us." Paul an apostle by the will of God. 2. A person conjoined with St. Paul in the writing of this epistle, and he is also described two ways; by his name, Timothy; by his relation our brother. Where note, The great humility and condescension descension of St. Paul, that though far superior to Timothy in years, and more transcendent in office, and more eminent in grace, yet he doth not assume and arrogate all to himself, but makes another sit, as it were upon the throne with him; so humble and condescending was this holy man to one so far inferior to him, both in office and grace. Note also, The happy advantage of Timothy in being with St. Paul, and having the happy privilege of being instructed and directed by so great an apostle; happy was it for young Timothy, that ever he came into old Paul's family. Learn hence, That it is an happy advantage to such who in their younger years are dedicated to, and designed to be set apart for the work of the ministry, to be under the inspection and care, the guidance and conduct of those who are more aged, and better experienced than themselves: Paul an apostle, and Timothy our brother. 3. The persons to whom this epistle is written and directed, To the church of God which is at Corinth: Corinth was a city famous for wealth and riches, but most infamous for lewdness and uncleanness; here was a temple dedicated to Venus, where were a thousand virgins set apart to be prostituted to the lusts of men; so that the Greek, to Corinthize, is as much as to be lascivious and unchaste; and after many of them were converted to Christianity, yet did the sin of uncleanness so much abound amongst them, that the apostle doth industriously set himself against it, and warns them of the sin and danger of it, in both his epistles wrote unto them. However, as bad as Corinth was, God told Paul, Acts xvii. that he had much people in that city; and accordingly, he spent a year and a half amongst them, in preaching to them, in converting and confirming of them. Learn hence, That even amongst the most profane and unlikeliest people upon earth, God may, and sometimes doth, gather a church unto himself. See what monsters of men these Corinthians were, 1 Cor. vi. 11. Whoremongers, adulterers, effeminate, abusers of themselves with mankind; and he tells them, not only such persons, but also, such things were some of them, but now washed, &c. O the sovereignty and wonderful efficacy of the grace of God, in cleansing souls, more black than ever was Ethiopian's face! Though man cannot, yet God can, and sometimes does cause figs to grow on thorns, and grapes on thistles. 4. Our apostle's salutation of, and prayer for this church at Corinth: Grace be to you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. Where note, 1. The mercies and blessings prayed for, grace and peace, spiritual blessings, and comprehensive blessings, 2. The original cause and spring from whence those blessings flow, from God the Father, and from Jesus Christ; from the Father as the fountal cause, and from Christ as the procuring cause, the dispenser of these blessings. A good argument to prove the divinity of Christ: He that can dispense grace and peace, of, and from himself: is God; but Christ doth this therefore he is God: Grace be to you, and peace from our Lord Jesus Christ.

3 Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort; 4 Who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God.

Note here, 1. The several gracious and comfortable titles which the apostle gives to Almighty God: He styles him, (1.) The Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; so he is by nature; and Christ his Son by eternal and ineffable generation: For as the words, our Lord, ascribed here to Christ, do not exclude the Father from being Lord; so the word, God, ascribed here to God the Father, excludes not Christ from being our God; and as God is the Father of Christ, so he is a Father in him to all that have union with him. (2.) The Father of mercies; a most amiable and comfortable relation; not the Father of mercy, or a merciful Father barely; but the Father of mercies, in the plural number, to denote the greatness and multitude of his mercies, and that all mercy flows from him only and freely, as streams from an overflowing and never-failing fountain. (3.) The God of all comfort; because by giving his holy Spirit, the Comforter, he is the author of all that consolation which is conferred upon us. 2. The duty here performed by the apostle, that of blessing God, or thanksgiving; Blessed be God, &c. Learn, That blessing and praising God for all mercies, but especially for spiritual mercies, is a duty which all the people of God ought especially to be careful of, and abounding in; the more you bless God, the more you shall have cause to bless him; he will multiply blessings upon you for your thankfulness to him. 3. The particular favour which the apostle blesses and praises God for; namely, for comforting his children, in all their tribulations. Learn hence, That as God is the only comforter of his people at all times, so he is their best comforter in the worst of times. There is no tribulation or affliction that the people of God can fall into, but God can and will comfort them therein: Blessed be God who comforteth us in all our tribulations. 4. The gracious end and merciful design of God in comforting his saints and servants, in and under all their pressures, tribulations, and afflictions; it is, That they may be able to comfort them which are in trouble, by the comfort wherewith they themselves have been comforted of God. Learn hence, That God doth often exercise many of his ministers, and some of his particular saints and servants; in a very exemplary manner, with trials and afflictions, for this great end amongst others, that they may be experimentally able to instruct and comfort such, who either are or may hereafter fall into the same discourteous condition with themselves; none so fit to advise and counsel, to instruct and comfort a suffering saint, as an afflicted minister or christian, who have, together with their afflictions, experienced the favour of divine consolations: That we may comfort others, as we ourselves have been comforted of God.

5 For as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also aboundeth by Christ.

Note here, 1. That the saints sufferings are called the sufferings of Christ. The head suffers in the members, because the members suffer for the sake of the head. 2. That the saints' sufferings in the cause, and for the sake of Christ, are sometimes overflowing and excessive sufferings, the sufferings of Christ abound in us. 3. That as a Christian's sufferings are for Christ, so are their comforts and consolations from him; yea, their comforts do bear some proportion to their sufferings: As our sufferings abound; so our consolation abounds by Christ.

6 And whether we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation, which is effectual in the enduring of the same sufferings which we also suffer: or whether we be comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation.

As if the apostle had said, "What sufferings soever I have met with in my ministerial office, you have the benefit of them, and special advantage by them; and therefore you ought not to despise me upon the account of my sufferings, (as do the false apostles, and would have you do) but you ought the more to honour me for them, and be encouraged yourselves by them; and when I am comforted it is beneficial for your consolation, inasmuch as you may confidently expect the same relief." Learn hence, That the sufferings and afflictions, which we endure for Christ, do not only turn to our own good, but redound greatly to the good and benefit of the church of God, and consequently should not disanimate or dishearten our fellow christians, but rather be matter of comfort or consolation to them; If we be afflicted, it is for your consolation: He adds, If we be comforted, it is for your consolation also: Thereby plainly intimating to us, that Almighty God doth by all his dispensations, both of mercy and correction, promote and carry on the salvation of his own children and people.

7 And our hope of you is steadfast, knowing that as you are partakers of the sufferings, so shall ye be also of the consolation.

Here St. Paul tells the body of the Corinthians that he had a good hope concerning them, that as they had endured sufferings for Christ, so they would still endure them; assuring them that they should share no less in consolation than they did in affliction. Learn hence, That such as suffer for Christ, or own those that suffer for him, shall be interested in all that joy and consolation which sufferings and sufferers shall receive from God: As you are partakers of the sufferings, so shall you be of the consolation also.

8 For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia, that we were pressed out of measure, above strength, inasmuch that we despaired even of life.

Observe here, 1. That it is of no small benefit and advantage, but of excellent use to us, to know what are the troubles and afflictions which do befall the servants of God for righteousness sake: We would not have you ignorant of our trouble: 2. How pressing the troubles and afflictions were which this apostle underwent: They were out of measure, above strength, and even to the despairing of life. Thence note, That God may, and sometimes does exercise his servants with such extreme and pressing trials, that all their own natural strength is unable to support them under them; or carry them through them.

9 But we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead.

Observe here, The great and eminent danger which the apostle was in; his very life was in a hazard, nay, even despaired of; he looked upon himself as a dead man: But when he had thus sentenced himself, a divine power, which wrought above all his thoughts and rational conjectures, revived him, and revived him. Hence learn, That the Almighty power of God sometimes works beyond all creature expectations, beyond all human probabilities, beyond all rational conjectures, to help and deliver his people in hopeless and helpless troubles.

10 Who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver: In whom we trust that he will yet deliver us.

Note here, The deliverer, God, the delivered, St. Paul and the saints that were in Asia with him; the deliverance itself, or the eminent and impending evil delivered from, death, great death, so great a death. Learn, 1. That in times of great and eminent danger, God, and God alone, is the immediate deliverer of his children and people. 2. That it is the property of a gracious heart, to magnify and enhance the deliverance of a gracious God: He hath delivered us from so great a death, &c. 3. That past and present experience of God's power and goodness towards his people, may and ought to encourage them to trust in him for time to come; former experience ought to encourage us to future dependance; when we can say, God hath delivered and doth deliver, let our faith add, In him we trust, that he will yet deliver.

11 You also helping together by prayer for us, that for the gift bestowed upon us by the means of many persons, thanks may be given by many on our behalf.

Our apostle having commemorated the goodness and power of God in former deliverances, and expressed his assurance of present and future deliverances, doth in this verse excite and exhort the faithful at Corinth to help and further him with their prayers; You also helping together by prayer for us. Where note, The humility of the apostle, in desiring the people's prayers for himself. Such as are most eminent in gifts and office, yea, in grace too, do really want, and heartily desire the help and benefit of their prayers, who are far inferior to them in the church of God. And verily, the people do owe unto their spiritual guides, as a debt of service, their earnest prayers for them; herein they are not only serviceable to them, but kind to themselves. Note, farther, The great reason why St. Paul was so desirous of the Corinthians' prayers, that deliverance and mercy being obtained thereby, praise and thanksgiving might be rendered to God on his behalf. Learn, That when by prayer any mercy is obtained by us, it is our duty, by praise and thanksgiving, to acknowledge the same to God.

God. What is obtained by prayer; should be owned by thankfulness; God forbid we should be clamorous in asking favours, and dumb and tongue-tied in returning thanks.

12 ¶ For our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world, and more abundantly to you-wards.

Note here, 1. That though St. Paul did not put confidence and trust in his sincerity, and christian grace, yet he did rejoice, and holily glory in the evidence of his grace; and in the testimony of a sincere and upright conscience; Our rejoicing is this. Learn hence, That an holy glorying and rejoicing in the graces of God, which, upon good and sufficient grounds we find evident in ourselves, is lawful and allowable. A christian may and ought to rejoice, not only in the confidence of Christ's merits, but also in the conscience of his own sincerity. Note, 2. The particular grace evidenced, which the apostle took comfort in; His sincerity and godly simplicity; that is, his uprightness both of heart and life, his freedom from guilt and hypocrisy. Thence observe, That the conscience of sincerity is such a crown of rejoicing, as will support a christian's spirit under and against the greatest difficulties which may arise in any condition. This sincerity discovers itself in its acting by a right rule, from a right principle, and to a right end; and it supports a man's spirit in the duty of prayer, under slander and reproach, in the dark night of affliction, in the disconsolate hour of death, and at the dreadful day of judgment. Note, 3. That it is not a single act of sincerity, but a constant course of upright walking, that our apostle rejoiced and took comfort in; We have had our conversation in the world in all simplicity and good sincerity. It is not a single action, but a series of good actions, that administers comfort: As God doth not judge of our state and condition by a particular action, no more should we, but by the general bent of our resolutions, and the constant course and tenor of our conversations: Our rejoicing is this, &c.

13 For we write none other things unto you than what ye read or acknowledge, and I trust ye shall acknowledge even to the end;

The apostle having asserted his own sincerity and upright conversation in the former verse, he doth in this verse make his appeal to the consciences of the Corinthians for his justification. It is a good demonstration of our uprightness, when we can not only appeal to God as touching our sincerity, but dare appeal to the consciences of men; for if, through prejudice, they will not with their mouths vouch our integrity, yet secretly with their consciences they cannot but bear witness to it. Note, 2. The apostle's having declared, that he had his testimonials, not only from his own conscience, but from their's also; he adds, that he trusted this would hold and continue even to the end; that is, to the end both of his and their lives. As if the apostle had said, "My conversation had hitherto been acknowledged by you to be sincere and upright; and I hope, as you shall never see it otherwise by me, so you will persevere and continue in your good opinion and right judgment concerning me, to the end of your and my life."

14 As also ye have acknowledged us in part, that we are your rejoicing, even as ye also are ours, in the day of the Lord Jesus.

Note here, 1. The great trial which St. Paul met with from the Corinthians, whose spiritual father he was; though he had served them with great faithfulness, yet they did acknowledge him but in part. There was a time when he was high in their esteem; Who but Paul? None but he: But now a great part leave him, and admire others. Learn hence, What great levity, fickleness and inconstancy may be found in good men in general, and what great mutability and changeableness of affection in particular to their ministers and spiritual guides, though never so sincere and faithful. Although St. Paul, with a laborious diligence, and divine success, had planted and propagated the Christian faith amongst them; yet now, not only his person, but his very office, falls under contempt by many of them. None more than ministers do experience this truth, that nothing is so mutable as the mind of man: Though ministers are the same, and their message the same, though they continue burning and shining lights, though they burn out, and consume life, health, and estate, among and for their people; yet it is only for a season, for an hour, for a short time, at their first coming amongst them, that they rejoice in their light: You have acknowledged us in part. Note, 2. That notwithstanding the contempt cast upon St. Paul by some in the church at Corinth, yet there were others among them who did greatly rejoice in him, and bless God for him, and be for them! We are your rejoicing, and ye are ours, as being converted by us; and I trust we shall be a farther joy and mutual rejoicing each to other in the day of our Lord Jesus. Learn hence, What unspeakable rejoicings and joyful congratulations there will be in the day of Christ between laborious faithful ministers and their believing obedient hearers. "Lord! (will the Christian say) this was the blessed instrument under God, of my happy illumination and conversion; by the blessing of thy Spirit upon his ministry, my soul was begotten unto Christ." But, on the other hand, if we be ignorant or lazy, unskilful or unfaithful, in our office, our people will come in against us swift witnesses in the day of Christ: And, Lord! what an intolerable aggravation will it be of our misery in hell, to have any of our people thus upbraiding us! "O cruel man! that sawest my soul in danger, but never dealt plainly and faithfully with me; the same time that we spent together in sin and vanity, in sensual mirth and jollity, might have been instrumental to save us both from this place of torment." Let ministers consider themselves as witnesses for God, and their people as witnesses for or against them; and, under that consideration, to study, preach, and pray, so live, walk, and act, that they may, with this great apostle, take God to record, that they are free from the blood of all men.

15 ¶ And in this confidence I was minded to come unto you before, that ye might have a second benefit;

Note here, 1. The apostle's steady purpose, and fixed resolution to come and spend some time amongst the Corinthians: I was minded to come unto you. Where a faithful minister has good hopes and confidence of doing good amongst a people, there is great encouragement for coming to them, and abiding with them. When the ministers of Christ find that God has farther converting work, or edifying work for them to do in a particular place amongst his people, they will not, they must not, yea, they dare not forsake them for outward advantages. 2. The end of St. Paul's purpose and resolution to come unto them, That they might have a second benefit. The first benefit was their conversion, the second benefit was their confirmation; confirmation in the faith, and reformation, both in life and manners. It is not sufficient, that by our ministry we plant a church, and gather a people out of the world by external and visible profession; but there is farther need of daily industry, and continual care, to water what we have planted, to cultivate and dress that corner of our Lord's vineyard, which is under our particular inspection and care. O that our people had hearts to cry out, and say, Lord, not the first time only, but the second, yea, all my life; make me partaker of this benefit.

16 And to pass by you into Macedonia, and to come again out of Macedonia unto you, and of you to be brought on my way towards Judea.

Note here, 1. How the heart of this holy apostle was carried forth in the service of God and souls, and how accordingly he orders all his journies from one place to another and determines his continuance and stay, longer in one place than another, as the glory of God, the advantage of the gospel, and the church's necessities did require: I design to pass by you into Macedonia, &c. It is the duty of the ministers of Christ, not only to lay out themselves for the glory of God, and the good of souls, but to project, forecast, and contrive how they may do it in the most advantageous manner, for the furtherance of the gospel. Yet, note, 2. The difference between this extraordinary apostle then, and ordinary pastors of the church now. The apostles had an universal commission to plant churches in all places; they were to be in constant travels up and down the world, itinerary preachers from place to place: But the office of an ordinary pastor now is, to watch over a particular flock, and to keep constant residence amongst them. Yet though by actual relation he is tied and bound to a particular flock, he is, by habitual and aptitudinal disposition, a minister of the universal church, and a debtor to the public good thereof. He is first made a minister in the universal church; and then a pastor of a particular congregation: And accordingly, though he seeks the interest of his own flock first, yet it is his duty, by prayer, by study, by preaching, by writing, by all other edifying ways and methods, to promote the universal good and benefit of the whole church of Christ, according to his power, both far and near.

17 When I therefore was thus minded, did I use lightness? or the things that I purpose, do I purpose according to the flesh, that with me there should be yea, yea, and nay, nay?

Here our apostle begins to make his apology and defence for himself, for changing his purpose in coming to Corinth according to promise, and to free himself from the imputation of levity, inconstancy, and falshood, cast upon him by his back friends, the false apostles, for promising to come to Corinth, and not performing it; for they aggravated the matter so far, as if he were one that said and unsaid, one that took no care about keeping his word; and thence inferred, that no regard was to be had to any thing that he delivered. "He that is not to be relied upon, say the false apostles, in his ordinary promises, how can you depend upon what he says to you in his preaching?" Hence learn, That lightness and inconstancy is a great sin and reproach in any, but especially in the ministers of the gospel, who yet are often charged with it, when they are in no degree guilty of it. Note, 2. As our apostle frees himself from the charge of inconstancy, so from the suspicion of acting for worldly advantage: The things which I purpose, do I purpose according to the flesh? That is, for carnal ends or secular interest, that with me there should be now, Yea, yea; and anon, Nay, nay. Behold here! what truth and steadiness was found in and with our holy apostle; how his words and intentions, his tongue and his heart, his pen and his purpose were one, namely, in reality to come unto them, though he was providentially hindered and obstructed. Here let us remark and note. What little things the men of the world will take advantage from, to vilify and lessen the reputation of God's faithful servants, especially his ministers. How many persons might have promised to be in such a place, at such a time, and have failed, without being reproached for breach of promise? The world would have been so charitable to another person, as to have excused it; by saying, "The man spake according to his present intention and resolution, but was hindered by the providence of God;" but if Paul fails in a tittle, he must be loaded presently, upbraided for his inconstancy, or which is worse, charged with playing fast and loose for sinister ends, and worldly advantages. Lord, give thy servants, especially thy ministers, wisdom to walk with exactness and circumspection before the men of the world; who are their watchful observers, and bold censurers, that they may cut off all occasion from them that seek occasion against them.

18 But as God is true, our word toward you was not yea and nay.

By the word here, some understand St. Paul's promise to come to Corinth; that he did very seriously intend to come unto them; as if he had said, "As God is true to his promise, so has he taught me to be true to mine." Others understand by the word, St. Paul's preaching, that his doctrine was not mutable and changeable, but always the same. Here note. How ready and forward the adversaries of religion are, from any real or supposed imperfections in the ministers of God, presently to blame and burthen their ministry, to charge their private errors and mistakes upon their doctrine. There is a mighty propensity, and great forwardness in bad men, to cast all the imperfections of the ministers of the gospel upon their ministry and doctrine. The devil is glad of an opportunity, by the failings of preachers, to bring the doctrines they preach either into doubt or difesteem. But though it be a great reproach for a minister to be mutable and contradictory in his doctrine, yet the wicked world do often accuse them of it, and charge them with it, when there is not the least occasion for it: Verily, as God is true, our word was not Yea and Nay.

19 For the Son of God, Jesus Christ, who was preached among you by us, even by me and Sylvanus and Timotheus, was not yea and nay; but in him was yea.

The verse contains a new argument for the constancy and immutability of St. Paul's doctrine, drawn from the subject matter of his preaching; namely, Jesus Christ. As Christ is always one and the same, whom himself and other ministers did preach, so is our doctrine one and the same also. Note here, 1. The subject matter of St. Paul's preaching, what was the sum of his own and his companions sermons, (Sylvanus and Timotheus,) it was not his own imaginations, or the Jewish rites and ceremonies, but Christ in his nature and offices: The Son of God, Jesus Christ, was preached among you by us. Note, 2. The happy unity and accord, which was found among all these ministers, St. Paul, Sylvanus and Timotheus, in preaching Christ. O blessed agreement! when all the ministers of God with one consent conspire and agree to advance and extol our Lord Jesus Christ. 3. That the course of St. Paul's and his assistants preaching, was, like the great subject of their preaching, Christ Jesus, fixedly and unchangeably the same; not yea at one time, and nay at another. Learn thence, That it is a proper note of God's truth, and the true preachers thereof, that they are always one and the same, always yea, and not yea and nay; there is no change or contrariety in their doctrines.

20 For all the promises of God in him are Yea, and in him Amen, unto the glory of God by us.

Our apostle had proved in the foregoing verse the constancy of his own doctrine, which he preached from the immutability and constancy of Christ, the subject of it. Here he proveth Christ to be unchangeable, in that all the promises which God had made to us, are fulfilled both in him and by him. All the promises of God in him are Yea and Amen; that is, verified and fulfilled in him, and confirmed by him to us. Learn, 1. That God has made promises, many promises to his people. 2. That all the promises which God has made to his people, are made in Christ, and ratified by him: Christ acts the part and office of a surety, he undertakes, and engages for God, that all which he had promised shall be made good to us. 3. That the promises made by God, and ratified, and confirmed in Christ, do all tend to the glory of God. They shew the sovereignty of his grace, in making promises to his creatures of mercy, who deserved nothing but flaming vengeance, and implacable fury. They shew the amplitude of his grace; for if grace did not flow abundantly from the heart of God towards us, we could never have received so large a stock of promises from him. Let us then glorify God, by setting a just value upon his promises, as the unchangeable assurance of his love and grace.

21 Now he which established us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God: 22 Who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts.

In these two verses we have four very great and noble privileges, which the apostle declares God had conferred upon the Corinthians; namely, his establishing, anointing, and sealing of them, and giving the earnest of his holy Spirit to them. First, their establishment; He which established us with you is God. Learn thence, That a people's establishment in the doctrine of the gospel, and in the faith of the promises, is alone the gracious work of God. We are naturally like reeds shaken with every wind; it is the establishing grace of God that makes us pillars in the church. Again, secondly, Their anointing, this is from God; the sanctifying grace of God is often in scripture compared to oil, in regard of its effects. It refresheth the weary, it healeth the wounded, it comforts the heart, it beautifies the face, it strengthens the limbs. Such internal virtues and excellencies hath the sanctifying grace of God in the hearts of the people. Thirdly, Their sealing; Who hath also sealed us. God's sealing of his children doth imply his high valuation and esteem of them; what is sealed is esteemed very precious: It implies their safety and security; what is under seal, is not in danger of being lost. Again, Sealing doth imply secrecy and privacy; that which is sealed is secret and hidden; it is the new name, which none knows but he that receiveth it. Finally, Sealing is for confirmation; contracts and bargains among men are confirmed by hand and seal. Thus the graces of the Spirit, which sanctify us, do also witness and seal to us the assurance of God's love and special favour in Christ. The fourth privilege here conferred by God upon the Corinthians, is his giving the earnest of his Spirit in their hearts: Grace wrought in the heart here, is a sure earnest of glory hereafter; there is a great deal of difference between a shilling, a single piece of money, and a shilling that is an earnest of a greater sum. It is joy to find grace in the soul as grace mortifying our corruptions; but it rejoices much more to look upon grace as an earnest of glory, as the first-fruits which insure the full crop.

23 Moreover, I call God for a record upon my soul, that to spare you I came not as yet unto Corinth,

In these words, our apostle doth assure the Corinthians, in a very solemn manner, that it was not any inconstancy or carnal respect in himself that made him delay his coming to them, but it was purely to spare them, as being unwilling to come with his rod among them, and to use severity upon them. Here observe the apostle's manner of speech, it is by way of adjuration; I call God to record upon my soul. The words are an assertory and execratory oath, wherein God is called to witness the truth of what he said. Learn hence, That it is lawful for Christians under the gospel to swear upon a necessary and great occasion. But what great occasion was here for St. Paul to do it? Ans. Very great; the false apostles did accuse him for a vain-glorious and inconstant man. This accusation did redound to the discredit of his ministry, the dishonour of the gospel, the destruction of the church; therefore he solemnly protests, that no inconstancy or worldly motives did cause him to delay his promise; but a wise and spiritual consideration of their good, a willingness to spare them, and an unwillingness to use severity upon them. Hence learn, That the ministerial power which God giveth the officers of the church, ought to be managed with much holy prudence, and Christian commiseration: The end of their power should always be in their mind, which is edification and not destruction.

2.1 Not for that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy: for by faith ye stand.

As if the apostle had said, "Though we have a ministerial power, yet we have not a magisterial dominion over you, to treat as we please the professors of the gospel, or to punish those that walk not according thereunto." Learn hence, That though Christ has invested the officers of the church with a ministerial power, yet they have not thereby any dominion over the faith of believers: Not that we have dominion over your faith: He adds, But are helpers of your joy. He doth not say, We are helpers of your grace, helpers of your faith, helpers of your holiness, though this is necessarily implied; but helpers of your joy and comfort. Note thence, That a special part of the minister's work, consists in administering to the comfort and consolation of such as stand in need of it, and are qualified for it. Our first work is to help the graces, our next to help the comforts of our people. The Spirit of God is a sanctifier, and then a comforter: Joy is not the first stone in God's building; grace and holiness is first, comfort and consolation next. For by faith ye stand; ye have stood, and do stand steadfast in the faith: that is the generality and body of you; though some among you deny the resurrection, yet the best and greatest part of you are sound in the faith, and steadfast in the faith. Our apostle doth not unchurch them, because of some disorders among them, nor because of some heretical doctrines found with them, but endeavours to reform their disorders, that so when he came unto them, he might not come with his rod, but in the spirit of meekness.

CHAP. II.

Our apostle having vindicated himself from the imputation of levity and inconsistency; here vindicates himself from the aspersions of too much rigour, and too great severity towards the incestuous person.

BUT I determined this with myself, that I would not come again to you in heaviness. 2 For if I make you sorry, who is he then that maketh me glad, but the same which is made sorry by me?

The occasion of St. Paul's writings again to the Corinthians, and desiring for the present to come unto them, is here intimated. There was an incestuous person in the church of Corinth, who had married his father's wife; if she were his own natural mother, the sin was most prodigious and unnatural, that the child of her womb should be the husband of her bed; if she were his mother-in-law, it was against the law of reverence, and an heinous sin for the son to uncover the father's nakedness. And it was an aggravation of the sin, that the person committing it was a Christian, a member, and, as some think, a minister of the church at Corinth. St. Paul, in his former epistle, chap. v. commands them to excommunicate this incestuous person, which accordingly they did; and this spiritual physic, applied to the offender, had a good effect upon him; for, being punished by the church, he punisheth himself; and being cast out of the church, he casts away his sin. Happy is it, when the church's censures are so executed as to bring offenders to a sight and sense of their sins, in order to a deep humiliation, and thorough reformation. Now, says the apostle I determined not to come to you in heaviness; that is, one great reason why I put off my journey to you, was this, that my coming amongst you might neither occasion sorrow, nor create heaviness, either to you or myself; for I delight not in censuring and chiding, when I can otherwise avoid it: For if I make you sorry, and myself with you, who is it that can make me glad, but he that is made sorry by me? that is, nothing can make me glad, but the reformation of the fallen person. Where note, That nothing adds so much to the joy and comfort of the ministers of Christ, as the recovery of revolted souls from under the empire and dominion of sin and Satan. We joy with them, and rejoice in God for them; we live as we see any of you stand fast in the Lord, we die as we see others stick fast in their sins.

3 And I wrote this same unto you, lest when I came I should have sorrow from them of whom I ought to rejoice; having confidence in you all, that my joy is the joy of you all.

As if the apostle had said, I gave you a sharp reproof, in my former epistle, but it was in much love, and upon a good design; namely, to procure such a reformation of life and manners among you, as might prevent my sorrow when I come unto you: For as your grief is my grief, so my joy is the joy of you all. As the ministers of Christ and their beloved people are one, so their griefs are one, and their joys one: they rejoice together, and mourn together; their griefs and sorrows are mutual, and their joys and comforts are reciprocal.

4 For out of much affliction and anguish of heart I wrote unto you with many tears; not that ye should be grieved, but that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you.

Here our compassionate apostle tells them, That what he had wrote in his former epistle with some severity and sharpness, concerning the incestuous person, was so far from being written with any intention to grieve them, that it was a real affliction to him, a very heavy pressure upon his heart, which fetched abundance of tears from his eyes, and consequently was an effect of the greatest love imaginable. Hence note, That when the ministers of Christ do execute church-censures, if they do not dispense them with tenderness and compassion, so as to let the offenders see that what is done is out of abundant love unto them, they will never be the better for them, nor be bettered or reclaimed by them. Doth a civil judge weep when he passes sentence upon upon a malefactor? Much more should an ecclesiastical judge mourn, when he pronounceth the censures of the church upon notorious offenders. Behold the apostle here declaring with what anguish of spirit, and grief of heart, he wrote to have the sentence of excommunication executed and inflicted on the incestuous Corinthian.

5 But If any hath caused grief, he hath not grieved me, but in part: that I may not overcharge you all.

As if the apostle had said, This incestuous person, who hath caused so much grief to me by his sin, hath caused no little grief to you also, to the sounder part of you, even to all, but those who were partakers with him in his sin; he hath grieved me but in part only: you as well myself, have been grieved by him, and afflicted for him. Not only the ministers, but members of the church are affected with, and afflicted for, the scandal of professors' sins. St. Paul grieved but in part for the incestuous person's sin; the sounder part of the church mourned with him. Or, secondly, He hath grieved me but in part, that I may not overcharge you: It is as much as if he had said, "The grief and sorrow which I have had for the sin and scandal of this notorious offender, I am far, very far from charging upon the whole church; I dare not load you all with that imputation, as if you were involved in the guilt of it." It is not only injurious, but very unjust, to cast the dirt of professors' sin upon the face of their profession, or to charge the guilt of a particular person's miscarriages upon the whole church or christian society to which he doth belong. As religion justifies no man's faults, so no man's faults should condemn religion.

6 ¶ Sufficient to such a man is this punishment which was inflicted of many.

Observe here, 1. The nature of that punishment which the holy apostle thought, and adjudged to be sufficient for the guilty person's sin, and that was excision, not destruction; excommunication, not death: The rejection of such a sinner from the communion of the church, by church-censure and discipline, was the punishment pronounced. 2. By whom, and before whom, this punishment of excommunication was executed and inflicted, namely, by the officers and governors of the church, (who had and have the power of the keys) in the presence, and with the consent of the whole church. In the primitive church, we have reason to believe, when any offender was to be excommunicated, the people were acquainted with the crime; the guilty person pleaded in their presence, they judged as your jury men do of the matter of fact, they consented to the condemnation; but the sentence was not pronounced by them, but by the governors and officers of the church before them, and in their presence: And as the church or body of the people consented to the offender's rejection, so likewise to his re-admission to the communion of the church; but their actual admission was by the pastor and governors of the church, and not by the people. Contrary to this primitive practice is the modern practice of those, who have snatched the keys out of the hands of the pastors, (where Christ placed them) and put them into the hands of the people.

7 So that contrariwise, ye ought rather to forgive him, and comfort him, lest perhaps such an one should be swallowed up with over-much sorrow.

8 Wherefore I beseech you that ye would confirm your love towards him.

Note, 1. The great duty which the apostle directs the Corinthians to the performance of, towards this sorrowful offender, to forgive him, to comfort him, to confirm him; that is, to absolve him from the sentence and censure of the church; no longer to continue their aversion to him, but to restore him to the church's communion, to re-admit him to their fellowship and society, to comfort him with their love to him, by shewing, that their excommunicating of him was with design to reform, not to ruin him; to recover him by repentance, and not to drive him to despair. This is the importance of the three several words which are used here, Forgive him, comfort him, confirm him. From whence note, That in notorious crimes, which give great cause of scandal to the church, the comfort of the offender depends not only upon his peace and reconciliation with God, but also upon the relaxation of the censures of the church, and his re-admission to the church's fellowship and communion: Forgive him, and confirm your love towards him. 2. The reason offered by our apostle why this penitent offender should be forgiven and comforted; namely, lest he should be swallowed up with over-much sorrow. Learn hence, (1.) That sorrow even for itself may be excessive over-much, (2.) That excessive and over-much sorrow swalloweth up a person; it may swallow him up in the gulph of despair, and, as a consequent of it, in the gulph of death. As worldly sorrow causeth death, so may religious sorrow also, even sorrow for sin. We may dishonour God by an excessive mourning, even for God's dishonour. Sorrow is not of any worth in itself, but only as it serves to a spiritual end and purpose: and when it is excessive, not only the comforts, but the gifts and usefulness of the person sorrowing, are in danger to be swallowed up by it. Quest. But when is sorrow for sin excessive and over-much? Ans. When is sorrow for sin exercise of our graces, when it hinders the performance of our duties, when it hurts our health, and overwhelmeth nature, when it perverts reason, swalloweth up faith, hindereth our hope, prejudiceth our joy, and unfits us both for doing and suffering the will of God; in a word, that sorrow for sin which keeps the soul from looking towards the mercy-seat, that keeps Christ and the soul asunder, and renders a person unfit for the service of God, and for the communion of saints, is a sinful sorrow.

9 For to this end also did I write, that I might know the proof of you, whether ye be obedient in all things. 10 To whom ye forgive any thing, I forgive also: for if I forgave any thing, to whom I forgave it, for your sakes forgave I it in the person of Christ; 11 Lest Satan should get an advantage of us: for we are not ignorant of his devices.

Note here, 1. Our apostle declares what was his end in writing writing his former epistle to them, namely, this amongst others, to exercise their obedience, and to make trial what regard they would shew to his apostolical authority; whether they would be as obedient to his directions in absolving of penitents, as they were before in inflicting church-censures upon bold offenders: For this end did I write, that I might have a proof of you. 2. The apostle declares his own forwardness to forgive penitent offenders himself, as well as makes known his desires that they should do it: When ye forgive, I forgive also in the person of Christ; that is, as you forgive him, so do I; and I absolve him by Christ's authority, as I excommunicated him in Christ's name, 1 Cor. v. 4. In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, &c. As he delivered the incestuous person to Satan in the name of Christ, so in the name and person of Christ he releases him and relaxes the sentence against him. The power of excommunication, and absolution, of binding and loosing, of calling out, and receiving into the church, is by Christ committed to church-governors, who are to execute this power in the person of Christ; that is, in the name, and by the authority of Christ. 3. The arguments with which, and the motive by which, he presses the church at Corinth to forgive the incestuous person, and to re-admit him into their society, lest Satan get an advantage of us. What advantage? Ans. An advantage to lead them into sin thus, by their abusing that power which God had given them for edification, to the destruction of a person, by making them guilty of spiritual murder by their over-rigorous proceeding against him, by driving him to despair, by tempting him to apostacy. Satan sometimes, by too greatness, slackness of discipline, seeks to lull sinners asleep in the bosom of the church; and sometimes by too great severity endeavours to drive them to despair. The force of the apostle's words lies thus: I advise you to continue the severity of discipline no longer towards this penitent offender, but receive him again into your communion with all tenderness and speed, lest Satan should circumvent you, and over-reach you, and make use of your rigour, to your own ruin, by rendering your doctrine hateful, and your discipline detestable; for we are not ignorant of his devices, his contrivances, plots and stratagems laid against us. Learn hence, 1. That Satan is a master, in the art of deceiving souls: He is full, very full of cunning methods and devices, to circumvent persons, and catch them in the net of his deceits. 2. That it concerns all persons, but especially the ministers of the gospel, to be well acquainted with, and not ignorant of any devices or plots of Satan. Satan has a multitude of devices, by which he undoes, entangles and deceives souls; and no Christian ought to be ignorant of them lest he be circumvented and undone by them: Many are his devices for drawing us into sin, for drawing us off from duty, for drawing us into temptation, for drowning us in despair; our wisdom will be, not to dispute, but to resist, for by resisting, our temptations, will be fewer, and our strength greater, James iv. 7. Resist the devil, and he will fly. Where note, That the promise of conquest is made to resisting, not disputing with Satan; to parly with him, is the way to be overcome by him.

12 Furthermore, when I came to Troas to preach

Christ's gospel, and a door was opened unto me of the Lord. 13 I had no rest in my spirit, because I found not Titus my brother: but taking my leave of them I went from thence into Macedonia. 14 ¶ Now thanks be unto God, which always causeth us to triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest the favour of his knowledge by us in every place.

Observe here, 1. The unwearied diligence of this great apostle in travelling from place to place, and carrying the gospel with him from one city and nation to another: I came to Troas, and from thence to Macedonia. 2. The success which the holy apostle had in preaching the gospel with unwearied diligence in those places: A door was opened unto him of the Lord. This either signifies, (1.) The free liberty which he had to preach the gospel in those places; the door of his mouth was not shut by persecutors, the enemies and opposers of the gospel, but the word of the Lord had a free course in the labours of its ministers. Or, (2.) This opened door may signify and import the great and gracious success which God gave the apostle in his work; as God by his providence opened the apostle's mouth to preach and publish the glad tidings of the gospel, so by his holy Spirit he opened the people's hearts to receive and entertain the glad tidings of salvation which the gospel brought. Acts xvi. 14. The Lord opened Lydia's heart, that she attended to the words which were spoken of Paul. 3. How careful the apostle is to ascribe the entire praise, and to return the whole thanks to Almighty God, for all the gracious assistance and success which he had received in his ministerial service: Thanks be to God which causeth us to triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest the favour of his knowledge by us in every place. As if the apostle had said, "Blessed be God, although our enemies have been many, and our difficulties great, yet God has given me and my fellow apostles such resolution of mind, that we have not only encountered with them, but triumphed over them, in a powerful conversion of so many from Heathenism to Christianity; and has enabled us to spread the sweet odour of the gospel far and near, by our laborious preaching of it from place to place." Then is the word, and God in the word, glorified, when the sword of the Spirit is taken into the hand of the Spirit; when he girds this sword upon his thigh, as most mighty, and rides on triumphantly, till he has consummated his victories in a glorious triumph over all the powers of hell and darkness. Thanks be to God that causeth us to triumph in Christ.

15 For we are unto God a sweet favour of Christ in them that are saved, and in them that perish. 16 To the one we are the favour of death unto death; and to the other, the favour of life unto life.

Note here, 1. The title given to the gospel, and to the preachers and dispensers of it; they are a favour, an allusion probably to the ointment of sweet perfume, which the high-priests under the law were anointed with. The breath of the gospel is a sweet odour or smell, and God's faithful ministers are they that carry it, and blow it abroad to perfume perfume sinners that lie stinking in their sins. 2. The contrary effects which the preaching of the gospel has upon those that sit under it; it is the favour of life unto some, of death unto others: Here it was so, the apostle's ministry was a favour of life to the believing Gentiles, of death to the unbelieving Jews; all men are to be reckoned in a state of life or death, of perishing or being saved, according as they do, or do not receive the favour, and relish the doctrine of the gospel. But how comes the preaching of the gospel to be the favour of death unto some? Ans. Partly through pride, in not enduring to be reproved by the gospel; partly through prejudice against the ministers of the gospel; partly through slothfulness, in neglecting to come under the sound of the gospel; and partly through cursed infidelity, in not believing the message which the gospel brings. This is the gospel, which was ordained for life, the favour of death unto death. 3. The sweet support which God gives his faithful ministers in the discharge of their duty, though their gospel fails of the desired success; they are a sweet favour unto God, as well in them that perish, as in them that are saved. Lord! how would thy ministers be of all men most miserable, shouldst thou require the success of their labours at their hands; shouldst thou say, "Either reconcile my people unto me, or I will never be reconciled unto you:" But we shall be rewarded by thee according to our faithfulness, not according to our people's unfruitfulness. The faithful ministers of Christ are a sweet smelling favour in the nostrils of God, as well in them that perish, as in them that are saved: Though Israel (their people) be not gathered, yet shall they be glorious: God will reward them, secundum laborem, non fructum; the nurse shall be paid for her care and pains, though the child dies at the breast.

—And who is sufficient for these things?

As if the apostle had said, So great and weighty is the work of preaching the everlasting gospel to a lost world, that neither myself, nor any of my fellow-apostles, are sufficient for it of ourselves; Who is sufficient? That is, none are sufficient, without proportionable strength and help from God, neither man nor angel: To preach the gospel as it ought, is a mighty work, a weighty work. If any think otherwise, it is either their ignorance or inadvertency that makes them think so. What! Is it an easy matter to search into the deep things of God, the mysteries of the gospel, which have an unfathomable depth? Is it easy to instruct the ignorant, to convince the obstinate, to resolve the doubting, to reduce the wandering, to know the state of our flock, to visit the sick as we ought, to speak to them, and pray for them, as persons upon the confines of eternity? What! is all this, and much more, a trivial work, and common performance? No verily; as there is no service more honourable than that of the ministry, so there is none more arduous and laborious; and therefore, the greatest men that ever God employed in and about this work, have been ready to sink under the apprehension of the insuperable difficulties that do attend it. If we consider how a gospel minister ought to excel in knowledge, in utterance, in prudence and conduct, in exemplary piety, in patient contending with a ple's frowardness and perverseness, we need not wonder at our apostle's exclamation or exhortatory question in the words before us: Who is sufficient for these things?

17 For we are not as many which corrupt the word of God: but as of sincerity, but as of God, in the sight of God speak we in Christ.

Observe here, 1. The character which the apostle gives the false apostles who were crept in amongst the Corinthians: they were corrupters of the word of God; they did sophisticate and adulterate the sincere word of God, by intermixing their own pride and passions, their own inventions and imaginations, with the doctrine which they delivered. False teachers deal with the word, as the vintners deal with their wines; they imbaise them in their nature, that they may advance them in their price, and thereby increase their own profit; they deliver the word of God in subtlety, but not in sincerity. 2. The declaration which the apostle makes of his own uprightness and integrity in preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ: As of sincerity, as of God, and in the sight of God, speak we in Christ; that is, we act as men of sincerity in what we do, as men taught of God and sent by God, as men acted by the power, and guided by the Spirit of Christ, and all this as in the sight of God; we speak as from God, of God, in obedience to his command, and with an eye at his glory. He is a better preacher that speaks with an upright heart, than he that speaks with an eloquent tongue; he that acts from religious principles, for holy ends, as in the presence of the all-seeing God, and with a fixed eye at the glory of God in what he preaches, he is an interpreter, one of a thousand.

CHAP. III.

Our apostle in this chapter intimates to us how much the reputation of a minister's person is needful and necessary in order to the success of his ministry; and sheweth that his conversion to Christianity was a full evidence of God's owning and approving of him as his ambassador, and a sufficient commendation of his person and ministry amongst them; which ministry he proves to be far more excellent than that of Moses.

DO we begin again to commend ourselves? or need we, as some others, epistles of commendation to you, or letters of commendation from you? 2 Ye are our epistle written in our hearts, known and read of all men: 3 Forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of stone, but in fleshy tables of the heart.

Our apostle here expostulates the case with the Corinthians, why they would at any time hearken to the false apostles, who, by reflecting upon his person and ministry, made it needful for him to vindicate both from contempt and scorn. As if he had said, "What do I need to begin again in this second epistle, as I did in the first, to commend myself and the effects of my ministry among you? Or need I commendatory letters either to you or from you as the false teachers amongst you have? No, verily; you yourselves by your conversion to Christianity, and embracing the faith of the gospel, are a better attestation and testimonial to the world, of the success of my ministry, than any written epistle is or can be: For you are an epistle written in our hearts; that is, your conversion by my ministry, is the joy and rejoicing of my heart! there it is that I continually carry a thankful and honourable remembrance of you, and bear you upon my heart, whenever I go in and out before the Lord. And as my epistle, you are known and read of all men; that is, all Christians far and near take notice of you as a church which God has eminently blessed my ministry to the conversion and edification of." But, lest the apostle should seem too assuming in calling the Corinthians his epistle, in the next words he calls them the epistle of Christ, ver. 3. Ye are the epistle of Christ ministered by us; that is, your faith and conversion was the work of Christ's Spirit, though wrote by my ministry; he having wrote his law in your hearts after a more excellent manner than any thing that can be written with ink and paper; not as the ten commandments of old were written, in tables of stone, but in the fleshy tables of the heart; that is, in your hearts made soft and pliable, and ready to obey the word and the will of God, by the operation of the holy Spirit, using my ministry as the pen or instrument in his hand in order thereunto. Learn hence,

1. That it is a very great favour from God, when his ministers can see the success of their labours in the hearts and lives of any of their people; when they can say, Ye are our epistle. 2. That nothing doth so highly commend our ministry as our people's proficiency; their improvement in knowledge, their stedfastness in the faith, their growth in grace and holiness, is beyond all verbal commendations and acknowledgments whatsoever. Sermons fetch not applause from men's renown, the people's practice is the preacher's crown. 3. That whatever success the faithful ministers of Christ meet with, either in the work of conversion or edification among a people, they attribute the whole efficiency of it unto God, ascribing nothing more than a bare instrumentality to themselves: We are the epistle of Christ, says the apostle, ministered by us; Christ has written his law in your hearts by my ministry; As if he had said, Christ is the writer, the pen is the minister, the ink the Spirit, the paper or table that receives the impression is the heart, and the law of God the writing writ therein and thereupon.

4 And such trust have we through Christ to Godward;

Observe here, How the apostle encourages himself from the experience he had of the present success of his ministry, to hope for the favour of farther and future success: Such trust or confidence have we, through the grace of Christ, of the constant efficacy of our ministry, that he will fill our own and honour it, succeed and bless it. When God has rendered our labours acceptable and successful amongst a people, either for conversion or edification, it should encourage us to trust in God for the efficacious assistance of our ministry, and rendering us yet more successful amongst them, and a greater blessing to them.

5 Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves; but our sufficiency is of God; 6 ¶ Who also hath made us able ministers of the New Testament, not of the letter, but of the Spirit: for the letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life.

Observe here, 1. How the apostle having made an apology and defence for himself, and his ministry, against those that did calumniate him, in the former verses: In the verse before us, he acknowledges his great inability for this work, and that his whole sufficiency for service was from God; and this without doubt he mentions not only out of humility, but out of prudence also, in order to stop the mouths of those who might be apt to think he had too high an esteem of himself: As if the apostle had said, "Far be it from me to think that I could procure the success of my ministry, that I have any such sufficiency of myself to convert souls; no, no, my sufficiency and success is all from God; for, alas! there is no proportion between such a sublime and supernatural service as that of the gospel-ministry is, and the impotency and weakness of man." Not that we are sufficient of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God.

2. The free and full acknowledgment which the apostle makes of the great things which God hath done for him, and by him; He did not find, but made him, a minister, an able minister; yea, an able minister of the New Testament, or new covenant; not a preacher of the law of Moses, but of the gospel of Jesus: Who hath made us able ministers of the New Testament. To be a sufficient and successful gospel-minister is a very great favour from God to any person: The clay of the gospel is better than the gold of the temple; the rags of the evangelical, more rich honour to be, and a greater favour to hear, the meanest gospel-preacher, than to hear all Moses's lectures. 3. How our apostle here insensibly slides into a comparison which he makes between the law of Moses and the gospel of Christ, in which he magnifies and prefers the latter above the former; the law he calls the letter, the gospel, the Spirit; that is, a ministration of the Spirit. The letter killeth; that is, the law condemneth and curseth the sinner, the transgressor of it; but the Spirit of Christ revealed in the gospel, enableth, as well as directeth, to obey, and so giveth life. Note here, How false the quakers and others gloss is upon these words: They by the letter, will understand the whole written word of God, contained in the scriptures of the Old and New Testament, the law and gospel both; and by the Spirit, will have to be meant the inward and immediate teachings of the light within them. Others by the letter, understand the literal and historical sense of scripture in general; and by the Spirit giving life, they understand the mystical and spiritual sense of scripture; but it is evident from ver. 3. that by the letter he understands the law engraven in stone, the law as delivered by Moses with an appearance of the glory of the Lord upon mount Sinai ; And by the Spirit, is meant the blessed Spirit of Christ given to the apostles to enable them to preach the gospel, and conferred upon all believers that did obediently hear and receive it.

7 But if the ministration of death written and engraven in stones, was glorious, so that the children of Israel could not stedfastly behold the face of Moses, for the glory of his countenance, which glory was to be done away : 8 How shall not the ministration of the Spirit be rather glorious ?

Our apostle, in this and the following verses, go on with his comparison betwixt the law and the gospel, and shews the transcendency of the latter above the former. Where note, 1. He calls the law again a killing law, or a ministration of death ; because it condemns men for the breach of it, to temporal and eternal death, without opening to them any door of hope. 2. This law (he speaks of it by way of diminution) was only written upon, and engraven in stone ; whereas the gospel is written in the fleshy tables of men's hearts. 3. How the apostle declares that this ministration of the law was glorious, glorious in the minister of it, Moses, who had such a lustre upon his face, that the children of Israel could not bear the sight of it ; and glorious in the manner of giving it : There was a great deal of the glory and majesty of God attending the giving of the law to Moses ; the ministration of the law was glorious. 4. The comparison which the apostle makes between the law and the gospel, and the preference which he gives to the one above the other. (1.) As the glory of Moses's face ceased after a while, so the glory of the law ceased at the coming of the gospel. (2.) The law was delivered by angels to Moses, but the gospel was delivered to the apostles by the Son of God, who is the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person. (3.) Whereas the glory of Moses did more and more decrease ; the glory put upon the apostles, and derived from Christ, was still more and more increasing upon them. But, (4.) The chief glory of the glory, which the apostle here insists upon, is the ministration of the Spirit, in the large effusions of it under the gospel dispensation, giving spiritual and eternal life to believers, instead of death spiritual and eternal coming by the law. Well therefore might our apostle here say, the ministration of the Spirit, or the gospel, is much more glorious ; and consequently a greater reverence and honour is due to it, and to the ministers of it.

9 For if the ministration of condemnation be glory, much more doth the ministration of righteousness exceed in glory. 10 For even that which is made glorious had no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory that excelleth, 11 For if that which is done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious.

Observe here, 1. The different titles given to the law, and to the gospel ; the former is called the ministration of condemnation, because it condemns men eternally for the violation of it ; the latter is called the ministration of righteousness or justification, because it discovers to us the only way for a sinner's justification before God, namely, by the righteousness of the Mediator. 2. That the apostle comparing the law and the gospel together, acknowledges that there was a surpassing glory in the latter above and beyond the former. Indeed God's institution stamp'd an excellency upon the Jewish worship, and the law given them had both an intrinsic glory in it, as it was a revelation of the will of God ; and also an accidental and adventitious glory, as it was attended with the solemnity of thunder and lightning, fire and smoke, and a voice like the sound of a trumpet. at the promulgation of it ; yet, says the apostle, compared with the gospel, the glory of the law, or Jewish worship, had no glory in it at all, by reason of the glory that doth excel ; as the moon compared with the sun, is so outshined by it, that its brightness is little taken notice of. True, indeed, the law was a revelation of God's will as well as the gospel, but with this happy advantage on the gospel's side : The law was a revelation of God's will as to duty and as to condemnation, in case of non-performance of that duty ; but the gospel is a revelation of God's will, as to grace and mercy, as to remission of sin and eternal life. 3. Another argument produced here by the apostle, to prove the ministration of the gospel to be much more glorious than that of the law ; namely, because it is much more durable and abiding : Verse 11. If that which is done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious. The force of the argument lies thus : That which is durable and permanent, is far more excellent than that which is temporary and transient. Now the law or Jewish dispensation is vanished ; its ministration is ceased, and all the legal ordinances are abolished : but the gospel-state remaineth to the end of the world. It is called a kingdom that cannot be moved, Heb. xii. 28. therefore the gospel ministration, which is eternal, fixed, and abiding, must needs be more excellent and more glorious than the legal dispensation, which was temporary, transient, and vanishing.

12 Seeing then that we have such hope, we use great plainness of speech. 13 And not as Moses, which put a veil over his face, that the children of Israel could not stedfastly look to the end of that which is abolished. 14 But their minds were blinded. For until this day remaineth the same veil untaken away in the reading of the Old Testament ; which veil is done away in Christ. 15 But even unto this day, when Moses is read, the veil is upon their heart. 16 Nevertheless, when it shall turn to the Lord, the veil shall be taken away.

Here the apostle draws an inference from the foregoing discourse ; that seeing himself and the other apostles had such hope, that their ministry was thus glorious, such confidence and assurance of the perfection and perpetuity of their ministry, they did now use great plainness, freedom, and boldness of speech in preaching and publishing the gospel : and did not imitate Moses, the minister of the law, who

who put a veil over his face; which was a sign of the obscurity of the legal dispensation, and of the business of the Jews, who could not see the end and the accomplishment of that ceremonial and typical administration, which was to be abolished by Christ and his gospel: But their minds were then, and still are, blinded by prejudice and unbelief, and the same veil remaineth to this day spread over Moses's writings, and not taken away in the reading of the Old Testament; which veil is now done away by the doctrine of Christ contained in the New Testament; nevertheless, when the hearts of the Jews shall be turned unto the Lord, and they own and acknowledge Jesus Christ, then the veil shall be taken away from the Jews, and they shall then clearly understand and see what is now concealed and hidden from their eyes. Learn hence, 1. That there is a natural veil of blindness and ignorance upon the minds of men, which hinders their discerning and understanding gospel mysteries. 2. That there is upon the understandings of the Jews a veil of unbelief and rooted prejudice against Christ and his holy religion; they wilfully shut their eyes, and said, "They would not see;" and God has judiciously closed their eyes, and said, "They shall not see." 3. That by reason of this veil upon their hearts, they cannot look to the end of that which was abolished; that is, to Jesus Christ, who was the end and scope at which the whole ceremonial law did aim and tend. 4. That when the Jews shall be called home, and converted to Christianity, the veil shall be removed from their hearts, and they shall then understand the tendency and meaning of the whole ceremonial law, and observe its fulfilling and accomplishment in our Lord Jesus Christ. When they shall turn to the Lord, the veil shall be taken away.

17 Now the Lord is that Spirit: and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.

As if he had said, Christ is that quickening and life-giving Spirit, who takes away the veil from off their hearts; and where that Spirit, that all-glorious and all-powerful Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty; that is, clearness, and no more veil; freedom from the yoke of the legal administration, a liberty and freedom from sin, a liberty unto righteousness, a freeness and readiness of spirit to do good, a liberty of address and approach to God, a liberty of speech in prayer before God. Thus the Spirit of the Lord is a free Spirit.

18 But we all with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord.
